Owing to left hemisphere dominance, ASLs tend to think in words, they respond best to educational content presented in sequence with a reliance on rote learning, phonetic language acquisition, written text, and simple verbal explanation. This group are good at reading a textbook from start to finish, focussing on the class teacher, and regurgitating rote content in exams. However, this group can’t understand what they learn. Contextual understanding relies on right hemispheric activation, which they simply do not have. ASLs comprise most students. The ASLs who perform optimally in this traditional classroom (which is geared exclusively to ASLs) typically gain the top university entry scores.

Successful students learn by rote memory but can’t understand what they learn.

According to McGilchrist, deductive reasoning activates the right hemisphere’s visual areas in the absence of visual stimuli. Activation of the right hemisphere allows the gifted group to think in pictures. Hence, when you verbally describe something to a high IQ VSL, if they are interested in what you say, and are focused on your content, they will immediately convert your words into a movie in their head. Your words will then be permanently stored in this visual format, and the listener will never forget what you told them. This is called eidetic memory. You might know it as photographic memory. The higher the IQ, the more pronounced this ability.

I once asked a successful lawyer what separates average from exceptional lawyers. ‘Photographic memory!’ he quipped. The ability to visualise makes right hemispheric learning and processing far superior. The advantage to quickly recalling relevant legislation and cases is obvious. Additionally, the gifted individual’s lateral thinking ability serves them well in statutory interpretation.

Owing to their superior right brain functioning, gifted individuals only need to learn a concept once to understand and permanently remember it. This assists rapid knowledge acquisition. Yet high IQ’s must understand something in order to learn and memorise it. Hence, intelligent kids incessantly question everything. They are independent, lateral thinkers who make the best leaders. Intellectually gifted students prefer a holistic learning approach which starkly contrasts traditional schooling methods based on auditory-sequential repetition and phonetics. If permitted to learn the way their brains are wired to, exceptionally gifted children typically complete high school or university before their age peers finish primary school. Stanford University run a special school program for children who score IQ 145+ on the Wechsler or SB5, where they can do university level work from age five years. I know because my daughter was enrolled in their distance education program.

Australian students who score IQ 130+ on comprehensive measures are neglected educationally and psychologically. Consequently, they drop out of school mentally by Grade 3, and physically before high school graduation. The brightest students typically do not pursue tertiary studies in law or medicine. This well contributes to why most doctors and psychiatrists are ignorant and ineffective when it comes to working with victims of extreme abuse. It also explains why so many surgeons are butchers, since surgical skill requires high right brain visual-spatial processing ability. Generally, doctors are only good at following a sequential set of steps, such as anaesthesiology, but are quite useless, even dangerous, when faced with novel situations.

Doctors are particularly susceptible to the Dunning-Kruger Effect, a cognitive bias in which people of average IQ have illusory superiority and mistakenly assess their intelligence level as greater than it is. They come to the field of medicine assuming they already possess all they need to know, when their average IQ level prevents them from understanding more complex concepts and discovering a whole body of information that sits outside their left-brain capacity and knowledge base.

CREATIVITY

Creativity is not synonymous with intellectual giftedness, meaning a person can be gifted and not so creative, or creative and not gifted. This puzzles me since creativity is associated with the right hemisphere, and high IQ people exhibit such high activation in this area. Highly intelligent people can produce different profiles where they score higher on left or right brain tasks. And people can be right brain dominant without being high IQ. So, I deduce creativity has to do with right hemispheric activity.

Lewis Terman defined genius as an individual who measured IQ 180+ on the Stanford Binet. CIA psychologist John Gittinger considered genius to be a combination of exceptionally high IQ plus extremely high creative ability. The creative and gifted child who scored profoundly on visual-spatial test items was the CIA's prime mind control target. The 'creative genius' was the ideal candidate for the range of CIA programs including MK-DELTA and Stargate which I discuss later.

Until recently, it has been impossible for mainstream psychologists to test creativity, because no one had defined the variable 'creativity' such that it can be operationalised and psychometrically tested. Mainstream scientists are only now starting to publish evidence of what I was mocked for saying years ago, that the CIA used brain scanning to assess victims for creativity. For example, a 2018 study used fMRI scans to show that creative thinking ability is characterized by a distinct brain connectivity profile.[447] Researchers reliably predicted an individual's ability to generate original ideas, from the strength of functional connectivity within a brain network associated with creative ability.

SENSORY PROCESSING DISORDER

Their unique brain structure and function enables high IQ individuals to receive and process greater amounts of sensory input at once. Gifted people can detect and respond to sensory stimuli more quickly. They can think more complex and abstract thoughts, scan visual images quicker, detect visual and cognitive patterns, and make connections between seemingly unrelated bits of information. They can read micro facial expressions and body language, perceive what others are thinking, and accurately predict their responses. These abilities make high IQ individuals good at researching, detecting, code breaking, and intelligence gathering. Their quick reflexes and superior hand-eye coordination allow them to control a speeding vehicle and reverse a trailer with high accuracy. Their superb memories and auditory processing capacity allow them to function as human tape-recorders and to rapidly acquire foreign languages. In a military setting, their high visual-spatial processing IQ scores flag them as potential elite sniper squad recruits. Combine superior reaction time, hand-eye coordination, physical strength, agility, sniper skills, physical fitness, and a whole lot of ability enhancement via brainwashing – and you have a potential super soldier. This might explain why the CIA targeted high IQ visual-spatial learners.

Unfortunately, that which enables gifted individuals to perform impressive cognitive tasks is the same thing that makes them hypersensitive to sensory stimuli. The higher the IQ, the greater the sensitivity to light, noise, touch, smell, taste, and emotional stimuli. Such sensitivity has been labelled a developmental condition, Sensory Processing Disorder. SPD contributes to why gifted people often turn to drugs and alcohol, to subdue the constant overwhelming barrage of sensory input.

Note that people on the autism spectrum are also prone to SPD. While they share hypersensitivity and certain cognitive abilities, autism must not be confused with giftedness. Remember McGilchrist's observation that these developmental disorders feature profound right hemispheric abnormality. In stark contrast, gifted individuals demonstrate exceptional right hemispheric functioning. Yet ignorant and jealous health professionals routinely misdiagnose intellectual giftedness as high-functioning autism.

Extreme visual-spatial processing ability renders gifted individuals susceptible to PTSD, and this can confound diagnosis. The high IQ victim is so sensitive that merely hearing a traumatic story second-hand affects them as though they witnessed the event first-hand. They turn the verbal rendition of the event into an internal movie so that the traumatic scene is permanently stored in memory and may be replayed. Their right hemisphere repeatedly plays an internal movie of a trauma incident.

This hypersensitivity makes the trauma-based nature of mind control programming especially painful for high IQ victims. Fundamental brainwashing techniques involve overwhelming the victim's nervous system with sensory stimuli. Sensory overload is achieved via the parallel infliction of loud screeching sounds, foul smells, electrocution, and forcing the eyelids open to view horrific images.

Gifted individuals have a greater capacity for empathy, to picture themselves in others' shoes, and anticipate how others might feel, think, and respond in a situation. This tendency to over-empathise also contributes to the gifted individual's sensory overload. Their capacity for empathy makes the sight of tortured animals and children extra painful. Their empathic nature places victims at risk of revolting against their handlers, which is why CIA perpetrators focus on breaking the individual's innate concern for humanity and redirecting loyalty toward cult members and fellow soldiers within their Delta units.

THE IQ END GAME

I no longer feel guilty confessing my IQ score, especially since subsequent events have validated this memory to my satisfaction. As part of my six years of psychology training, I was required to practise IQ assessment with colleagues. I played guinea pig for a student peer in 2007, prior to my vestibular stroke. I blitzed the entire Wechsler test battery, especially Block Design which I threw down as quick as humanly possible. I even blitzed the math problems when I suffer math phobia (yep, it's a real thing). I remember feeling so relaxed and unthreatened during testing, I calculated the math and blurted out the answers the moment my friend finished asking the questions. We were both stunned.

My therapist assessed me in early 2014. I underwent a battery of tests, the results of which indicated high IQ (despite my stroke damage). I also completed working memory training and my final learning index for this was more than double the average. My therapist provided an interviewer the following answers to questions regarding my intelligence level:

> Q. In addition to her cognitive assessment presented via the QEEG tests, what is your opinion as to Fiona's level of intelligence?
> A. Fiona possesses a robust cognitive profile that is highly adaptive. Her cognition was assessed utilising the IntegNeuro and elevated scores were seen across the spectrum. To further support this she has a fast-Alpha peak of 11hz, as noted in her QEEG indicating high intelligence.
> Q. Would you describe Fiona Barnett as being gifted in any way?
> A. Fiona is certainly gifted in many ways. She is a brilliant writer, researcher and thinker. He memory recall is astounding and her ability to put facts and incidents together to solve or resolve is phenomenal. She is artistic and apparently musical. She could be a brilliant teacher and a brilliant lawyer. I just hope she is arguing my case if that is ever necessary.
> Q. What do you understand about people who are gifted in some way?
> A. Gifted people can present in many different ways. They are often highly sensitive, easily bored by the mundane aspects of life, and often brutally honest to the point of being socially questionable. They have an intensity in energy, imagination, intellect, sensitivity and emotion. They are a particularly vulnerable group, often rejected by peers due to their different tastes in life, interests etc. Different IQ levels also present with different needs, interests and sensitivities.

The greatest dose of IQ validation was injected when I had my own two children assessed for giftedness on the Stanford Binet 5. My kids were tested at age 8 years following problems with boredom and underachievement at school. My eldest scored in the >99.99th percentile, reaching the ceiling on certain subtests including visual-spatial processing. My youngest child scored one IQ point higher than her sister.

Sydney’s giftedness guru explained to me that my eldest daughter had the intellectual capacity of a 35-year-old. ‘She could be one in a million… but I’d need to assess her on the LM to know.’ The educational psychologist then advised me to pull my child out of her so-called giftedness program, concluding, ‘No school in the country can cater for this.’

Upon received my eldest child’s comprehensive psychological report, I exclaimed to the assessor, ‘Did you assess my child – or me?! What you wrote perfectly describes me.’ Then, after receiving the youngest’s report, I felt compelled to ask, ‘I don’t understand these newer tests and what their scores mean. I relate better to the old tests. How does the SB5 compare to the L-M?’

‘You can’t really compare them. It’s harder to achieve a high score on the new test. You only had to score highly in one area on the old test to boost your IQ score. You have to do well on every subtest to score highly now.’

‘So, can you give me a rough idea. Based on their SB5 scores and your experience at having tested kids on both tests, what do you expect my kids to score on the old L-M?’

‘In the one-seventies to one-eighties.’

‘I recall being tested on the SB L-M at age five. Obviously, I can’t access my original report, but I recall scoring one eighty overall, two hundred on visual-spatial processing. Is that score feasible?’

‘Absolutely! There’s three of you, all the same.’

The psychologist who tested my kids is the only Australian I trust to obtain an accurate assessment of a gifted child; the only professional I found who demonstrated an appreciation of the implications of being bright. Most mental health professionals and educators, including those who claim expertise in giftedness, are in fact useless. They are clueless to the basics of giftedness and visual-spatial processing, never mind nuances like Linda Silverman’s discovery of an obscure spike on the bell curve at the IQ 160 mark, or that IQ 160+ kids are susceptible to a unique type of reactive hypoglycaemia, or that such kids are prone to a type of existentialist depression. Consequently, giftedness characteristics are commonly misdiagnosed as indicators of autism, Aspergers, mania, depression, OCD, ADHD and BPD. Abnormality in the form of genius is routinely overlooked and mislabelled insanity.

If mental health professionals do not understand the basics of giftedness and visual-spatial learning, and if they label gifted people nuts just for being gifted, how can they begin to provide adequate services to high IQ victims of MK-ULTRA mind control?

While Australian educators ignore the intellectually gifted student - others are watching. School children are quietly tracked via performance on national competitions, online math and science programs, and participation in gifted education holiday camps. Australian Junior high school students identified as intellectually gifted are encouraged to participate in The JASON Project, an online science curriculum program purportedly designed to motivate and inspire students to pursue a science career. It was developed by NASA, NOAA, and the National Geographic Society, among others.

Universities are hunting grounds for recruitment into Australia’s secret services. Students who perform outstandingly at public universities are nominated by lecturers for life membership in an international academic society called Golden Key. At the end of their university degree, Golden Key graduates with an unblemished background and who participated in Golden Key training sessions hosted at Sydney’s head Freemason Lodge receive email invitations from ASIO, Australian Federal Police, and ASIS to jump the rigorous application process to the interview stage for potential employment.

And when the gifted science students graduate, they can join the real JASON Group of elite scientists who continue the Nazi legacy in deep underground military facilities, working on top secret projects that I discuss in the following chapter. Projects involving anti-gravity, stargates, plasma weapons, hadron colliders, and transhumanism - the forbidden mixing of human, animal and alien materials to develop the ultimate vaccination, with the goal of genetically altering human DNA. The resultant vaccine promises to make soldiers immune to sleep, hunger and injury, to enhance our physical, intellectual and spiritual capacities, and disengage the death gene. The recipients will then become all that Hollywood has been promising its viewers – immortal, superior men. . . supermen. Perhaps then, the communist egalitarianism that the Luciferian system has been pushing for will finally be achieved. This may be the fundamental reason why naturally gifted, bilateral processors are quashed like second class citizens, and why our situation will not improve.

If the Bible is to be taken seriously, God built into mankind a group of natural born leaders. The Biblical description of King David is a fine example of this select-group. David demonstrated classic giftedness characteristics including intensity, spiritual awareness, extreme social justice, loyalty, empathy, passion, moral reasoning, higher-order thinking, musical brilliance, and a talent for architecture and engineering. He passed his physical and psychological characteristics to his son Solomon, the most intelligent human who will ever be.

If today's gifted individuals were acknowledged, accommodated, and permitted to assume their natural leadership roles, instead of the left-brained psychopaths who educate and govern us, our society might better reflect the prosperity of Solomon's age instead of the evil, crime-ridden, decaying cesspit that it is.

Out of jealousy and a desire to be just like God, the enemy sought to destroy God's creation and replace it with an imitation. In this process, God's tall poppies were cut down - and idiocy took the throne. Failing to find his own dirt, the enemy manipulated, threatened, and deceived our bright minds into rearranging God's creation, his ultimate goal being the production of an imitation of God's elite which the devil calls his own.

Personality Assessment System

I've heard John [Gittinger] say, there's always something that someone wants; and with the PAS you can find out what it is. It's not necessarily sex or booze. Sometimes it's status, or recognition, or security.

- CIA Psychologist

Some people get flowers and chocolates as tokens of their partner's affection. I received dusty old IQ tests. In 2009, my husband began purchasing redundant IQ assessments on eBay. I found Jon's latest spending spree mildly amusing, like the time someone broke my favourite tea pot, and Jon made five eBay purchases before he attained an exact replacement. The various first edition Stanford Binet tests meant nothing to me, and I didn't quite understand what Jon's intention was - until it arrived. A mint condition SB L-M. I opened the box, took a brief look at its gleaming contents and sank into shock. I ran my fingers over the familiar pieces as my being was instantly transported back to 1974.

'I know this…' I whispered, overwhelmed by validation. 'You found it.' Tears welled in my eyes. 'You found my test…'

GITTINGER: EVIL GENIUS

I was assessed on the SB L-M combined with the Wechsler Block Design when I was five years old. The optimal time to test for high intelligence is when the child is old enough to concentrate and understand, but prior to entering school where the highly variable quality of education acts as a confounding variable. I was assessed at Holsworthy Army Base by head CIA psychologist John W. Gittinger.

John Gittinger was the greatest psychometric testing expert the world has never known. An expert in interrogation and brainwashing, Gittinger served as the CIA's first operational psychologist, travelling the globe, collecting and advising on MK-ULTRA mind control methods. That is why he travelled to Australia and supervised my brain washing and reprogramming.

PERSONALITY ASSESSMENT SYSTEM

With CIA funding, Gittinger developed the PAS (Personality Assessment System), the most complex, versatile psychological test ever created. Mainstream psychologists are blind to the very existence of the PAS, never mind its staggering scope. The test was scarcely mentioned in my psychology textbooks which presented it as a mainstream tool for educational, vocational, and clinical work. The PAS was in fact the CIA's template for creating multiple personalities within child victims of mind control. The intelligence sector used the PAS to:

- Profile targets for recruitment as CIA agents;
- Profile politicians, entertainers and businessmen for blackmail and control by identifying their weaknesses (e.g., sexual proclivity and perversion);
- Profile whistle-blowers for tailored harassment methods;

- Tailor interrogation or torture methods to personality types;
- Profile international leaders and citizens in preparation for CIA infiltration and overthrow of their governments;
- Select candidates for psycho-energetic CIA programs including Remote Viewing, Project Stargate, and the Gateway Process;
- Profile international secret police;
- Identify suitable child prostitute and soldier candidates.
- Tailor the creation of multiple personalities to a victim's hemispheric processing style and brain wave patterning.

Based solely on Wechsler subtest scores, Gittinger could determine an individual's personality type plus the environmental factors that shaped them, accurately predict their reactions to social situations and stressors, identify their strengths and weaknesses, and match them to job tasks or roles. He could also reverse this process and predict Wechsler test scores from observed behaviour - something previously unheard of.

By all reports, no one could replicate Gittinger's understanding of the PAS. I surmise this is mainly due to the secretive nature of the PAS. Gittinger worked for the CIA during the entire time (1950s and 60s) he developed the PAS. Not surprisingly, most information about the PAS remains classified. Gittinger's original (1964) Atlas, essential for test interpretation, was never published, although a civilian version was published 30 years later. Most of the CIA-funded research conducted on the PAS at MK-ULTRA research epicentres was not published either, as this was fed directly into the CIA database. PAS research hubs included the University of Colorado, Columbia University, Ohio University, and Stanford University. PAS research was subsequently transferred to CIA cut-out organisations: SRI International, Psychological Assessments Associates Inc., and MARS Measurement Associates.

Another reason the PAS is unknown is because influential psychologists including Eysenck rejected it as impossible. Most psychologists are too left-brain to comprehend and implement the PAS. They feel threatened by nobodies like Gittinger who create something as brilliant as the PAS without possessing the obligatory PhD. Eysenck felt particularly threatened since he fancied himself an expert on intelligence and personality. Tellingly, his personality test is not used by the CIA, nor anyone else. I resented rote learning Eysenck's left-brained crap for exams because it was incomprehensible and incorrect.

The person who built the foundation of my knowledge base concerning intelligence theory and psychological testing was Gittinger himself. While studying psychology and gifted education, I was subconsciously guided by what Gittinger explained and demonstrated throughout my childhood. Each time he abused me, every time I was in his presence, he explained exactly what he was doing and why. This was his teaching approach, and it worked. I took to psychometric testing, interpretation, and report writing like I had been studying it for years – because I had.

Gittinger stored knowledge of the PAS and other relevant test instruments in my implicit memory system. Indications of this leaked during my psychology studies, notably a 2009 lecture on the MMPI (Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory). At the start of the class, students were provided preliminary information about an actual, deidentified female client, including her presenting symptomology plus a printout of the raw data from her MMPI test results. Our instructor asked us to examine the information and share our initial impressions with the class. I flicked over the pages, rapidly scanned the graphs, raised my hand, and asserted, ‘This client should not work with a male therapist.’ My classmates shot me a perplexed look, while our lecturer swallowed his surprise. Two hours later, our lecturer shared the conclusions that a psychiatric case management team came to after having worked with the client for six months. Their main finding was that the client should not work with a male therapist.

When I told my therapist that I was trying to decipher the CIA’s application of the PAS, he exclaimed, ‘You could write an entire book just on the PAS. You are the PAS!’

Understanding the PAS requires knowledge of intelligence and brain laterality, which is why I provided a detailed introduction to both concepts. The fundamental premise of the PAS is that intelligence and personality elements are present at birth but can be modified by external factors during development. The PAS recognises the significance of brain laterality, that some people are left-brain dominant, some right brain dominant, some are bilateral processors (meaning both brain hemispheres are highly active during cognitive processing), and some show no particular bias.

PAS interpretations were based on Wechsler subtest scaled scores, plus age and sex. Interpretations were derived from Gittinger’s Atlas (1964) which contained a description of every possible personality type. These descriptions were derived from many thousands of Weschler profiles submitted by psychologists worldwide. I doubt the CIA publicly divulged the true size and source of the PAS normative sample.

Gittinger identified three core personality dimensions (Cognitive, Procedural and Social). The resultant Primitive personality structure may change in the years preceding adolescence when it becomes fixed. Change stems from pressure during childhood from parents, siblings, teachers, or peers to acquire abilities absent from the original personality structure. This process is called Compensation, the most important dynamic in the PAS. Compensation results in a stable Basic personality level. Further change may occur after adolescence via Modification, which results in a third, Surface level of personality. Surface level personality changes are unstable and can break down under stress. Modification and the Surface personality are what we see when interacting with a person. Compensation and the Basic personality are what we learn about someone during closer association, and what they feel inside themselves.

MK-ULTRA victim files contain pages of PAS notation. This coding system starts as a nine-symbol shorthand to denote the strength of the three original (Primitive) tendencies (Cognitive, Emotional and Social), and the degree and direction of the resultant two adjustment levels (Compensation and Modification). Capital letters indicate the initial letter in the name of the three core (Primitive) tendencies. Thus, the letter E stands for Externalizer, I for Internaliser. Compensation, or the lack of it, is shown by a lower-case letter placed after the Primitive tendency capital letter. For example, Ic stands for Compensated I. The code becomes far more complicated than what has been published, until a victim’s records are full of PAS-based algebraic formula.

CORE PERSONALITY DIMENSIONS

The first core personality dimension (Cognitive) can be loosely compared to the idea of introvert versus extrovert. It can also be defined by what the child finds intellectually stimulating. The Primitive Cognitive dimension is determined by the Wechsler Digit Span, a genetically determined measure of auditory processing which is marginally influenced by learning. Arithmetic and Information indicate Basic and Surface levels.

I v E

Internalisers (I) are preoccupied with their own thoughts and ideas. They prefer to think than do. They are insulated and comfortable alone with their own company. They appear passive, aloof and emotionless. They can work efficiently in a distracting environment. They can easily store and retrieve information, which is why they score well on the Digit Span subtest. The I type is characteristically schizoid, and in the extreme autistic. I's are externally pressured to compensate by being more outgoing.

Externalizers (E) score low on Digit Span. E types are focused and dependent on their environment. They respond spontaneously and directly to people, and mainly detect changes in the environment. E's rely on their senses, are easily distracted, and do not like being alone. In the extreme, E's are moody and dominated by events. E's are pressured to compensate by responding less, being more self-sufficient, and more ideationally aware.

The second core dimension (Procedural) refers to a person's learning style, sensitivity to stimuli, and how they solve mechanical or procedural tasks. Block Design determines the Primitive Procedural level. Similarities and Comprehension indicate Basic and Surface personality levels.

R v F

Rigid (R) people are preoccupied with detail. R's are disposed toward order and organisation. They learn by rote, in a sequential manner, and don't need to understand the whole concept. They react to a limited number of specific, well-defined stimuli. Because they see one thing at a time, R types accept the external environment at face value. They can concentrate and are not easily distracted or confused. R's do not cope with multiple stimuli simultaneously. They are insensitive, logic-tight, and self-centred. In the extreme, R's are rigid and can't see the forest for the trees. R's are pressured to be more sensitive and flexible.

Flexible (F) people need to understand something to learn it. They must understand the reason behind a task before they will even attempt it. The F sees the whole picture and perceives connections between people and the environment. F's are overly aware of their environment and respond simultaneously to various stimuli. Consequently, they are easily distracted and confused, and find concentration more difficult. They are intuitive, imaginative and sensitive. They tolerate ambiguity, and notice subtleties and nuances. Their confusion and ability to perceive all aspects of a situation makes them unsure of the world. In the extreme, the F is chaotic. F's are pressured to concentrate, be less sensitive, and restrict their awareness.

A v U

The third dimension (Social) is a measure of social intelligence, or a person's ability to adapt to new social and cultural settings. The Primitive level is determined by the Wechsler Picture Arrangement subtest. Compensation and Modification are determined by Picture Completion and Object Assembly. High Picture Arrangement scores indicate socio-cultural adaptability.

Role Adaptive (A) types score highly on the Picture Arrangement subtest. A's are charismatic, charming, captivating, and attractive. They are socially versatile and confident. They can appear conforming and conventional, even if they are not. Their developmental environment determines whether they use their appeal to enhance, exploit, or avoid relationships. In the extreme, A's are social chameleons who lack integrity.

Conversely, Role Uniform (U) types present as socially awkward, aloof and inept. They tend to be socially ignored, anxious and avoidant. In the extreme, U's present the same in every social situation, even if this is inappropriate. U's are pressured or seduced into trying to be more sociable and charming.

Primitive Temperaments

The PAS recognises 8 possible base temperament combinations, as this table shows:[448]

Primitive	Traits	Style
IRA	Self-motivated, organized, procedural, socially effective.	Political
IRU	Self-motivated, self-concerned, organized, socially aloof.	Scientific
IFA	Self-centred, sensitive, socially active.	Artistic
IFU	Self-centred, sensitive, aloof.	Contemplative
ERA	Outgoing, organized, socially skilled.	Entrepreneurial
ERU	Environmentally attuned, organised, procedural, but socially restrained.	Technocratic
EFA	Outgoing, relating, sensitive, and socially involving.	Theatrical
EFU	Outgoing, sensitive, relating, dependent but socially awkward.	Defensive

RELEVANCE OF INTROVERSION: HYPNOTISABILITY

Gittinger targeted gifted female introverts. High IQ individuals tend to be introverts, hence the PAS Internaliser dimension is determined by high scores on Wechsler subtest items. A clue to the relevance of introversion is found in an excerpt from The Encyclopedia of Hypnotism:

> In some research, women were easier to hypnotize than men, but only by a small percentage. In both sexes, the higher the IQ, the greater the hypnotic susceptibility. In one study, bright female introverts were most susceptible. Extroverts forget more over time than introverts, but they are better at retrieving information from deeply buried memory, especially if it's relatively inaccessible. Introverts are more affected by punishment, extroverts by reward. That data could be interpreted to make introverts preferred candidates for hypno-programming. They have better memory for unconscious instructions, less ability to recover repressed memory, and are more controllable by suggested suffering. More formal evaluations of hypnotisability are derived from Rorschach or TAT tests and from brainwave patterns (more alpha indicates more susceptibility). If the subject had an imaginary playmate in childhood, that also indicates susceptibility.[449]

From I to E

Knowing my performance on the WAIS 10 years ago, I can see I was born an IFA. My mother clearly recalls my being an Internaliser until Nanna Holowczak took me to Canberra for a week when I was 3 years old. I left home an introvert and returned to my mother as an extrovert. Mengele split my core personality during that Canberra trip. I vaguely recall a discussion I had with Gittinger at age 14, in which he said being born an introvert did not matter because he could easily change an introvert into an extrovert.

[449] Carla Emery (1998). Secret Don't Tell: The Encyclopedia of Hypnotism.

I surmise my programmers forced a permanent change to my core personality in Canberra when I was aged 3. I wondered why I was changed from an I to an E. Perhaps it had something to do with the CIA's research findings that 100 percent of schizophrenics are Internalisers (with 80 percent being R's, and 75 percent U's) and they wanted to eliminate any predisposition to my breaking in that direction? Or perhaps they wanted to turn me from a secret-keeper into a talker? Or maybe they wanted me dependent on others instead of being so independent? Or else they wanted to distract me from reflecting inwards and discovering and fixing my dissociation? Then I read an article by one of Gittinger's CIA assistants which addressed the issue:

> Compensation not only results in a conditioned change in the individual's behaviour; it builds in emotional qualities that shape the individual's motives, motivations, anxieties, loyalties, goals and guilt… If he is allowed to mature without the pressures and stresses of compensation, he acquires a basic personality that is psychologically very comfortable for him, and very consistent with his primitive style; but he will also be very bland, under motivated, and a sociologically immature person. His temperament and his sensitivities will be self-centred, and he will show little evidence of ambition or responsibility. In those areas where compensation takes place, the individual will show considerable drive, motivation and energy. Thus, the compensated I (or Ic) becomes a basic E (or e, in PAS notation), and outperforms the primitive E's in being outgoing and environmentally active.* [450]

From this I deduce, compensated people make more passionate, motivated, loyal, and responsible DELTA soldiers and cult leaders

REFERENCE GROUP MODEL

Psychologist David Saunders joined Gittinger in 1957 and helped turn his intuitive use of the PAS into a standardised method which other CIA programmers could replicate. A talented statistician, Saunders created a mathematical Reference Group Model to supplement the PAS. He also helped develop PAS code into algebraic formula to make programming predictions and decisions.

David Saunders' Reference Group Model stemmed from a systematic examination of Wechsler data from many thousands of individuals. His model classified and categorised people into three dimensions (Primitive, Affiliations, and Stress) based on shared psychometric and behavioural characteristics. Gittinger's PAS combined with Saunders' Reference Group Model resulted in a tool that profiled every possible personality type, addressed every conceivable human behaviour, and accurately predicted reactions to any given situation.

The CIA used the PAS to profile mind control victims, identify weak points, and predict responses to the stress of the MK-ULTRA process. Perpetrators used PAS results to tailor CIA torture methods to the victim's personality type and psychological capacity. They used the Reference Groups to select an Alter's brain location, neural circuitry, personality, abilities, and role. This entire process was done in conjunction with EEG readings of the victim's brain, based on early PAS research on the relationship between PAS results and brainwave activity, particularly alpha activity (which also indicates IQ level).

The Reference Model's Information Processing Style dimension includes four types of brain-hemispheric development: Left-Brained, Right-Brained, Bilateral, or Externally Controlled. Left and Bilateral processors are skilled at logical reasoning. Right-Brain and Bilateral processors are skilled at pattern recognition. Externally controlled types are not particularly skilled at either. Right-brained groups are predominantly female, while Left-brained are mainly male.

The reference Model's Stress Response Style encompasses three approaches to coping with multiple stimuli: Poly-Actives thrive on simultaneously accomplishing multiple tasks; Pro-Actives can only cope with finishing one task at a time; while Re-Actives must be instructed and guided to cope with any task.

Although there have been revisions, the following 1984 version of the PAS Reference Groups is the closest to my age as a victim and so the most relevant. The 96 groups are arranged in the following table which highlights the most important relationships among the groups:

1999 revised role additions that impress me as pertinent to MK-ULTRA programming.*

The Reference Group table matches the complex Alter systems found in MK-ULTRA mind control victims. The model identifies the correct hemispheric location of each artificially created Alter's independent neural circuitry. It also clusters multiple roles relevant to one position within the cult hierarchy; for example, during her position as Grande Dame, Patricia Ann Conlon performed every role listed in Group 5 below:

Role	Application
Teacher	Instructed children in all aspects of cult life
Programmer	Principal MK-ULTRA handler and programmer
Acolyte	Assisted in Luciferian ritual ceremonial duties
Philosopher	Highly academic and intellectual
Conservator	Oversaw and protected cult trainees from injury
Iconoclast	Attacked established beliefs and institutions as a Marxist Communist ALP pioneer feminist
Physician	Cult herbalist, ritual surgeon, and counsellor
Mediator	Liaised between members of the cult hierarchy, CIA staff, and victims

The eight possible Primitive temperament combinations, and 12 ways for each combination to develop, results in 96 Reference Groups. Each Reference Group represents a combination of one of three Stress Response styles, with one of four patterns of Information Processing. This 3 x 4 x 8 factor arrangement allows for 4,096 personality combinations. Add to this the effect of the other PAS factors I have not mentioned here, and we can begin to fathom how the PAS comprehensively accounts for individual personality differences. Over 1.7 million different personality combinations may be calculated using the PAS. This figure supports my hypothesis that (a) the PAS is a prescription for multiple personality programming, and (b) the PAS accounts for the massive split-personality systems that 'poly-fragmented' victims and therapists have reported for decades.

CIA PROFILING

> Spying is attractive to loonies. Psychopaths, who are people who spend their lives making up stories, revel in the field.
> - Henry Murray, MK-ULTRA psychologist

It is important to understand the difference between the various CIA roles and responsibilities. CIA officers are those formally recruited and trained. CIA agents are the scumbags whom the officers blackmail, bribe, entice, threaten into being used. CIA assets are mind controlled assassins.

Several retired CIA employees wrote their memoires. Some detailed the psychometric testing they underwent during the recruitment process. Their testimonies reveal much about the application of the PAS, and the truth of CIA black operations.

Former CIA case officer Ralph McGehee[451] describes Gittinger's PAS as the 'most revealing test' he undertook. He described the ideal CIA case officer as the Externalized-Rigid-Adaptive (ERA) personality. ERA types possess the following characteristics:

- Magnetic, charming and captivating
- Make good first impressions
- Move easily in a variety of situations
- Appropriately express genuine or fake feelings
- Chameleon like (All things to all people)
- Can spot weaknesses in others and use these to their advantage
- React to a limited number of specific, well-defined stimuli
- Learn by rote
- Don't insist on perspective
- Psychologically insulated
- Have restricted awareness
- Self-centred and insensitive to others.

McGehee said the CIA rejected Case Officer candidates who have perspective, see subtleties, think before they act, and remain true to themselves despite outside social pressures.

McGehee himself scored highly (143) on the IQ testing component but noted this did not pose a problem. He said his application for the role of CIA case officer was almost rejected because the PAS identified him as Flexible. McGehee said his saving grace was his college football experience. The CIA recruited football players for paramilitary operations because they were 'not overly intellectual' They also recruited men with military backgrounds, or those who possessed some special talent.

[451] Ralph W. McGehee (1983). Deadly Deceits: My 25 Years in the CIA. Ocean Press.

In summary, the CIA prefer case officers to be externally controlled, left-brain sequential thinkers who: subvert their individuality for the team's benefit, blindly follow orders, can't join the dots to see the CIA's criminal objectives, won't question the CIA's motives, and don't care anyhow about the people the CIA use and abuse during their covert operations. The CIA exclude bright, lateral thinking, bilateral processors who might perceive the CIA are committing heinous crimes, and who possess the empathy and moral fortitude to object.

Former CIA operations officer Rueul Gerecht described case officers as 'bottom-feeders' who handle intelligence-collection and covert-action operations.[452] Such operations include the trafficking of drugs, arms and children, money laundering, and the financing of terrorist activities.

Case officers recruit and handle CIA agents using dirty methods like sexual blackmail, honey traps, and threats. Picture the CIA case officer as the pimp, and the agent as the reluctant prostitute. According to Gerecht, case officers 'search the strengths and weaknesses of character in the foreigners they want to recruit and run as agents; few things are off limits.'[453] The PAS is used to profile potential agents and to identify their key strengths and weaknesses for the CIA case officers to exploit. Thanks to Gittinger's training, CIA scouts determine a target's basic personality type just from observing whether they become withdrawn or garrulous when intoxicated with drugs or alcohol. This is precisely the type of behaviour case officers would observe in targets at recruitment parties such as occurred at pedophile Hugh Heffner's Playboy mansion.

Hugh Heffner, Jeffery Epstein, Jordan Belfort ('Wolf of Wall Street') are prime examples of CIA agents. Jimmy Savile was their UK equivalent. These men were ideally positioned to compromise politicians, Hollywood elite, royalty, and successful businessmen. Most people of influence are controlled with money, drugs, sex scandals, and pedophilia. The CIA also used prostitution and homosexuality as blackmail and honeypot tools back when they constituted criminal offences and were considered socially scandalous. At Heffner's Playboy Mansion, straight blackmail targets were lured with a promise of associating with scantily clad beautiful women and celebrities. Innocent targets were drugged and photographed with clearly underaged and / or male sex partners, and the staged photos were enough to create the leverage of control the CIA sought over the now-compromised targets.

Former CIA Officer John Kiriakou spoke at the No War 2017: War and the Environment conference held in Washington, DC on 22 September 2017. During this, Kiriakou confirmed the type of case officer the CIA recruits, and why:

> There is no ethics training at the CIA. Nothing. The problem with that (besides the obvious) is what a CIA psychiatrist once told me; he said the CIA actively seeks to hire people who have sociopathic tendencies.
> Not sociopaths, but people with sociopathic tendencies. Sociopaths have no conscience; and with no conscience you can easily pass a polygraph exam because you don't react to anything. But sociopaths are impossible to control. People who have sociopathic tendencies do have a conscience, but they're willing to operate in moral, legal, and ethical grey areas.

---

[453] Ibid.

The problem is, there's no real way to weed out the sociopaths. And if you can't weed out the sociopaths, you can't weed out the psychopaths. And the psychopaths, because they're psychopaths, rise to the leadership positions.

So, let's say that you are a CIA case officer and you're working overseas. And it can be anywhere. Let's say the Middle East. You're in Egypt. You're in a hotel room and you have recruited a member of a bonafide terrorist group, Al-Quaeda, Hezbollah, ISIS, whatever it is. And this guy has been fantastic. Everything that he's told you has been true. And you've used his information to actually disrupt future terrorist attacks. So, he's been vetted and he's really great. So, you're in this hotel room and you're meeting with him. And at the start of the meeting he says:

> 'Listen, before we meet, I wanna tell you, I've given you everything, I've told you everything that's been true, you've saved American lives, now you're gonna do something for me. You're gonna go out and you're gonna get me a prostitute right now or I'm never cooperating with you again…'

The answer is, 'Sure.' I mean, you know, he's a scumbag of course, but your job is to deal with scumbags, and you would be expected to go out and get him the prostitute.

What if he asks for a child prostitute?

Absolutely not, under any circumstances…

But that's not the CIA talking. (That's John Kiriakou talking.) Because there's no rule. Your job as a CIA case officer is to break the laws of the country you're serving; that's your job. Your job is to commit espionage, which in most countries is a death penalty crime. Your job is to convince people to commit treason for you, because they like you so much, or they like the money that you're giving them so much. So, because it's the nature of your job to break the law, there are no rules that are written for you to carry out that job.

Now the problem there is that most CIA case officers would procure the child prostitute. And even if they felt funny about it, they would be told by headquarters, 'You have a job to do. This is a bonafide source here. Go do your job.'

That's the problem, or the nature of the problem, of ethics in intelligence operations: there are no ethics in intelligence operations… You either enter the CIA with your own set of moral values, or you don't. And if you don't, you're probably going to do very well there.'

The Programming Matrix

MK was a CIA gig, not DoD.
- Lt. Col. Michael Aquino

'I need you to hold my hand lightly. Don't pull on it. You need to leave me under longer, so I have time to explore and see what I need to see. You need to ask me specific questions like what people are wearing, so I notice the detail. You can do this. You have good skills.'

'I know,' my therapist nodded, as if to convince herself. 'I do have good skills.'

'Why are you so hesitant?' I asked.

'I don't know.'

'It's just fear. . . fear of the unknown. Trust me. I know what I'm doing. Once I'm down there, I'll be able to guide myself to where I need to go.'

She waved her fingers back and forth across my face.

'Do it lots,' I urged, as I felt my dissociated form sink into the chair. 'I need to go very deep.' I closed my eyes and waited for the inevitable to appear. . .

'It's dark,' I note. 'I'm in a corridor. I'm the Gatekeeper. I'm walking towards a door. It's locked. Tell me to unlock the door.'

'Unlock the door.'

'I open the door. It's an office. The walls are lined with brown, wooden panels. There's filing cabinets and furniture. On my left is a chair, like a dentist chair. There's a little blonde girl in the chair. She's three. Kidman is leaning over her. He's sticking sharp things up her nails. He's putting a tube down her nose and pouring white liquid down it…'

I clasped my therapist's hand as she waved her fingers across my face. I ignored her growing ambivalence, closed my eyes, and relaxed into the leather couch. Inside my mind, my consciousness had boarded an invisible Tardis and was travelling to the targeted location. Then - darkness. I was the Gatekeeper again. I was living the scene from the Matrix movie where Neo stood in a white corridor in front of a row of doors, each door leading to a different scene of the matrix virtual reality program. Except, this room was black and confined. It was shaped like a pentagon. I was surrounded by five locked doors. I opened each door, stood back, and spoke:

'It's safe to come out now.'

A sea of blue-eyed blonde faces slowly emerged from the doorways, ranging in age from three to sixteen years. Some were clothed in frilled baby-doll dresses, ritual robes, martial arts gi, jodhpurs, or painting smocks. Some were naked, bloody, bleeding and bruised. They all appeared bewildered and frightened. Light emanating from the five doorways flooded the room which was now packed with a crowd. Suddenly every single person in that room realised what had happened, looked up at Heaven - and screamed in unity:

'GIVE ME JUSTICE!!'

I buried my head into the back of the couch, raised my hand to heaven – and screamed from some unfathomable place. I screamed until my consciousness left my body and I was oscillating between two dimensions. In the other dimension, I stood in the middle of a long, rectangular-shaped room that resembled an ornate palace ballroom. Tall elders dressed in stately robes and gold crowns were seated along the two lengths of the celestial hall. The elders stared at the floor in solemn, reverent, pensive silence as I pleaded my case against Antony Kidman. My cries in this world translated into language in that place which the elders understood. I saw the elders deliberate over Antony Kidman's judgement. I marvelled at the reverence they had for a single human life, even that of a most vile evil human being. I saw them reluctantly pass judgement over Kidman and condemn him to Death and Hell.

I lay on a couch throughout this integration process, with my husband seated next to me. My husband thought he should support me by holding my outstretched hand – something I resented because every time he touched me, I was sucked back into this world. Each time Jon released my hand I could see the celestial hall.

Afterwards, I explained everything I saw. Both my therapist and husband thought I was simply emotional and imagining things. I further detailed the experience to my therapist in an email that night. To everyone's astonishment, the following day the Australian media reported that Antony Kidman was dead. He had died under questionable circumstances in Singapore immediately after I witnessed his celestial judgement.

DID DEFINED

What is commonly called a 'multiple personality' or an 'alter' is no more than a brain area sectioned off by trauma-induced amnesia walls. A group of behaviours and memories are separated from the victim's general brain functioning, so that different 'personalities' within an individual possess independent neural circuitry.

All mind control programming is a variation on a theme, determined in part by the victim's own imagination and their predicted roles within both the CIA and the Luciferian Cult. Hence, while Alice and Oz are universally employed programming scripts, their application differs for each child victim. Think of this process as a computer game in which the player can partly determine its design. For this reason, the recovering victim can subvert the program, just like Neo did in The Matrix, since everything is occurring within the recovering victim's mind in the absence of the original programmer. This recovery process is easier when the original programmers are dead, and the bond with them severed.

The more creative and visual the child victim, the more highly skilled the programmer, the more sophisticated the technology used – the more seamless the result. Since my programming was perpetrated by the fathers of modern mind control at prime CIA and military intelligence facilities, and because I possessed maximum creative and visual-spatial capacity, my shifting between alters was relatively undetectable.

These factors may also account for why I have always been co-conscious during memory retrieval. Most victims of mind control are seriously dissociative during therapy work, or even daily existence, they have little to no recall for what just occurred during a therapy session. Not only have I always been completely aware of what is occurring during therapy - I have consistently planned and directed my own recovery process. I also believe my programmers intentionally designed me to be co-conscious for recall, since dissociative recall by individual alters would have facilitated instant download of information – and my brain stored too many military secrets for that. Co-conscious recall is difficult because the victim battles her own will to remember.

Memories for trauma are clearer than memories for everyday events. Flashback memories of trauma are extremely lucid and detailed, like a movie. Further, high IQ young children develop asynchronously compared to normal kids, and have superior, often photographic memories. My earliest memory is of being a toddler and waking up crying. To distract me, my father took me onto the balcony, pointed up at the dark sky and said, 'Look!

Look at the stars!' That is a clear memory. So, yes, it is highly plausible for me to recall memories of being tortured and abused at the same age.

My programming was laid at multiple Australian and US facilities during the early 1970s to mid-1980s, including the following:

- University of Sydney
- Chelmsford Hospital, Sydney
- US Embassy, Canberra
- Fairbairn Airforce base, Canberra
- Holsworthy Army Base
- ANSTO Nuclear Reactor, Lucas Heights
- Milson Island, Hawkesbury River
- Pine Gap
- Disneyland, CA
- Dulce, New Mexico
- Area 51, Nevada

A team of USA and Australian programmers, handlers, and military trainers were employed, with large teams of assistants at their disposal who worked around the clock during intense programming times:

- Josef Mengele
- Louis Jolyon West
- Michael Aquino
- John Gittinger
- Wendy-Louise Walker
- Antony Kidman
- Leonas Petrauskas
- Patricia Ann Conlon
- Victor Chang

JOSEF MENGELE in AUSTRALIA

In 1991, I drew a close-up of Kim Beazley Snr accurate enough for my mother to instantly recognise him. My art therapy was drawn directly from implicit memory. When I drew a scene or person, sometimes it was like the individual was posing for a portrait. Sometimes I knew what I was drawing, other times the image unfolded before my eyes as if I were observing someone else moving the pencil.

Josef Mengele was about 61 years old and fat like a toad when I met him at the US Embassy in Canberra. During therapy I had a flashback to his face which I drew. His serpent eyes were framed by full brows and dark circles beneath. His dark hair was slicked back.

A photo of an obese man seated at a table, said to be Josef Mengele, appeared on the internet. This photo better resembles my memory of Mengele than the person the CIA confirmed lived and died in South America. I believe that was a lookalike, promoted by the CIA as part of a Psychological Operation to distract the public from the international role Mengele played in Project MK-ULTRA, and to discredit witness testimonies like mine.

Helen Holowczak took me to Canberra for a week when I was three years old. A week provides ample time to lay base MK-ULTRA programming. During this trip, Helen took photos of me dressed like Alice In Wonderland in a pale blue frock, red shoes and white cardigan, indicating mild weather. My mother said I returned home from that Canberra excursion with a completely different core personality. I uncharacteristically ordered my mother out of my bedroom and told her I could clean it up myself. I further shocked her by dressing up and performing a promiscuous dance.

Josef Mengele laid my Core programming during that Canberra trip, in a lab beneath the US Embassy. The embassy was staffed with CIA pedophiles and hosted VIP pedophile orgies, like nearby Parliament House. A tunnel system existed beneath the US Embassy in which some of my abuse occurred. I was left naked and alone in a cage built into the side of a dark underground cave. I lost track of time but might have been left there for three days. During that time, Jesus appeared to me and taught me the first verse of the children's song Jesus Loves Me. Thirty years ago, I regressed under severe trauma and sang this to my mother exactly like a three-year-old would.

Young Josef Mengele.

Josef Mengele?

MENGELE aka WHITE RABBIT aka ANGEL
61 yo Josef Mengele drawn from implicit memory.

Lt. Col. Michael Aquino – Josef Mengele's secret son?

I was subsequently tortured in a lab by Mengele and his assistants. At the start of this process, Mengele promised I could attend a fete being held on the US Embassy grounds for the diplomats' children and their special guests. Mengele used the fete as a conditioning tool.

Since I was special now, I too was invited – so long as I cooperated. The fete featured red-and-white striped tents decorated with candy canes and lollipops, a fairy-floss maker, miniature pony rides, and a petting zoo. But I didn't enjoy any of it. I felt sick. I felt confused. I felt frightened. I felt as though there was something very wrong inside my head. They broke my head! I lamented. They broke my head! All I cared for was my mother.

'Mengele is the White rabbit!' The epiphany struck me during therapy.

Mengele and his team wore white lab coats. One assistant was a red-headed female medical doctor. Another was Antony Kidman. I heard the tune Puppet on a String as Mengele and his assistants circled me. They shoved me from side to side. They spun me around and around until I was dizzy...

Love is just like a merry-go-round, with all the fun of the fair…

They placed me in the centre of a blanket, gathered around its sides, and tossed me in the air until I was terrified…

One day I'm feeling down on the ground, then I'm up in the air…

Mengele electrocuted my left arm until it went limp. He picked it up and dropped it onto the table, and asked, 'Look, your arm is broken. Do you want your arm back?' I nodded and cried. I could have it back only if I did as he said. And if I were good, I would get a pony ride. He tied a string to my arm and manipulated it like a marionette.

In or out, there is never a doubt, just who's pulling the strings…

They strapped me to an examination bed and electrocuted me. They placed a giant electrode on my back plus zapped me all over with multiple cattle prods, even inside my vagina. My back arched violently as I screamed for my mother. They did this until I went quiet and still.

Fritz Springmeier and his wife Cisco Wheeler wrote that the initial MK-ULTRA splits were created in a sensory deprivation chamber using LSD, and that the brain naturally dissociates into five components. That is consistent with my experience. John C. Lilly designed the original MK-ULTRA sensory deprivation chamber. Using the chamber in combination with LSD, Lilly conducted research into penetrating the veil separating our dimension from others. His research was the premise for the 1980 film Altered States. Lilly achieved his goal.

My base MK-ULTRA programming was laid inter-dimensionally using a sensory deprivation tank, LSD, and musical tones. Once I was limp from electrocution, Mengele and his team led me to a room containing a black sensory deprivation tank filled with salty water. They fed me a sweet drink, put something on my head, and lay me inside the floatation tank. Either the electrocution or drugs, or both, prevented me from thrashing about. Voices and music were played on an audio system as I drifted into an LSD trip.

Suddenly, I fell through the floor and landed on a hard surface. I was in a black room surrounded by doors. A familiar voice told me I must leave a part of me behind if I wanted to escape the dark. I did as he instructed. This part became the Gatekeeper.

The Gatekeeper was eventually split into five personalities. I have a vague memory of watching each enter one of the five doors and the door closing behind them. At some stage the doors were assigned what became the standard colours: green, blue, red, white, yellow. These colours were associated with types of alters, tasks or programming as follows:

The green door housed splits that were intellectual, academic, artistic, or musical. The blue door contained soldier, Delta, assassin, psychic training including projects gateway and stargate, and military, horse riding, and martial arts costumes. The red door contained countless ritual abuse experiences and occult training. The white door housed hypnosis-induced roles and tasks, including Candy Girl. The yellow door contained drug programmes, knowledge, and drug-influenced assignments.

A dummy room was installed between this pentagon room and the doctors waiting room, to disguise and protect the Core programming. Consequently, entering the door marked 'Dr Kidman' led me to a dark pentagon room with the standard five coloured doors; however, each of the five doors housed a trap. For instance, the red door contained an inescapable maze. A series of knocks on each door opened access to the real pentagon room below. One knock on the green door, followed by two knocks on the blue, followed by three knocks on the red, four on the white, and five on the yellow, opened a chute in the floor which dropped into Mengele's Core program.

Green: Intellect
Blue: Soldier
Red: Ritual
White: Hypnosis
Yellow: Drugs

The Core

The core is the victim's soul or consciousness, the part that leaves our body when we die or astral project. It was my Core that effortlessly transitioned into the celestial dimension. According to Fritz Springmeier and Cisco Wheeler, the Luciferian Order conducted research into what might occur were the victim's Core exposed to the dissociated parts. The result was instant integration. That is precisely what happened to me the moment I consciously saw the Core programming structure and met the alters hidden behind the five pentagon doors.

I believe the doctor waiting room was a disguise to hide the location of the Core split, because recalling Mengele's initial split was the point at which I achieved major spontaneous integration. I did not recall the doctor waiting room until years after my Core integration.

MILSON ISLAND: BIOWEAPONS & GENETIC ENGINEERING LAB

Australia's 'Lunatic Asylum' Horrors: 'It was one Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest in Reality'

Megan Palin, news.com.au, 6 Dec 2015.

> IF the walls of the abandoned 'lunatic asylum' on Peat Island could speak they would tell of the horrors experienced by patients, including children, on a site plagued by death and despair. The eight-hectare island on the Hawkesbury River was established as an asylum for 'inebriates' in 1911 before it was reopened as a psychiatric hospital, just 50kms north of Sydney…
> Both media and government departments reported torture, multiple drownings and unexplained deaths of men and little boys. According to reports, 'Ward 4', was where the most brutal treatment took place. The mysterious deaths of child patients repeatedly made headlines over the years of the facility's operation. Among them was the case of Robert Bruce Walker, 8, who was found floating off the island after he had been 'put in the pen', a caged compartment, as punishment, in 1940… In May 1950, 11-year-old Robert Blackwood was found asphyxiated in a linen bin made of iron after only five months at the institution… Many other unexplained deaths also took place on the island. At least 300 patients who died at the institution were buried in unmarked graves at the nearby Brooklyn Cemetery.
> Reports of sexual and physical abuse, torture and a lack of thorough investigations also spilt out from under the closed doors of the site. One of the most shocking incidents made headlines across the country in 1983. 'A retarded youth's 10 fingernails were torn out while under temporary care in a psychiatric institution,' the Daily Telegraph reported in 1983. 'In a 39 page report the NSW deputy ombudsman Darryl Gunter, criticised the Health Department for not investigating the matter adequately. Mr Gunter's report stems from complaints by the youth's parents. They left their 17-year-old son at the Peat Island Hospital on the Hawkesbury River on January 10, 1981. When they collected him on January 28, he was without his fingernails. The parents rejected reports from doctors that a 12-year-old patient was responsible.'

Peat Island and its close neighbour, Milson Island, served as MK-ULTRA / MK-NAOMI research facilities. Milson Island is larger and accessible by boat only. Both Peat and Milson featured hospitals. The Milson Island hospital was used by the military during WWII, and it contained a system of hidden doors for nurses to hide from violent patients. Milson Island psychiatric residents were transferred to the Peat Island hospital in the early 1970s, just after MK-ULTRA was exposed in the USA and moved to Australia.

Milson Island was a Federal Government facility. That is how the Australian and US military accessed it. Milson Island is Australia's equivalent of the USA's Plum Island. It started off as a military quarantine facility and merged into a MK-NAOMI bioweapons research facility. Lyme disease and Swine disease were being researched on Milson Island in 1961 to '62. When Lyme turned up in 1982, the Americans assumed there had been a leak on Milson Island.

Sydney University took over Lyme testing from 1988 to '94, tested 4,372 people and did not get one positive in that testing – because they used the ELISA test. Everyone tests negative to the ELISA test. It tests the immune system which is not stimulated by Lyme Disease. ELISA is the only test allowed under Medicare.

Great secrecy surrounds Milson Island which was recently demolished and developed into a recreational camp for children. Milton Island hospital is the only remaining building, and it looks like the hospital I was taken to where I again encountered Josef Mengele.

Leonas Petrauskas drove me to the Hawkesbury when I was about seven or eight years old. He collected me from Nanna's Engadine house in a blue sedan. It must have been summer because I wore a yellow gingham strap dress. I stuck my face out the open window and let the wind tangle my white hair.

'You can call me Leo,' he said. That was the trigger to engage in casual conversation. Usually I called him by his pseudonym Mark. 'Do you like monkeys?' he continued.

'Yes.'

'Would you like to see some monkeys?'

'Yes. Are we going to the zoo?'

'Sort of,' Leo promised. He got a sadistic kick out of surprising me with horror. We were visiting 'monkey island' where they did gene splicing, crossing monkey with human DNA. It was a real-life Island of Doctor Moreau that left me terrified of the Planet of the Apes films. The crossing of apes and humans is a scientifically possibility:

> GOING APE Inside the bizarre world of human-chimp hybrids known as HUMANZEES – as a renowned scientist claims one was born in a Florida lab before being killed by panicked doctors
> Mark Hodge, The Sun, 2 August 2019.
> A HUMAN-chimpanzee hybrid was born in a Florida lab 100 years ago before being killed by panicked doctors, claims a renowned scientist.
> Evolutionary psychologist Gordon Gallup coined the term "humanzee" which refers to a human-chimp crossbreed - a scientifically possible hybridisation which was attempted throughout the 20th century. Details of the top-secret experiments come as Chinese scientists claim to have created a human-monkey hybrid in an incredible embryo-splicing trial that could eventually allow medics to harvest an endless supply of human organs for lifesaving transplants.

> Gallup, who developed the famous mirror "self-recognition" test which proved primates could acknowledge their own reflection, claims his former university professor told him that a humanzee baby was born at a research facility where he used to work.
> Speaking to The Sun Online, he said: "One of the most interesting cases involved an attempt which was made back in the 1920s in what was the first primate research centre established in the US in Orange Park, Florida. They inseminated a female chimpanzee with human semen from an undisclosed donor and claimed not only that pregnancy occurred, but the pregnancy went full term and resulted in a live birth. Gallup said the professor worked at Yerkes before the research centre moved to Emory University in Atlanta, Georgia in 1930. He added: "He told me the rumour was true. And he was a credible scientist in his own right."
> The most infamous humanzee project was conducted by Russian biologist Ilya Ivanov - also in the 1920s - who tried and failed to create a Soviet super-soldier using human sperm and female chimps. Another reported case happened in Maoist China in 1967 where a female primate became pregnant with a human-hybrid only to die from neglect after the lab's scientists were forced to abandon the project following the outbreak of the Cultural Revolution…

I remember sitting on overgrown lawn outside a long hospital building on Milson Island, picking yellow flowers while Anne Conlon warned me that I was about to experience something 'unpleasant' and I should go to my 'happy place.' I was about to be raped by a giant ape chimera. I realised Ronnie usually turned up if they were about to kill me – or worse. She would always be there when I awoke from the nightmare, to comfort and counsel me.

Anne Conlon walked me inside the Milson Island hospital where a uniformed nurse sat behind a reception desk. The nurse walked me down the corridor and into a laboratory on the left. The lab contained caged monkeys and an office out the back. It was the lab in my induction scenario, behind the door marked 'White Rabbit.' My next memory is of being tied faceup to a medical table and raped by the obese greasy Doctor of Death who stood panting at the end of the bed. He made the giant Planet of the Apes monster rape me too.

‘PAPPA’ KIDMAN

Kidman tampered with Mengele’s Core program when I was six years old, to overlay and link his Order of the Easter Star pendant as an induction trigger. This occurred at the Chelmsford MK-ULTRA facility in Sydney. Leonas Petrauskas drove me to meet Harry Bailey who fed me an LSD-laced jelly cup containing red candy frogs. The subsequent trip had me swimming through a green sea of jelly and giant frogs. Bailey administered ECT while Kidman inserted the trigger. I recall being alarmed and thinking: Why are you messing with Comrade Gittinger’s work? Kidman’s tampering caused my programming to malfunction and eventually break down.

HOW TO

I revisited Kidman’s Order of the Eastern Star pentagon room four years later, when my memories of Mengele and the US Embassy were triggered and began pushing through to my conscious mind in the form of emotional, visual and physical flashbacks. I peered behind the pentagon doors again, and discovered that each room contained a door in the far-right rear wall, which led to another room which contained another door, etc. Every room once housed a personality, so each room represented a walled-off cluster of independent neural circuitry. When I drew the five front rooms, I realised they had been trashed. The white door contained a pile of abandoned objects (used as triggers or inductions), instructions, and other paraphernalia. It felt like engaging in automatic writing as I accessed the brain area that held the memory. I drew a fob watch, an hourglass, Kidman’s Eastern Star pentagram pendant, and a Candy Girl dress.

The room behind the yellow door contained upturned furniture, and a pile of smashed glass chemistry vials, pill bottles, and books. I drew musical notes to represent melodies that cued programmed drug effects that replaced having to consume the drugs. Graffiti on the left wall read, ‘FUCK YOU ALL!’ The red room contained a smashed altar, books of spells, cauldrons, swastikas, pentagrams and hexagrams, knives and bones. The blue room contained a treadmill, a stargate, an overturned electric chair, guns, and a Delta training manual. The green room contained a pile of books on Tesla physics, history, Shakespeare, math and philosophy. The alters trashed the five front rooms before exiting.

P I could access the celestial judgement hall because my Core programming was laid inter-dimensionally. That is precisely what John C. Lilly discovered, how to lay inter-dimensional programming. Rupturing the Core programming instantly propelled me to the celestial hall dimension. Remembering the Core split instantly integrated most of my splits. Consequently, when I visited my programming subsequent to this core integration, I rarely encountered any alters but instead found racks and racks of their costumes. The programming sets and props were intact, but the characters were gone.

ROGRAMMING STRUCTURE

Induction

The main hypnosis induction script that accessed my programming began with me diving into the sea and swimming like Aqua Man to an underwater structure with a glass dome on top. I entered the glass dome which closed after me; the water drained. I passed through a set of sealed doors and reached the top of a metal spiral staircase. While descending the clockwise staircase, I spun in an anti-clockwise direction. Then I passed through another sealed door, descended a straight staircase, and entered a final sealed door.

Behind the final door lay a 1960s doctor surgery waiting room. The long thin room featured brown panel walls and doors. As I entered the room, an elevator stood to my left.

To the right of that a secretary sat typing at a desk which featured an old dial phone. To the right of the desk was a surgery door labelled Dr Kidman. Continuing right, the next door had a White Rabbit image instead of a name; it represented Joseph Mengele whose name was forbidden. The third door, at the opposite far end of the hall, was labelled Dr West (aka Dr White). Two doors on the right wall were labelled Dr Gittinger and Dr Aquino.

MAXWELL SMART INDUCTION

The elevator located behind the Secretary were connected to an induction based on the Maxwell Smart television program, specifically the opening scene where the TV character 'Agent Maxwell Smart' walks through a series of doors. The Secretary was a Gatekeeper plus a programmed assassin. She was connected to an office building the CIA occupied near the corner of George and Bathurst Streets, adjacent to Sydney Town Hall.

GITTINGER: THE 'CANDY MAN'

Recalling Gittinger's torture and programming was the second major step toward achieving integration. I was five years old when I was ordered to strip naked before a panel in the loungeroom of Leonas Petrauskas' Engadine home. Peter Holowczak walked me to the location which was a short distance from his McAlister Avenue house. A group of cult and MK-ULTRA perpetrators including Petrauskas, Gittinger, Kidman and Conlon inspected my flawless white form and asked me many questions about all sorts of things, especially my interests.

'Do you like to be special?' Gittinger asked.

I nodded shyly.

'We'll make you special…'

The men laughed knowingly.

Afterwards, I commenced a battery of tests at the underground CIA facility at Holsworthy Army Base. Gittinger administered EEGs, intelligence tests and personality questionnaires. He supervised tests of physical endurance, including running on a tread mill while wearing medical equipment. The team were so pleased with my performance, they rewarded Nanna Holowczak with whitegoods. From then on, Nanna called me her 'Special girl' and 'Purple girl' and she dressed me in purple outfits. 'What is your favourite colour?' nanna constantly asked me. 'Purple,' I responded. (Purple was not my favourite colour. My favourite colour is produced by mixing equal parts of phthalo blue and phthalo green. It is the colour I innately gravitated toward during the eye test I did in preparation for tinted glasses.)

Peter Holowczak did not share Nanna's enthusiasm. 'I'll give you the special,' he hissed. Pop dragged me to where he worked cleaning the trains and hoisted me in an agonising inside-out position from the carriage ceiling. 'Who's the special now!' he spat.

Gittinger laid his base programming at the underground CIA facilities located at Holsworthy Army Barracks and ANSTO Lucas heights. He led me to a laboratory equipped with a hospital bed, EEG machine, video screens, and ECT and all the necessary gear for torturing and splitting a child. There Gittinger and his trainees, including Kidman, subjected me to an application of John Bowlby's Attachment research: [454]

[454] John Bowlby (1977). The Making and Breaking of Affectional Bonds: I. Aetiology and Psychopathology in the Light of Attachment Theory. *British Journal of Psychiatry, 130:*3, 201-210.

a) Attachment behaviour is directed towards one or a few specific individuals, usually in clear order of preference.
b) An attachment endures, usually for a large part of the life cycle. Although during adolescence early attachments may attenuate and become supplemented by new ones, and in some cases are replaced by them, early attachments are not easily abandoned, and they commonly persist.
c) Many of the most intense emotions arise during the formation, maintenance, disruption, and renewal of attachment relationships. The formation of a bond is described as falling in love, maintaining a bond as loving someone, and losing a partner as grieving over someone. Similarly, threat of loss arouses anxiety and actual loss gives rise to sorrow; while each of these situations is likely to arouse anger…
d) The more experience of social interaction an infant has with a person the more likely he is to become attached to that person… Attachment behaviour remains readily activated until near the end of the third year; in healthy development it becomes gradually less readily activated thereafter.
e) An attachment can develop despite repeated punishment from the attachment figure.
f) Attachment behaviour is mediated by behavioural systems which are activated by certain conditions (e.g., strangeness, hunger, fatigue, fright) and terminated by other conditions (e.g., cuddling).

Gittinger wiped my natural attachment to my mother by electrocuting me with multiple cattle prods. When I screamed for my mother he said, ‘Mummy doesn’t love you. I love you.’ Gittinger then applied B.F. Skinner’s conditioning research. He paired my cries for my mother with vomiting, poured Ipecac down my throat and said, ‘Mummy let us do this to you.’ Gittinger then implemented Seligman’s ‘Inescapable Shock’ research. He connected me to an EEC and electrocuting me with multiple cattle prods. He overwhelmed my senses by simultaneously showing me virtual reality scenes of death, violence and destruction, and delivering painful screeching sounds via a metal probe inserted into my right ear. He continued this until I dissociated from the pain and exhibited the desired brainwave pattern.

> ECT, the invention of Dr Ugo Cerletti, another Spanish fascist, was often applied to various parts of the body, Wolf says, ‘usually the physical places that do not readily show or in tissue that heals quickly.’ High technology was combined with drugs, hypnosis and torture to create alter personalities. Years before Silicon Valley introduced virtual-reality computerware, children by the score told therapists they’d been forced to wear goggles that flashed 3-D images of horror and death.[455]

REATTACHMENT TO ‘THE FAMILY’

After destroying my attachment to my birth mother and biological family, my brain was washed and ready for programming. Gittinger reattached me to the cult family (often referred to as ‘The Family’). He attached me principally himself and to my substitute mother (the Grande Dame) via love bombing and sexual assault. Patricia Anne Conlon secured the new attachment bond by breast feeding me like a baby and sexually assaulting me at the same time. Gittinger sexually assaulted me during his Candy Land programming.

CANDY-LAND PROGRAMMING

Having stripped me of my sense of self, Gittinger filled the void with a sense of ego and pride. He did this using Candy Land programming. I walked beside Gittinger through a Candy Land, along a path lined with giant candy canes that led to a distant castle.

Inside the Candy Land castle, Gittinger sat me on a throne inscribed with the title Princess. He placed a crown on my head and a serpent sceptre in my hand. He repeated: 'You are the chosen one. You are royalty. You are special. You are of the ruling class. . .' This was Princess and Pride programming, designed to instil pride in my high IQ, Luciferian bloodline, and Grande Dame candidacy.

I used to think Gittinger used a life-size Candy Land set with props, but today as mainstream technology catches up with the top-secret military technology that I experienced decades ago, I conclude it is plausible the military had the technology to produce a virtual reality Candy Land. I saw 'Disney,' 'Candy Land' and '©' printed on the side of a video cassette tape or box.

One of my therapy drawings from the Candy Land castle featured a treasure chest containing a key. This was a secret back door to my programming that Gittinger installed. He kept this secret from Antony Kidman whom he rightly described as a 'fucking idiot' following a critical incident when I was 10 years old. My mother spent most of my tenth year in hospital due to lead poisoning. I consequently spent all holidays and weekends at my evil grandparents' Engadine home. I have relatively little memory of that time due to the cult's unprecedented access to me.

I was repeatedly electrocuted and raped in a laboratory beneath ANSTO Lucas Heights at different developmental milestones. Gittinger used me to demonstrate the technique to a team of trainees dressed in white lab coats, including Antony Kidman. First, I was electrocuted until I became still. 'The subject is now ripe for programming,' Gittinger explained, as he lifted and dropped my limp arm. Then everyone left the room while Kidman stood at the bottom of the hospital bed and raped me. He flapped my limp legs together like butterfly wings as he penetrated me. Following this, Gittinger electrically stimulated specific parts of my brain to create implicit behavioural responses.

MAINTENANCE

I have detailed memories of revisiting the ANSTO lab and experiencing a variation of this process every two years, at ages six, eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. This was to compensate for developmental changes in my body and brain. The session at age 14 ended with security prying my fingers from Kidman's crimson throat after he clumsily electrocuted my head.

John Gittinger's programming was maintained outside the HOLSWORHTY AND ANSTO labs via regular rape and trauma perpetrated by the Holowczaks and their Luciferian cult associates. The murders seemed endless. I was forced to watch the ritual murder of a group of children in bushland near the dog breeder's home on Old Illawarra Road. The dog breeder and his close associate Ivan Milat tossed the kids off a cliff in broad daylight. Overcome with grief and fed up with the nightmare year that had been, I spontaneously decided to follow them. I ran and went to leap over the cliff edge – only to be stopped at the last minute by Milat who risked his life to tackle and catch me. If I had died, all in attendance would have paid with their lives – and they knew it. Like Gittinger said, I was a 'National Asset.'

Gittinger was urgently called to Australia to repair my programming. His dilemma was, the person who attempted suicide was not an alter that could easily be deactivated or disposed of. It was the real me and my memories from that year. Gittinger had to perform psychological surgery and reassign that part of me as his Gatekeeper. His remedy consisted of flatlining my heart to bring it under submission. Gittinger explained, the heart, being connected to the visual and emotional side of the brain, has its own intrinsic nervous system that processes information independently of the brain. Consequently, although my handlers had control of my mind, my heart overruled my brain and made the decision to escape.

Incidentally, it is the heart's intrinsic nervous system which allows a transplant to work. In a heart transplant recipient, the nerve connections between the donor heart and the recipient's brain do not immediately connect. Meanwhile, the transplanted heart relies solely on its intact nervous system. The heart's intrinsic nervous system explains why a transplant recipient sometimes adopts the donor's memories and personality characteristics. In fact, murders have been solved based on the recipient's access to the donor's final memories housed in the donated organ.

After prepping me with torture, Gittinger reassigned 10-year-old Intellectual Alice as Gatekeeper over his Wonderland foyer. Alice in Wonderland programming looks exactly like the Disney movie. I deduce that for most victims, Wonderland programming is triggered via sodomy – which is what the rabbit hole represents, the anal passage that the white rabbit (programmer) penetrates. However, Gittinger secretly changed my trigger to vaginal rape, to prevent 'fucking idiot' Antony Kidman accessing and ruining his programming, which he eventually did.

PROGRAMMING SCRIPTS

To mind control children, perpetrators use ancient programming scripts passed down through Luciferian dynasties. Scripts employed traditional nursery rhymes and fairy tales, modern cartoons based on ancient mythologies, and children's books series specifically written for programming purposes. Programming scripts included: The Lion, Witch and the Wardrobe, Peter Pan, Lord of the Rings, Alice in Wonderland, and The Wonderful Wizard of Oz. Note the word 'wonder' in the last two titles. Oz is Osiris, and mind control was developed in Ancient Egypt.

The authors of children's classics were linked to pedophilia scandals and/or occultic societies that practise pedophilia as a religious rite. Reformed Luciferian John Todd Collins outed close friends J.R.R. Tolkien and C.S. Lewis as HOGD members. J.R.R Tolkien's son 'Father John Tolkien' was outed in the UK press as a pedophile Catholic priest with a penchant for altar boys. C.S. Lewis' Narnia series features a character named Tumnus who is based on the pedophile god Pan. James M. Barrie's Peter Pan similarly paid homage to Pan. Barrie's concept of Lost Boys refers to boys' whose emotional development was stunted at the age at which they were first child raped and inherited the pedophile spirit of Pan. Alice in Wonderland series author Lewis Carroll was a pedophile who took naked photos of his obsession, a young child named Alice. Peter Pan author J.M. Barrie groomed the parents of three Davies boys and forged their will to gain custody of their sons after they were orphaned. Michael Davies suicided with his male lover at 21. Barrie had written him at age eight years, 'Dear Michael, I am very fond of you, but don't tell anyone.' Peter Davies burnt all of Barrie's letters, and said, 'It was all too much' before he also suicided. C.S. Lewis similarly took custody of young orphaned boys after marrying their dying mother. Underground pedophile networks were named Peter Pan Club and Lewis Carroll Collectors Guild because their founders recognised James M. Barrie (Peter Pan) and Lewis Carroll (Alice in Wonderland) as pedophiles.

The Narnia series charmed the Protestant churches during the 1980s. My protests of 'It's satanic' were met with 'Aslan represented Christ and the characters and story reflected the Bible.' The Holy Ghost does not inspire Christians to glorify Baphomet in fairy tales aimed at kids. My youth group leader (our pastor's daughter) justified screening occult-themed movies by arguing 'It's okay so long as good triumphed over evil at the end of the tale.' Dumb sheep similarly justify the Harry Potter books because 'at least it encourages kids to read.' The Harry Potter series contain the same Witchcraft 101 content taught to coven children. These books and films are programming and witchcraft teaching tools.

Ancient Egyptian and Babylonian programming scripts starring pagan gods were represented within Western culture as popular cartoon characters, for the expressed purpose of programming a new generation of child victims. Pagan gods Dagon and Diana were rebranded Aqua Man and Wonder Woman. These comic characters originally engaged in Luciferian themes of torture, kidnapping, sexual violence and sadism. The people who developed these characters were connected to MK-ULTRA. For instance, the Isis-worshipping character Wonder Woman was created by William Marston, MK-ULTRA psychologist and lie detector inventor. Marston hired Lauretta Bender as a consultant to develop the Wonder Woman comic. Lauretta Bender was a MK-ULTRA paediatric neuropsychiatrist who routinely electrocuted children, including toddlers, at Bellevue Hospital in New York. Marston described Wonder Woman as '…psychological propaganda for the new type of woman who, I believe, should rule the world.' Thus, Wonder Woman captures the Jezebel spirit of de-masculinisation of society, as promoted by the Luciferian Order.

Other cartoon characters incorporated in my programming were: Casper, Batman, Cat Woman, Top Cat, and Felix The Cat. I recall a Cat Woman programming sequence that was chanted at me in the Holsworthy lab. The program had nine levels based on a cat's nine lives. When Kidman reached level six, he shoved his face in mine, and stared into my left eye (which directly accessed my right brain hemisphere) and chanted: 'Number six! Number six! What do we find at number six? Number six has lots of tricks! There are six spirits at number six.'

Disneyland, Disneyworld and Walt Disney films were specifically developed for programming MK-ULTRA child victims like me. Famous pioneer psychologists and psychiatrists hired out Disneyland of a night to practice programming children. I was subjected to Candy Land and Disney Princess programming that focussed on the Evil Queen and Wicked stepmother characters. Disney movies used to create and reinforce my programming included: Fantasia, Peter Pan (with a focus on Tinkerbell), Sleeping Beauty, Cinderella, Snow White and Bambi. Popular TV shows were also used, especially Bewitched and I Dream of Jeanie.

Certain songs were used to reinforce or trigger my MK-ULTRA programming. I would often find myself stuck in a thought loop with one of these, to stop me recalling my abuse.

The most memorable songs used on me were: Queen of Hearts, The Candy Man, Wild Thing, Candy Girl, and Funky Town.

The MK-ULTRA scientists abused me within a Luciferian ritual context. Scientists in white lab coats played a synthesiser chanting the names of these interdimensional entities, to insert them into and cement my programming. In a research lab beneath Holsworthy Army Base, technicians programmed the words, ‘Know this spirit, know this spirit, know this spirit…’ into a synthesiser and repeatedly played this up and down the keyboard at various speeds, while Kidman and others breathed ‘spirits’ into my mouth.

ALICE IN WONDERLAND PROGRAM

To access Gittinger’s Wonderland program during therapy, I visualized falling backwards through the rabbit hole with 10-year-old Intellectual Alice in hand. I knew the landing on the floor below to be hard and painful, so I said to Alice, ‘The landing doesn’t have to be hard. We can make it soft because we are in our head and can control what happens in our head.’ We landed on a black-and-white chequered foyer floor. The foyer walls were green (the colour of intelligence, favoured by high IQ people). A crystal chandelier hung from the ceiling. Five coloured doors were placed in the usual sequence from left to right – green, blue, red, white, yellow. Gatekeeper Intellectual Alice was able to unlock the doors, but not cross the threshold of any except the green one. (I deduce Alice was granted access to the green door to stop her going crazy with boredom.) The green door accessed the Wonderland set and characters people are familiar with, including the Mad Hatter’s tea party and the Queen of Hearts’ castle grounds. Various sections of the set were used for programmes. For example, the chessboard scene provided opportunity for storing programming using chess language (D4, A2, etc).

I asked Intellectual Alice to locate the key to the green door, which she did. Alice unlocked the door and I accompanied her to the fully laden Tea Party. I used my counselling skills to communicate with Alice and win her trust. I asked her, 'Have you ever actually sampled this spread?' She shook her head. I suggested, 'Why don't you pour yourself a cup of tea? You like watching the way the tea comes out of the spout and into the cup. I know that because I am you.' We watched the black tea arc into the cup. Then I said, 'Why don't you eat something? Go on, try a doughnut. I know they're your favourite.

WIZARD OF OZ PROGRAM

Together, the three Alice splits opened the white door to reveal a cloud of hypnosis from which 12-year-old Dorothy of Oz emerged. Dorothy held a fourth key in her right pocket. All four keys were designed according to playing cards (Hearts, Clubs, Spades, Diamonds). Dorothy opened the final, yellow door containing the yellow brick road to Emerald City. The alters locked arms and followed the yellow brick road. Obstacles avoided on the way included: poison apples, winged monkeys, Tin Man (a trigger for memories of axe murders), Cowardly Lion (fear program), Scarecrow (burnt alive program), and the Poppy Fields (sleep program).

Upon reaching the Emerald City gate, I tapped a sequence and sang a five-note tune to gain entry. Once inside, the spiral turned green. We boarded the carriage pulled by the horse that changes colours. We avoided the Wizard (another trap) plus the Ruby Slippers – the final trap. Once we reached the end of the spiral, Glinda appeared in a floating bubble. Glinda is the final programmed alter. Glinda is the Grande Dame programming attached to the Disney Princess programming laid in Candy Land and Disneyland. Gittinger laid Princess plus Alice in Wonderland programming at Disneyland in Anaheim, California when I was six years old. That is why I was dressed like Alice, drugged, placed on the It's a Small World boat ride, and spun on the Mad Hatter Tea Party Ride until I vomited.

DISNEY PRINCESS PROGRAM

The route from Emerald City to Glinda's Crystal Castle functioned like a computer game. It passed through the woods containing cottages occupied by twins Snow White and Rose Red plus the Seven Dwarfs, and by Rapunzel's tower. Glinda's castle contained five doors of Gem programming laid out in the usual colour arrangement: green (emerald), blue (sapphire), red (ruby), white (diamond), and yellow (topaz). Behind the emerald door, Sleeping Beauty (Briar Rose) lay asleep on a bed. At her feet sat the wardrobe from The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe. A key stored in drawers beside Briar Rose's bed unlocked the wardrobe. The wardrobe led to a Snow Queen seated in a unicorn-pulled sleigh that transported me to an Ice Castle. A spell had to be broken to melt the castle, making this route a trap.

Returning to Glinda's Crystal Castle, behind the sapphire door Snow White lay on a bed in a coma. A small chest at the foot of her bed contained a key to a second wardrobe which led to Maleficent's castle.

Behind the ruby door was an imprisoned Cinderella. The diamond room was filled with shimmering light that morphed into the Swan Princess Ophelia. Finally, the topaz room contained a throne room occupied by the Grande Dame 'spirit' that Patricia Ann Conlon passed to me at her dying breath.

Alice, Cinderella, Sleeping Beauty, Dorothy, and Snow White all wear pale royal blue, consistent with their Princess-in-training status. The purpose of Princess programming is to teach the victim that the end justifies the means. To explain, every Disney Princess character loses her mother, father, or both. Each endures hardship of some kind, usually at the hands of a wicked stepmother (including the original Sleeping Beauty who suffered an evil mother-in-law). But at the end of their ordeal, each princess marries a prince and becomes Queen. In a cult context, this story line translates into the journey a Grande Dame candidate undertakes. The child victim's attachment to their birth parents is severed and they are reattached to a Grande Dame and a new 'Family' who put the victim through a gruelling, torturous training regime. The moral to the story is, the trauma and torture the Princess suffers during her trials or training, all becomes worth it the end when she is rewarded by being crowned Queen (Grande Dame). The Queen in turn becomes the next perpetrator, indicated by her dark alters or roles including the Evil Queen and Maleficent.

'DR WHITE'

During my trip to the USA at age six, I was also transported to Dulce, home of the Frankenstein lab purpose built for Col. Louis Jolyon West, Lt. Col. Michael Aquino, and John W. Gittinger, who were trained directly by Operation Paperclip's most clandestine recruit, Joseph Mengele. Dulce lab technicians strapped my naked body to a chair, plastered large electrode pads to my back and limbs, and attached a Medusa-mass of EEG electrodes to my head. My brain splits were colour-labelled: Green, Blue, Red, White, Yellow. For each colour, Dr West was codenamed 'Dr White.' He held a large sheet of coloured card in my face while a computer repeated the name of the colour: 'Red. Red. Red. Red. Red…' I was simultaneously electrocuted until my senses were overwhelmed and I surrendered my will to the insertion of their instruction. They stopped torturing me once they recognised the desired brainwave pattern on their monitors.

Beyond Dr West's surgery door lay a foyer with five coloured doors in the standard order. The green room contained shelves of books. I identified this as Gittinger's Test Library. One of the books had the title, Nuances of Psychological Testing. The blue room contained an armoury of guns, grenades, knives and other weapons. It also contained maps and racks of soldier costumes. The red room contained an occult library including books of spells, an altar, a skull, candles, and a voodoo doll. The white room contained racks of Disney costumes. The yellow room contained a pharmacy with books, drugs and chemistry lab equipment. This pocket of neural circuitry contained memories of drugs' mechanism of action, so that drug effects could be produced without physically administering the drug.

THE 'WHITE RABBIT'

Josef Mengele and Leonas Petrauskas accessed the surgery door marked with a white rabbit. Behind the door lay a foyer chiselled out of an underground cavern. Five coloured doors were arranged in an arc, lit dramatically from above. A large rug on the floor was decorated in an enormous Rothschild family crest, featuring a shield flanked by two animals on their hindquarters. Behind the green door lay an Auschwitz library. The blue room was full of shooting energy and a stargate, and it contained the Gateway Process. The red room was a ritual storeroom containing shelves of Luciferian books and potions. The white room contained racks of priestess robes. The yellow room contained a laboratory with research equipment, cages, and a creepy, mute lab assistant. It was Mengele's Milson Island lab.

DR MICHAEL AQUINO

The creepy lab assistant was the only one who could open the door to Dr Aquino’s foyer that was decorated with a Freemasonic chequered floor and five coloured doors. Aquino’s green room contained the Cabalistic Tree of Knowledge, a giant evergreen tree with an owl seated in its fork. The blue room contained Delta training, including a Montague chair and references to astral projection. The red room contained military rituals, Dagon worship, and a Dulce underground stone altar decorated with an encircled triangle (representing Alchemy). The white room contained a pink sacred lotus flower and the word Om. The yellow room contained a yellow brick road and a bubble which served as transport to Glinda’s crystal castle. This was a backdoor to Oz which linked to Gittinger’s yellow door.

DR AQUINO'S DOORS

MILITARY ORDER OF DAGON

The Ancient Roman Legions worshipped their mascot god. So do our modern Western military forces. Dagon is the god worshipped by the top US and Australian military brass. age 12 of Lt. Col. Michael Aquino’s original CV (dated 1 September 2018) boasts of his membership in the ‘Esoteric Order of Dagon.’ Subsequent publications of Aquino’s CV deleted this revelation, following my going public about this. GRANDE DAME

The waiting room elevator provided Patricia Ann Conlon access to Gittinger's Grande Dame and Princess programming. The elevator accessed five floors of the Grande Dame training system. The blue floor contained leadership training including systems analysis and strategy, psychology and behaviour prediction, delegation, manipulation and motivation of subordinates' personality types, and maintaining distance from subordinates. The green floor pertained to training in academics and the arts, including classical music, history, English, theatre, painting and philosophy. The white floor related to temple prostitute instruction in the art of sex and seduction. The yellow floor pertained to teaching and supervision of cult children, such as lessons in occult knowledge delivered via nursery rhymes. For instance, Mary Had a Little Lamb represents the Christian child lured into the cult without parental awareness. The red floor was devoted to training in sorcery, ritual murder, and clandestine assassination via the 'kiss of death.'

The elevator accessed castles belonging to the Grande Dame's two faces, Glinda and Maleficent. Maleficent's thorny castle grounds were occupied by the Dragon she transformed into. The Disney dragon form of Maleficent represents the Ouroboros. The Ouroboros symbolises the life cycle of the Grande Dame's eternal spirit. This is achieved by the Grande Dame willingly submitting to ritual sacrifice at the hands of her successor who draws in her final breath. This tradition is considered a form of rebirth, the circle of life, and a means of attaining immortality, which is related to the Ouroboros symbolising alchemy. Immortality via transhumanism is the true goal of alchemy. This process of the serpent eating its own tail is reflected in the standard Disney Princess or traditional fairy tale ending where the abusive queen-stepmother-witch, dies at the hands of the princess who assumes her kingdom, role, identity, persona - alters.

This alternate castle entrance represents the dark, ruthless nature the Grande Dame is forced to adopt. The castle contains the Grande Dame's throne room and a robe room with costumes displayed on mannequins. The costumes consisted of high-collared purple robes worn by Disney's Maleficent and the Evil Queen. Each wore a gold crown and a ruby. Another costume was a red and purple ritual robe and a headpiece that was a cross between a top hat and a fez. Each outfit represents a personality or role. The Disney outfits mimicked those worn in real-life by Grande Dames officiating over rituals and ceremonies. Purple indicates cult royalty and symbolises rarity. The ruby symbolises sexuality and exclusivity.

'ACCESS DENIED'

In 2015, an Australian Military MK-ULTRA military programmer attempted to access my system. David and Raelene Thompson established 'Watchman Ministries' in 1992, at the height of SRA victim disclosure. The couple were recommended to me by Pastor Doug Riggs in the USA.

Although I sensed something was wrong, I pursued the excursion because my DID therapist manipulated my emotions. 'Do it for me,' she implored. So, I warned my therapist I might not see her again and departed for Adelaide in mid-May. I knew the trip was going to be interesting when I exited the plane and sensed two massive invisible beings escorting me through Adelaide airport. I was collected by David and his obese wife, who drove me to my accommodation in the remote Adelaide hills.

The Pastor and his wife spent the first few days grooming me. Every night they took me to dine in a nice restaurant. Each morning they drove me to a remote function centre for 'deprogramming' sessions that ran all day. They spent the first three days mapping the system of alters and identifying their names and roles. David asked me questions that I answered honestly and freely, while the wife took copious notes.

It happened on the fourth morning. David asked me to list a group of related personality fractures. I closed my eyes and effortlessly rattled off the information.

'Hang on!' he puzzled. 'Do you remember everything that was just said?'

'Yes,' I shrugged.

David Thompson's façade of kindness and gentleness suddenly gave way to contempt and rage. He swept his hand across pages of notes and diagrams. 'I've never seen this!'

Me: 'Seen what?'

'This!' He planted his finger on the notes, 'This combination!'

'What? Military mind control and ritual abuse? Why is it so hard to believe? Holsworthy was next door to Engadine BoysTown. It's physically possible.'

He shook his head. 'I've never seen any of this before!'

'Well,' I offered, 'I was programmed directly by the world's best. I was chosen from a pool of chosen ones. I was selected because of my unique combination of visual-spatial processing capacity, psychic ability, creativity, physical endurance, and Aryan features. Perhaps you haven't encountered this before because I was the only one?'

Fury washed over his face. It was quiz time. 'What's the difference between Monarch and MK-ULTRA?' he demanded.

'Oh, I don't care,' I shrugged. It's all the same crap.'

'No, it's not! See, you don't know anything!'

I squared my shoulders - and focussed.

He asked: 'Do you enjoy sex with your husband?'

'Oh, I'm completely normal in that department.'

'If you were a genuine victim,' he spat, 'you would be sexually dysfunctional!'

I stared at him. No comment. Filthy prick. You're a programmer. You're trying to shock me into dissociating. . . Stay calm. Don't react. We're getting out of here.

David threw his hands in the air like a bad actor. 'I'm cancelling this session! I'm going to have do some research, call some people. We'll resume tomorrow.'

'Sure,' I lied.

The couple drove me back to my secluded accommodation. There I phoned my mother who started praying. Then I phoned Jon, told him what had just occurred, and asked him whether he would not mind if I spent my remaining days in Adelaide sightseeing. I convinced my husband and Adelaide hosts that I was going to visit the Barossa. Jon called back and told me a hire car was booked and waiting for me at the airport. Then I phoned my therapist's office and left a message: 'He's a military programmer. He's after the access codes. I'm at risk and making a run for it.' I was on a train when my therapist returned my call. 'I'll be alright,' I assured her. 'I've been in this situation many times. My training has kicked in and I know what to do.' I navigated my way to the airport and boarded the first flight home.

David Thompson worked for the Australian military in an Adelaide division relevant to MK-ULTRA. The irony is, I ultimately used him to map and process my programming, which helped me integrate, since conscious awareness ruptures the programming.

All anyone had to do was ask me the right questions and I would spew forth copious amounts of information. The first time I recall something is the most lucid it will ever be, then the detail fades over time. I had trouble recalling the entire system that I internally mapped in Adelaide over three days. I jotted down the following information a week or so later.

As you can see from the overview of my programming matrix, its complexity makes it near impossible for victims and therapists to identify and break. I must reiterate, the programming used on me does not serve as a blueprint for unravelling another individual’s programming. No two cases are the same. The perpetrators may use the same scripts, movies, songs and stories, yet two children will do different things with the same base material. The more a child’s imagination contributes to the program, the better the program sticks. Once when Gittinger wanted to create layering in a program, he asked me to think of something layered. I chose a layered cake. He then asked me to describe the cake in detail. I described layers of sponge, cream and fruit. Because Gittinger employed an image that my brain naturally gravitated toward, it provided a better chance of the program sticking. Each program also varies according to the perpetrator’s expertise level. Programming is an art which a skilled genius like Gittinger can get right, or a ‘fucking idiot’ like Antony Kidman can get very wrong.

MK-DELTA Child Soldier

No details of the MK-DELTA program have escaped the closely guarded files of the CIA.
- The Mind Manipulators

Our jeep stopped at the end of the ridge and we all filed out the back. We were high on a clearing above the fighting which was happening somewhere in the messy jungle below. The sound of gunfire was audible as I surveyed the site. Soldiers busied themselves behind me while our commander crouched over a black box and spoke through the mouthpiece. He gave me the all clear.

'Make sure everyone gathers in close,' I warned him. He nodded and disappeared behind me while I prepared myself. I sat on the ground, folded my legs into the lotus position, and rested my upturned palms on my knees so the tips of my thumbs and middle fingers gently touched. I closed my eyes, visualised a pink lotus flower, and began to hum:

Ommm. . .

I breathed in deeply and exhaled slowly, in . . . and out. . . until my head was at standing height and yet my feet did not touch the ground. Every breath drew in the surrounding Chi energy which I directed to my solar plexus. My entire being began to vibrate as I ran my mind over every detail of the imaginary lotus blossom, traced the nuances of each petal. . . A ringing noise intensified inside my head until suddenly - a massive white flash penetrated my eyelids.

It was done.

I tuned back into my external environment and noticed it was dead still: No more gunfire, no more bird songs. I opened my eyes and looked around. The soldiers cautiously lifted their heads behind me, and gasped as we all stood up to survey the damage. The surrounding tall trees were flattened like pick-up-sticks, their tips all pointing away from us. We were in the epicentre of what looked like the aftermath of a bomb blast.

Scheflin and Opton wrote The Mind Manipulators based on the FOI release of 10,000 pages of CIA MK-ULTRA related documents. While the documents contained no clues as to the purpose of MK-DELTA, they indicated: (a) MK-ULTRA was the research and development phase of a much larger program, and (b) MK-DELTA was the field application of MK-ULTRA and involved clandestine operations.[456]

DULCE

A memorandum (dated January 14, 1953) titled Interrogation Techniques states:

> If the services of Major Louis J. West, USAF (MC), a trained hypnotist, can be obtained and another man [DELETED] well-grounded in conventional psychological interrogation and polygraph techniques, and the services of Lt. Colonel [DELETED], a well-balanced interrogation research centre could be established in an especially selected location.

[456] Alan Scheflin & Edward Opton (1979). The Mind Manipulators. Paddington Press.

I am certain one of the names deleted from this document was Lt. Colonel Michael Aquino. The other omitted name could have been John C. Lilly, but I believe it was John W. Gittinger. In any case, all three collaborated with Major Louis West at the 'interrogation research centre' described in the proposal for MK-ULTRA Subproject 43:

> …a unique laboratory must be organized and constructed. This laboratory will include a special chamber, in which all psychologically significant aspects of the environment can be controlled. This chamber will contain, among other things, a broad-spectrum polygraph for simultaneous recordings of a variety of psychophysiological reactions of the individual being studied. In this setting the various hypnotic, pharmacologic, and sensory-environmental variables will be manipulated in a controlled fashion and quantitative continuous recording of the reactions of the experimental subjects will be made.

A Frankenstein laboratory fitting this description was built within an underground military base located near Dulce, New Mexico. 'Interrogation' means 'torture.' The documents refer to using drugs, hypnosis, sensory deprivation, and torture on children.

MAJOR WEST

In 1955, Major Louis Jolyon West was subcontracted for MK-ULTRA Subproject 43 experiments which examined the effects of Drugs, Hypnosis and Sensory Deprivation on behaviour. His Subproject 43 proposal was titled 'Psychophysiological Studies of Hypnosis and Suggestibility' with its accompanying document 'Studies of Dissociative States.' Here is a summary of the most pertinent points made in West's Subproject 43 proposal:

1. Several drugs are known to speed up hypnotic induction and deepen hypnotic trance states.
2. Experiments show sensory isolation increases suggestibility and the production of trance-like states.
3. Hypnosis can exert control over the autonomic nervous system.
4. Hypnosis can protect individuals from psycho-physiological reactions to poisons.
5. Using hypnosis plus autonomic drugs were used to identify exactly how and to what degree psychophysiological reactions occur to specific types of stress.
6. Repetition of verbal signals produces physiological and behavioural change.
7. Hypnotic suggestion can produce changes in physiological function including blood pressure.
8. Experimental hypnosis can produce every known dissociative condition including fugues, amnesias, sleep walking, multiple personalities, hypnagogic hallucinations, sleep paralysis, trance states, and Tourette's.

The main aim of Subproject 43 was to:

- Use hypnotic suggestion to produce physiological changes in skin conductance, skin temperature, and wound healing;
- Use mind altering drugs including LSD to produce and maintain dissociative states.

An earlier declassified letter (dated 11 May 1953) signed by Sidney Gottlieb documented a series of related hypnosis experiments that focussed on the following:

1. Hypnotically induced anxieties,
2. Hypnotically increasing ability to learn and recall complex written matter,
3. Polygraph responses under hypnosis,
4. Hypnotically increasing ability to observe and recall complex arrangements of physical objects,
5. Relationship of personality to susceptibility to hypnosis,
6. Recall of hypnotically acquired information by very specific signals.

JOHN C. LILLY

The Dulce laboratory contained an upright version of John C. Lilly's sensory deprivation tank. During the 1950s, the CIA funded John Lilly's development of the sensory deprivation tank and his research into brain waves and Altered States of Consciousness. In his book, Programming and Meta-programming in the Human Biocomputer[457] Lilly blatantly explained how children are programmed using LSD, his sensory deprivation tank, and implicit learning via classical and operant conditioning. Lilly compared the human mind to a bio-computer installed with programs that can be erased, modified and created. We are all born with 'programs' like eating, sleeping, and feeling pain ingrained in our genetic code. 'Meta-programming' is our ability to learn new information and develop ideas beyond these innate programs. Here are some quotes from Lilly's book:

> I am interested in the processes of finding meta-programs (and methods and substances) which control, change, and create the basic meta-programs of the human computer.
> Certain chemical substances have programmatic and/or meta-programmatic effects, i.e., they change the operations of the computer, some at the programmatic level and some at the meta-programmatic level. Some substances which are of interest at the meta-programmatic level are those that allow reprogramming, and those that allow and facilitate modifications of the meta-programs. [Lilly used LSD for reprogramming, and ethyl alcohol for weakening meta-programming].
> Programs are carried out by excitation-inhibition-disinhibition patterns among and in neural masses and sheets (for example, the reticular activating-inhibiting system, the reward-punishment systems, the cerebral cortical conditionable systems).
> Special aspects and areas of stored programs can be visualized, felt, heard, lived through or replayed, or otherwise elicited from memory storage by means of special techniques and special instructions.

Aldous Huxley said of his 'friend' John C. Lilly:

[457] John C. Lilly (1972). Programming and Metaprogramming in the Human Biocomputer: Theory and Experiments. Julian Press.

> Lilly has probably gone further than anyone else in creating a limited environment. He immerses himself in a bath at the temperature of 96, has himself fastened into a harness so that he can hardly move, breathes only through a snorkel so that even his face is covered with water and there is no differentiation of sensation on any part of his body, and within three or four hours he is having tremendous visionary experiences.

THE GATEWAY PROCESS

A military document (dated 9 June 1983) from Lt. Colonel Wayne M. McDonnell was addressed to the Commander of US Army Operational Group at Fort Meade. The document, Analysis and Assessment of Gateway Process, described the physics behind interdimensional astral projection that the military researched and weaponised. Lt. Colonel McDonnell's report began with the following recommendation:

> The physics of altered human consciousness deals with some conceptualizations that are not easily grasped…in the context of ordinary 'left brain' linear thinking. So… parts of this paper will require not only logic but a touch of right brain intuitive insight.

To understand the science used to scaffold black ops like the Gateway Process, ditch the left-brain slop they served us at school. Let us start with a short quiz:

1. When a human heart stops, paramedics start it again using:
    a. Electricity
    b. Gravity
2. Neurons communicate via a process which is:
    a. Electro-chemical
    b. Gravo-chemical
3. Brain waves are measured with an:
    a. EEG
    b. GEG
4. Light, x-rays, microwaves, infrared radiation, and radio waves are all caused by:
    a. Alternating electrical charge
    b. Gravity
5. The Bible says God is:
    a. Light
    b. Gravity
6. The fundamental force in the universe is:
    a. Electricity
    b. Gravity

TESLA'S ELECTRIC UNIVERSE

Tesla is the suppressed genius behind JASON technology, not Newton or Einstein. Tesla described pedophile Einstein's Theory of relativity as:

> A mass of error and deceptive ideas violently opposed to the teachings of great men of science of the past and even to common sense. The theory wraps all the errors and fallacies and clothes them in magnificent mathematical garb which fascinates, dazzles and makes people blind to the underlying errors. The theory is like a beggar > clothed in purple whom ignorant people take for a king. Its exponents are very brilliant men, but they are meta-physicists rather than scientists.[458]

Proponents of Tesla's electric universe argue that theoretical physics is math - not science. Number manipulation alone proves nothing. Real physicists test and prove hypotheses via experimentation. Math ought to be reserved for use as a language to record and communicate experimental findings for others to replicate and build upon, not as a substitute for experimental findings.

Robert Otey argues that Newton's theory of gravity and the celestial mechanics is wrong. Newton based his concept that mass creatives gravity on his adjustment of Kepler's orbital equation. Newton fabricated a new element in his head called 'mass' and added it to Kepler's equation which was based on Kepler's observations of the solar system. When Kepler's equation and Newton's adjusted version of Kepler's equation are applied to the same motions, the sums all tally up the same. This means Newton's addition to Kepler's equation was unnecessary and did not prove the existence of 'mass.'

Otey explains, what Newton and Einstein called gravity is in fact a product of electricity. When an apple falls to the ground, this is not two masses being attracted to each other based on their mass. Instead, it is an example of electric current constantly seeking rest. The falling apple's electric vortex seeks rest in its nearest equipotential (i.e., the earth).
Consistent with this paradigm, Lt. Col. McDonnell's report on the Gateway Process states:

> Solid matter, in the strict construction of the term, simply does not exist. Rather, atomic structure is composed of oscillating energy grids surrounded by other oscillating energy grids which orbit at extraordinarily high speeds… The point to be made is that the entire human being, brain, consciousness and all is, like the universe which surrounds him…an extraordinary complex system of energy fields. The so-called states of matter are actually variances in the state of energy, and human consciousness is a function of the interaction of energy in the two opposite states (motion vs rest)...

The earth is enveloped by an electro-magnetic field, and the interaction between this and the electrical human body is the basis of the Gateway Process.

MUNROE INSTITUTE

During the 1950s, the CIA funded Robert Monroe's development of what is called the Gateway Experience or Hemispheric Synchronization. You might know it as Astral Projection. Newspapers and Army documents record that the US Army sent soldiers to Robert Monroe for training in the Gateway Process. I was told by a retired military consultant that 25 years ago standard British Army Military Police training incorporated Remote Viewing which enabled MPs to patrol UK bases located in foreign territories.

The Gateway Process is a method for inducing altered states of consciousness. It is the basis of remote viewing, astral projection, and the weaponization of psychic energy. John Gittinger's PAS was the main screening instrument for selection into the Gateway Process. The military selected creative and intelligent servicemen as Remote Viewing candidates. This is because high IQ creative people are natural bilateral processors with a strong right hemispheric and visual-spatial learning preference. They are also naturally intuitive with a hypersensitive nervous system that facilitates learning of the Gateway Process.

The Fort Meade document provides a detailed explanation of the physics behind the Gateway Process and its various applications. It begins with explaining how transcendental meditation, hypnosis, and biofeedback work, and how these three methods relate to hemispheric synchronization:

1. Hypnosis suppresses the left hemisphere. The left hemisphere screens, sorts and assigns meaning to stimuli before it lets information enter the right brain. Hypnosis disengages this left-brain function and allows direct access to the right hemisphere. The left hemisphere is disrupted via drowsiness, which is why the hypnotherapist initially suggests the client is ‘feeling sleepy.’ Then stimuli (including verbal suggestion) are immediately accepted and acted on by the right brain which processes and stores this information unconsciously. For example, suggesting the hypnotized person’s legs are numb generates an electrical reaction that induces a numb feeling. Or, suggesting the person has improved memory causes unused information storage capacity to become available. Hypnosis is used to speed up the early stages of the Gateway Process.

2. Transcendental Meditation ignores the left hemisphere. The person concentrates on drawing electromagnetic energy up the spinal cord. This creates acoustical standing waves in the cerebral ventricles which are then conducted to the grey matter in the cerebral cortex in the right hemisphere. These waves stimulate and eventually polarize the cortex.

Hemispheric Synchronization is a state of consciousness where the left and right brain hemispheres work together as a whole. The left hemisphere relaxes, which places the body in a virtual sleep state. The EEG patterns of both hemispheres are simultaneously equal in amplitude and frequency.

Binaural Beats are used to induce hemispheric synchronization. Binaural beats are two sounds of slightly different frequencies. Each sound is delivered to a different ear and the right brain perceives the difference between the two frequencies. Various sound waves may be played, depending on the desired brain wave activity to be produced.

Altered States of Consciousness (aka, Trance States) are dissociative states of mind produced by the following esoteric practises:[459]

- Kundalini Yoga
- Zen Buddhism
- Shamanism
- Hallucinogenic psychedelic drugs
- Medium
- Transcendental Meditation
- Hypnosis
- Biofeedback
- Ritual dancing
- Ritual drumbeats
- Binaural beats
- Sensory deprivation.

Altered states of consciousness change brain function. They disengage the body from external stimuli, activate internal focus, and reconfigure connectivity between brain areas. The above methods produce the following brain changes: [460]

- Shift hemispheric dominance from Left to the Right brain. Simultaneously activate the right hemisphere and deactivate the left.
- Increased Alpha wave activity associated with relaxed wakefulness, creativity and free association.
- Increased Right brain Theta wave activity, as associated with visual imagery and not drowsiness.
- Bilateral increase in Gamma activity.
- Synchronized EEG activity between Left and Right frontal lobes. (Deeper trance deactivates the frontal lobes.)
- Activation of the parasympathetic nervous system, opioid release and pain decrease.
- Increased Delta activity in Right hemisphere.
- Bilateral increase in low Beta activity.

GATEWAY METHOD

The Gateway Process combines Transcendental Meditation techniques and hypnotic suggestion with listening to binaural beats. Different sound frequencies were employed depending on the desired state of consciousness, be it sleep, mental concentration or intuition and creativity. Training was delivered in the following sequence:

1. Engage in visualisation.
2. Engage in mantra chanting to create resonance.
3. Listen to Binaural Beats.
4. Relax to white noise sounds to suppress the Left brain and stimulate the Right.
5. Manipulate electromagnetic energy travelling through the body. (This is also purported to protect against 'entities' encountered during astral projection.)

Astral Projection is practised by many pagan cultures and called by different names:

- Buddhist light body
- Dream body
- Egyptian Ka
- Energy body
- Hindu body of bliss
- Tantric subtle body
- Taoist diamond body.

Leaving the physical body for astral travel requires three conditions:

1. Induction of Left-brain quietness and deep physical relaxation via REM frequencies.
2. Synchronization of brain hemisphere wave patterns.
3. Stimulation of Right hemisphere to gain heightened alertness. This does interfere with hemispheric synchronisation, but not before the high frequency range necessary for attaining out-of-body status is established.

When both brain hemispheres electrically fire at the same rate, this creates a chain reaction which results in the body oscillating at 7.5 hertz – the same rate the electromagnetic field in our external environment resonates at. This state of vibratory harmony transforms the world and beyond into an extension of the human body. The person's consciousness or soul, which is normally restricted within the confines of the physical body's regular rate of oscillation, may then transcend the body and move freely outside the physical body, including inter-dimensionally. This process is what esoteric cults term becoming 'one with the universe.' The space-time continuum can be transcended according to the same principle, so that the individual can travel inter-dimensionally.

DUALITY OF THE MIND

We possess two minds: the explicit (conscious) and implicit (non-conscious). The implicit mind is a separate and distinct entity linked to the Right hemisphere; hence the Right brain side is targeted for stimulation and dominance during the Gateway Process. With training, the implicit mind may accomplish the following esoteric skills:

- Move objects without physical contact (aka telekinesis)
- Communicate and receive intelligence via intuition (telepathy or problem-solving)
- Gain information about distant places or people (clairvoyance or remote viewing)
- Read minds or control them from afar (telepathy)
- Predict the future (precognition).

The Gateway Process is behind the weaponization of occultic practises including levitation, walking through objects, and psychic warfare. It enables subjects to physically choke and throw opponents using their will, and to cause mass destruction to our physical surrounds. Lt. Col. McDonnell alludes to this in his description of 'Colour Breathing.'

ADVANCED GATEWAY TECHNIQUES

Problem-Solving is where the individual consults interdimensional entities to find solutions to certain problems such as math and physics questions. The answers may strike the individual during the following days. Incidentally, this is what the Nazis, Tesla and Einstein engaged in to find their advanced technologies. Some genius scientists receive their solutions during dreams via this method.

Remote Viewing involves the Right hemisphere's implicit processing capability coupled with the use of a 'magic wand' which the military document compares to the 'sceptre' carried by 'monarchs' for the same purpose of remote viewing. Remote Viewing is a minor skill featured in the Gateway Process, yet it has been used as a smoke screen for the Stargate Project's end goal.

Colour Breathing involves focussing on certain colours to activate the body's own energies. The body's electromagnetic field draws energy from the earth's electrostatic field for its own use. Visualisation of colours cue set frequencies and amplitudes because colour is the result of different light wavelengths. Focussing on blue, for example, instantly reduces swelling in the subject's body, while red has the opposite effect. Note that red is close to the magenta colour of the lotus flower. The military do not state such but the colour breathing tool was weaponized and used to create the bomb blast in Central America when I was 14 years old.

PROJECT LOOKING-GLASS

Focus 15 of the Gateway Process involves transcending our space-time continuum to time travel into the subject's past, while Focus 21 entails travelling into the future. I know from experience that Focus 15 formed the basis of Project Looking-Glass which involved peering into history. Looking-Glass was conducted at the Dulce lab in the mid-1980s. Alice Delta soldiers were hooked up to machinery including brain scans attached to computer monitors which displayed images transformed from the subjects' neural activity.

A rudimentary version of Looking-Glass technology was replicated in an experiment conducted 20 years ago at the University of California. Berkley scientists recorded signals from the brain of a cat while it watched movie scenes, then reconstructed the recorded signals into images which they displayed on a computer monitor. The recorded images were fuzzy but recognizable versions of the movie scenes the cat watched. Here is the university's 1999 news release regarding their cat experiment:[461]

> The team recorded signals from a total of 177 cells in the lateral geniculate nucleus - a part of the brain's thalamus that processes visual signals from the eye - as they played a digitized movie of indoor and outdoor scenes for the cat. Using simple mathematical filters, the researchers decoded the signals to generate a movie of what the cat actually saw. The reconstructed movie turned out to be amazingly faithful to the original.
> 'This work demonstrates that we have a reasonable understanding of how visual information is encoded in the thalamus,' said Yang Dan… Theoretically, if someone could record from many more cells - the lateral geniculate nucleus contains several hundred thousand nerve cells in all - it should be possible to reconstruct exactly what the animal sees, she said… Dan sees the demonstration… as a step toward a larger goal of understanding how the entire brain works.
> The current understanding of how cells in this part of the brain respond to visual stimuli has been pieced together over decades by many researchers working with animals.
> 'Our goal is to understand how information is processed in the brain, how it is encoded,' Dan said. 'By working backward, using the firing of nerve cells to reconstruct the original scene, we can see where we have been successful and where we haven't… We aren't the first to use this decoding technique, but instead of decoding the signals one at a time, we did it simultaneously to get a movie image of what the cat saw…'
> 'We have provided a first demonstration that spatiotemporal natural scenes can be reconstructed from the ensemble responses of visual neurons,' the researchers concluded in their journal article.[462]

The cat experiment was funded by the National Institutes of Health, the CIA cut-out that funded MK-ULTRA research.

STARGATE PROJECT

The Gateway Process was integral to the Stargate Project, a secret US Army unit officially established in 1978 at Fort Meade, Maryland, by the DIA (Defence Intelligence Agency) and SRI International. Formed in 1947, SRI (Stanford Research Institute) was a hub of MK-ULTRA activity. SRI separated from Stanford University in 1970 and changed its name to SRI International in 1977. The Director of Stanford University headed SRI International from 1979. Staffed by Scientologists, SRI International was the CIA cut-out behind the development and weaponization of Remote Viewing and the Gateway Process.

The US Army established the Stargate Project to investigate the potential for psychic phenomena in military and domestic intelligence applications. It was overseen by Lt. Frederick Holmes Atwater until 1987, under Maj. Gen. Albert Stubblebine. Lt. Atwater later became President of the Monroe Institute. In 2006, Lt. Atwater published a research report on the Monroe Institute website under the name 'Skip' Atwater. In this he explained: [463]

> STARLINES is a program designed for the exploration of the expansive physical universe and its connectedness with consciousness itself . . . STARLINES delves into the inner realms of Focus – 34 / 35 and beyond, establishing and strengthening the link between Earth and the Galactic Core, the central point of our Milky Way galaxy, a consciousness portal or Stargate and a means to enter the creative stream of the Great Emitter.

Lt. Atwater reported the results of a study involving 101 graduates of the STARLINES residential program conducted at the Monroe Institute. Participants achieved the Gateway Process consciousness level Focus 34/35 during which they travelled inter-dimensionally and located and explored stargates, neighbouring star systems, and communicated with interdimensional entities (aka, 'extra-terrestrial beings' or 'intelligences'). Participants reportedly visited our Solar System, Alpha Centauri, Sirius, Arcturus, the Pleiades, and the Orion Nebula. Following astral exploration of Alpha Centaur, multiple participants independently reported encountering 'intelligent' lifeforms resembling 'giant ants' which Lt. Atwater said he previously personally experienced (pp. 44-45).

STARGATES

In correspondence (dated 9 January 2018) from the DIA to the Committee on Armed Services Chair, John McCain, the DIA listed 38 secret research programs and 'products produced under the AATIP contract.' Point 8. on the 'List of Attachments' reads, 'Traversable Wormholes, Stargates, and Negative Energy, Dr Eric Davis, EarthTech International.' According to their website, EarthTech International is:

> A private-funded research organisation exploring novel ideas in basic and applied physics and engineering. . . Our research interests include theories of spacetime, gravity and cosmology; studies of the quantum vacuum; modifications of standard theories of electrodynamics; interstellar flight science; and the Search for Extra-Terrestrial Intelligence, specifically as these topics may apply to developing innovative space propulsion and sources of energy.

Wormholes are hyperspace tunnels through spacetime which connect remote regions in our universe, two different universes, different dimensions, or different times. A stargate is a special class of traversable wormhole with simple physics and flat entry and exit openings. Traversable wormholes allowed Delta soldiers to enter one side of the tunnel, travel through the throat, and exit the other side.

AIRFORCE SPACE COMMAND

Air Force Space Command became a major command of the US Air Force in September 1982. In December 2019 it was re-designated as the US Space Force. It is responsible for space warfare. Space warfare incorporates more than just satellites.

> The Space Force was created in part to support NASA as it looks to set up permanent facilities on the Moon... It's plausible that the Space Force and other military branches could establish a presence on the Moon that accompanies NASA's Artemis program, which aims to set up shop on the Moon as a jumping-off point for travel to Mars. Does that require a Space Force astronaut corps to mirror NASA's? Maybe someday…[464]

PEDOWOOD PROPAGANDA

The Stargate Project was 'officially' disbanded in 1995 and declared a waste of time and money. It was subsequently discredited via CIA-funded Hollywood films including Stargate (1994) and Men Who Stare at Goats (2004). The Stargate Project was in fact highly successful, otherwise the following would not have occurred: (a) The military and CIA continued pumping resources into Stargate for 17 years; (b) The US Army officer in charge of Stargate went on to become President of the Monroe Institute; and (c) All Stargate scientists continued work in the exact same field.

Consider the Stargate film a documentary. The film is loosely based on what was in fact achieved. The Stargate film 1994 release pre-empted the Stargate Project 1995 pretend-dissolution. That was no coincidence.

Earlier MK-ULTRA research scaffolded the Stargate Project, including Robert Monroe and John C. Lilly's work with inducing Altered States of Consciousness, and the investigations into psychic ability by physicists Russell Targ and Harold Puthoff. Their research culminated in teams of MK-DELTA soldiers physically visiting the locations identified by Gateway scouts. Delta teams initially trained in a three-story virtual reality holographic studio before entering the real Stargate and travelling through wormholes to a desert planet. Targ, Puthoff, Lilly, Atwater, and Stubblebine knowingly used and abused children who participated in the Stargate Project either as MK-ULTRA research subjects, or MK-DELTA child soldiers sent on field missions.

JASON PROJECT

DARPA and the JASON Group were formed in 1958 and 1960 respectively and were responsible for developing the science and technology that scaffolded the JASON Super Soldier Project and the related Looking-Glass and Stargate interstellar travel project. The elite JASON scientists operated out of Dulce in the USA and Pine Gap in Australia. DNA and reproductive materials collected from child victims at the CIA research facility at ANSTO in Lucas Heights were stored in liquid nitrogen flasks and transported to Pine Gap in central Australia for use in the JASON super soldier genetic engineering project.

In 1991, I was an inpatient in Gold Coast Hospital following an overdose. During my medical evaluation with a young female registrar, I pointed to the left side of my lower abdomen and asked, 'Can they extract eggs from here?' She drew a diagram and dismissed my concerns as impossible. Yet I remained unconvinced, plagued by the thought that eggs had been extracted from my left ovum. I later recalled the procedure which occurred at the ANSTO lab beneath Lucas Heights, and the excursion Gittinger took me on to witness the result at Pine Gap.

I began speaking of a 'JASON Project' and a 'JASON Group' in the early 1990s and was unable to find any reference to either, until Steve McMurray alerted me to a book on super soldiers edited by an ex-officer who works for the Australian Defence Academy.[465] Published after I went public, the book arbitrarily mentioned the following:

> Perhaps this will be most clearly evidenced by my discussion of DARPA's JASON project. The JASON project entails the collecting of DNA from military personnel in order to identify genome sequences that define 'ideal' soldiers. These genome sequences, the JASON project (2010, p.1) suggests, can be used in order to genetically produce super soldiers.

Here are some relevant extracts from the same book:

- The modern 'military human enhancement' effort draws on the fields of neuroscience, pharmacology, biology, genetics, nanotechnology and robotics…
- DARPA's current unclassified projects focus on…improving cognitive abilities such as memory, attention and awareness through…pharmacological means…enhancing senses such as smell, sight, taste and hearing…altering human metabolism to allow for increased endurance, rapid healing and the digestion of otherwise indigestible materials…
- The Beijing Genome Institute (BGI) located in Hong Kong sequenced '2,000 school children to look for markers that correlate with educational test scores.' (p.21)

[465] Jai Galliott & Mianna Lotz (Eds.) (2016) Super Soldiers: The Ethical, legal and Social Implications.

- The next step is to develop a two-way communication interface with the brain. Neuroscience is working hard in decoding the human brain in order to develop a seamless brain-machine interface (BMI) to enhance sensory and motor abilities. Again, scientific research in this area has been ongoing for decades and a BMI is in reach within years. There are obvious military applications of BMIs:

1. Cognitive augmentation, which alarms soldiers to threats they do not consciously perceive and to respond before a conscious intention is formed, which could cut down effective response times by as much as 7-8 seconds (Kasanoff 2012);*
2. Synthetic telepathy, which would allow soldiers to communicate silently amongst each other or with some distant command post (Piore 2011); and*
3. Thought-controlled weapons (for example fighter jets) that take advantage of the grater abilities of the human brain compared to computer vision while significantly reducing human response times to threats (Aym 2010).*

Indeed, the JASON Group have been working on the JASON Project 'for decades.' JASON technology is far more advanced than the public are informed. I witnessed the achievement of all of this plus the technology featured in the following news article:

> Army of the Future: Soldiers will be Able to Run at Olympic Speed and Won't Need Food or Sleep with Gene Technology
> DARPA is working on triggering genes that will make soldiers' bodies able to convert fat into energy more efficiently, so they are able to go days without eating while in the warzone… Helmets could enable soldiers to communicate telepathically… Washington's military scientists are also hoping to work out how to trigger cells to regrow limbs for soldiers maimed by enemy bombs and landmines… With well-documented cases already of young children regrowing fingers severed in accidents, DARPA is throwing significant sums at research to identify the physiological trigger and activate it in adults… One area of success has been in shutting off the trigger of sleep. A drug was tested on US Army helicopter pilots that enabled them to stay up longer than 40 hours, with their levels of concentration actually improving after nearly two days without rest. [466]

Harvard genetics professor and transhumanist, George Church, listed the genes his university research team are modifying to enhance human abilities.[467] Here is a list of genes Harvard are targeting for enhancement, relevant to what I witnessed the JASON Group achieve decades ago: [468]

EPAS1	High altitude tolerance
MTHFR	High altitude tolerance
CTNNB1	Radiation resistance
TERT	Low aging
GRIN2B	Enhanced learning and memory
CCR5	Enhanced learning
FOXP2	Learn stimulus-response associations faster
NLGN3	Enhanced spatial learning abilities

Jeffrey Epstein's Foundation donated $6.5 million to fund Harvard's genetics research. George Church continued meeting with Epstein following the child trafficker's 2014 conviction.

The six-fingered hands listed by Harvard geneticists are a Nephilim trait noted in the Bible. This suggests Harvard are synthesising human and fallen angel (alien) DNA – as the JASON Group have already done. The JASON Group long ago developed a series of super soldier models. The basic MK-DELTA model was a mind-controlled human whose abilities were enhanced through hypnosis, drugs, sensory deprivation, esoteric means, etc. Another model had abilities enhanced through bio-chipping, bionics, and genetic modification using animal DNA. A more advanced model was a cloned hybrid created with genetic materials taken from human, animal and 'alien' specimens. I was of the first model, and I witnessed the other two.

Genetically engineered JASON Super Soldiers comprised the CIA terror forces that decimated Syria and other nations during the CIA-orchestrated 'Arab Spring' fundamentalist uprising. In 2016, Syria's representative to the United Nations publicly stated twice that ISIS forces were armed with 'genetically modified super soldiers' produced and supplied by the USA. In 2015, 7-foot tall soldiers were filmed beheading 21 Christians in Egypt. These soldiers were described as Caucasian, not Arabic, in appearance. They resembled the super soldiers I saw developed under Pine Gap 45 years ago.

The West are not the only ones developing super soldiers. In 2018, Vladimir Putin publicly warned the West that Russia were in the process of developing super soldiers which are 'worse than nuclear bombs.'

RADIOISOTOPES: MK-ULTRA, DELTA & NAOMI

I felt fine when I was falling asleep at 10pm. I awoke at 1am writhing in pain. The ringing in my ears was deafening, and I felt a sudden urge to vomit. 'Help me!' I moaned, 'They're radiating me!' I couldn't escape the escalating nausea and ran > outside to vomit. This happened twice. On the second round I threw up bitter bile. I prayed to God to make it stop. It felt like I was dying…

Two days later, during therapy, I realised I had experienced another flashback. For some reason, I was injected with radioisotopes at age 6 years. I can't recall why, as I don't think anyone told me. Usually Gittinger would explain what he was doing and why he was doing it as he did it. But I doubt this was the case when they were injecting me. I have a faint image of staff in white lab coats. That's all. I also recall the words 'isotopes' being uttered. I have always associated the term 'PET scan' with this experience but can't tell you why.

People commonly assume my abusers used the 20-story underground ANSTO nuclear reactor facility at Lucas Heights due to its high security. No, they used a nuclear reactor site because of the nuclear reactor. Lucas heights nuclear reactor (HIFAR) operated from 1958 to 2007. The reactor was used to create a wide variety of radioisotopes. Radioisotopes were made from materials bombarded by neutrons in the reactor. CIA-ASIO scientists used the radioisotopes for various purposes relevant to MK-ULTRA, MK-DELTA, MK-NAOMI, and the JASON Project. Here is a list of possible uses of radioisotopes, suggested by my medical doctor friend:

Potential options for using radioisotopes with DELTA soldiers

1. Tracking. Radioisotopes can be used for tracking purposes, possibly from satellites/drones/reconnaissance aircraft. Microchipping is inferior because it is vulnerable to being disabled with electro-magnetism. Rare radioisotopes can be created with a desired half-life (of decades if needs be). These isotopes can be injected into soldiers, allowing a small team to be simultaneously tracked.
2. Discoveries in unique physiology. Radioisotopes can be paired with other molecules (e.g., glucose) in PET, fMRI and CT scanners, to track in real time which parts of the body (brain, thyroid, adrenal, etc) are up-taking (utilizing) the material. This could be used to determine what specific parts of the brain are active, and to what degree, to determine neurological function when compared to other individuals of known ability level. The brain primarily runs on glucose; therefore, attaching a radioisotope to a glucose molecule and injecting this into the body prior to a scan would allow scientists to see where glucose utilization is occurring specifically. If the utilization is occurring in the cortical region known as the homunculus, then there could potentially be some information gained about dexterity of the associated regions, especially if the uptake was simultaneously observed in the cerebellum (brain structure at the posterior base of the brain that coordinates movement). There seems to be an almost limitless number of possibilities in determining different aspects of brain function when using this modality.
3. Power generation. With the advent of nanotechnology, it might be possible to inject Nano nuclear generators that utilize radioisotopes for fuel to supplement power for super soldiers that would exceed human production limitations. That's a stretch, but…

Radiation in Genetic Engineering & Virus Development

I visited my real paternal grandfather in Poland in 1990. While there I noticed the apples growing in my grandfather's communal garden were deformed, coated in large lumps. When I asked what was wrong with them, Jadek replied, 'Ah, Chernobyl.' Later I was watching Polish news on a black and white TV set with the family. A news story featured a rabbit with bird wings. 'What's that?!' I exclaimed. 'Ah, Chernobyl,' the family responded, unaffected.

My experiences in Poland bothered me. They made me ponder this fact: Radiation can alter the DNA code within any cell. I think this is a major clue to what the CSIRO, which was based at the Lucas heights nuclear reactor, were using radioisotopes for. ANSTO now have cyclotrons as well as reactors, enabling them to develop a wider range of nuclear materials for scientific research purposes. Remember, the CSIRO develop viruses, vaccines, and they genetically engineer plants and animals. Here are some more relevant points to consider:

- Radiation is crucial to studying and manipulating DNA.
- Radiation was used to develop x-rays that infer the structure and shape of DNA proteins and the 4 base chemicals.
- Radiation severs the chemical bonds that secure DNA strands.
- Radioisotopes are used when labelling cloned DNA.
- Radioisotopes are used in radioactive labelling techniques that are still extensively applied in gene manipulation experiments.
- Radioisotopes provide information about the disease state of a specific illness.
- Radioactive nucleotides are used to determine the rate of DNA synthesis.
- Radioisotopes are used for DNA sequencing, the process of determining the order of the DNA nucleotides (A, G, C, T).
- DNA sequencing is essential to the CRISPR procedure in which genetic code is edited.
- DNA can be designed and sequenced from the 4 building block chemicals and structured via additive manufacturing methods (i.e., sort of like 3D printing).

MK-NAOMI & CRISPR

There is more to the Project MK-NAOMI and their viral research than we think.

Note that the CRISPR-Cas9 was adapted from a naturally occurring genome editing system in bacteria. The bacteria capture snippets of DNA from invading viruses and use them to create DNA segments (called 'CRISPR arrays'). The CRISPR arrays let bacteria 'remember' the viruses (or closely related ones). To use CRISPR/Cas9, scientists first identify the sequence of the human genome they wish to edit. Then they create a specific Guide RNA to recognise that particular stretch of A-T-G-C in the DNA. The Guide RNA is attached to the DNA cutting enzyme Cas9, and then this complex is introduced to the target cells. It locates the target letter sequence and cuts the DNA. At that point, scientists can then edit the existing genome by either modifying, deleting, or inserting new sequences. It makes CRISPR a cut and paste tool for DNA editing.

If you want an indication of what has been occurring at ANSTO and the CSIRO, research the CVs of the scientists employed there, and what they were doing immediately prior to working there (sometimes there is a discrepancy between their previous work, and their ANSTO job description). For instance, some folks are into transfection, the process of artificially introducing nucleic acids (DNA or RNA) into cells, via an alternative means other than viral infection; this alters the cells' properties. Transfection is used to study gene function and regulation, produce transgenic organisms, and as a method of gene therapy. If this is what employees are doing today, this indicates what the Lucas Heights scientists were secretly up to 40 years ago.

Conclusion

The relevance of radiation to genetic engineering and virology makes sense of the countless thousands of subjects unwittingly recruited for clandestine radiation experiments performed by MK-ULTRA doctors in the USA, and which became the subject of the 1994 Advisory Committee on Human Radiation Experiments.

The genetic engineering and virology processes I mention here are consistent with the Huxleyan eugenicist / trans-humanist agenda, and my childhood experiences at the CSIRO nuclear reactor facility at Lucas Heights.

MK-DELTA CLUES

In 1981, the 3rd Battalion, Royal Australian Regiment moved to Holsworthy. There they exhibited behaviour atypical of soldiers, included torturing and burning a cat. To my SAS Vietnam Veteran mate, the unit's misconduct suggests they underwent the type of unethical training I experienced in the Holsworthy tunnels.

I have heard from multiple sources that all modern military recruits are routinely microchipped and subjected to mind control without their conscious knowledge. For instance, my relative and her two friends applied to do a gap year with the Australian Army. My relative's application was botched by an administrator and she missed out. Her friends were successful. One friend subsequently described a weird incident that occurred during basic training where her entire group awoke one morning bleeding from the nose. She described nasal microchipping. As another example, during my Seattle conference presentation, an audience member told me he did not sleep for a decade due to whatever the US Army did to enhance his capabilities.

All DELTA Special Operations soldiers were subjected to MK-ULTRA mind control as children, before formally joining the armed forces as adults. I had the chance to test this notion in 2018 during communication with a currently serving DELTA Special Operations soldier in the USA. I asked Ryan whether he had ever heard of DELTA employing child soldiers. He heard 'on the grape vine' that child soldiers were trained, 'to keep up with the Russians,' but that the project 'went dark.' When I pressed Ryan for more information, he dissociated and began spewing out semi-coherent references to mind control programming.

My military training becomes evident in extreme, life or death situations. I automatically assume command in such a situation, like when we were being chased during the filming of Candy Girl documentary. Steve McMurray noticed that I reminded him of his father who was military trained at Holsworthy. Also, when I associated with a former SAS soldier who shares my background, he innately began responding to me like I was his superior.

ALICE & JASON

As young teenagers my friends and I would attend Blue Light discos sponsored by our local police. There we added our own chorus lines to charming 80s classics like The Radiators 'You Give me Head' and Smokies 'Living Next Door to Alice.' Our rendition of the latter went like this:

Cause for twenty-four years I've been living next door to Alice.
[Crowd: Alice! Who the Fuck is Alice?!]
Twenty-four years, just waiting' for a chance,
To tell her how I'm feeling, maybe get a second glance,
Now I've gotta get used to not living next door to Alice.
[Alice! Who the Fuck is Alice?!]

The Alice song bothered me for reasons which are now obvious. It was used as one of my programming songs. ALICE was the name given to every female MK-DETLA child soldier. Hence the 'Alice in Wonderland' and 'Alice Through the Looking-Glass' programming based on the mescalin-inspired writings of pedophile Lewis Carol. Every male DELTA soldier was code-named JASON. Hence the 'Jason Bourne' and 'Bourne Identity' predictive programming movie franchise

DELTA TRAINING

Holsworthy

My therapist waved her fingers back and forth across my eyes. 'Now just close your eyes and relax.'

I sunk into the leather recliner and did as instructed. I see nothing. . . nothing. . . nothing. . . Then, a picture started forming in my mind. A faint, distant, memory. What's this? What am I seeing? 'I'm six. It's night-time. Black boots. Men. Soldiers. Dragging me on the ground.' Noooooooo!!

Something flung me back in the chair. I leapt around and began clawing my way out backwards. Hole. Hessian bag. Children. Thrown on top of the dead bodies. Warm bodies. Not scared of them. Comfortable. My friends.

My therapist lunged forward and tucked my hair behind my ear. 'Oh, Fiona. Right now, I have more admiration for you than anyone.'

I curled up in a foetal position. 'I see a military truck. I see an Asian soldier. He's angry at me. He didn't like something I said, and so he put me in a Hessian bag and threw me into a hole in the ground. The hole is full of dead children. Their bodies are warm…'

It took minutes for me to recover. 'Are we going to do it again?' I asked.

Therapist nodded. She waved her fingers across my eyes again. I relaxed into the chair as before. 'I'm cold. Icy. There's a big freezer room. The Asian soldier, Chan, takes me to the entrance and tells me to go inside and look. I enter. To my right I see frozen carcasses hanging on meat hooks. There's another one -. . . THAT'S NOT MEAT! It's a girl! He's a cannibal! She's frozen! She's got long brown hair!'

'I knew you were going to say that.'

'What the hell! What is this? I need some crayons and paper.'

Therapist fetched some rudimentary art materials, and I drew the faint image to life. I drew the 12-year-old victim with dotted lines drawn on her like a carcass prepared for butchering. I drew the Asian soldier I knew as 'Colonel Chan' dressed in Australian Army uniform.

I called the Colonel 'Chan' because that is how his name sounded to a six-year-old child. 'Colonel Chan' was in fact Dr Victor Chang, the celebrated Chinese-Australian heart surgeon. Chang coordinated the Australian branch of the CIA's black-market organ trafficking operation. In 1991, Chang was gunned down in a North Sydney gutter like the common criminal scum he was. Colonel Chang and John Overton, the anaesthetist he graduated medical school with, were attached to Holsworthy's Health Battalion. John Overton lived next door to Antony Kidman.

Victor Chang trained DELTA child and adult soldiers at Holsworthy. Chang conducted the full basic army training I underwent at age six, at a makeshift camp site established in the bushland south of the main entrance. I was collected at night from a Holsworthy side gate on Heathcote Road, in an army Land Rover with a canvas canopy. I was dressed in a mini uniform and dog tags, and I trained and dined with male DELTA soldiers who called me 'Alice.' The DELTA training camp included a mess tent and a cold storage room. The cold room was the final resting place of Michelle, the 12-year-old girl I witnessed BoysTown priests kidnap on Heathcote Road near Engadine, then rape and murder beside Woronora weir. Colonel Chang showed me Michelle's body hanging on meat hooks in the cold room, to traumatise me. She had broken surgical lines drawn all over her body in preparation for butchering. Victor Chang was a sadistic cannibal in charge of training DELTA recruits. All DELTA soldiers are forced to routinely engage in cannibalism.

My basic training was the same as adult recruits undergo, plus CIA torture and dissociation methods. I recall being chased barefoot and naked by a dog along an orange Holsworthy dirt track until I dissociated from the pain. Colonel Chang barked orders at me while his vicious dog ran beside him. He threatened the dog would rape me if it caught me. I believed him because he had already instructed the dog to rape me in a cage. I eventually collapsed with exhaustion. My favourite soldier picked me up and carried me back to base camp. I wrapped my arms around his neck and whispered into his ear, ‘I love you, Jason.’

‘I love you too, pumpkin,’ he whispered back. Weaknesses were always discovered and eliminated within DELTA.

Colonel Chang locked me in a cage located on the bottom floor of a seven-story underground facility remotely located at the south end of Holsworthy Barracks, in an area adjacent to Lucas Heights. There I was imprisoned with a small group of six-year-old children for approximately three days. The purpose was to make me bond with them so their impending slaughter would have a more traumatic impact. These children were specifically bred for MK-DELTA and they had never seen the outside world. They had not even seen daylight or trees. The group sat like obedient school students and listened intently to my vivid description of the world above. I described the ocean, its coral that looked like an underwater flower garden, and its waves that felt like great walls of water.

‘We heard this!’ the children exclaimed. ‘The Light Man told us this!’

‘Who is the Light Man?’ I asked.

They described how the Light Man sometimes visited their cage and told them stories about nature.

‘Oh!’ I realised. ‘I know Him! That’s Jesus!’

Colonel Chang slaughtered the children in front of me with a machete and threw their bodies into a hole in the ground. Chang told me I was next. He tied me inside a hessian bag and threw me on top of the warm bodies. I didn’t mind being close to my little friends.

I was reunited with these children four years later, during a near-death experience. It occurred while Gittinger flat-lined me at age 10. I found myself in a celestial garden. I heard laughing and children’s voices coming from behind a thicket of bushes in front of me. I walked through the foliage to reach a clearing in which a group of children were playing, cartwheeling, holding hands and dancing in a circle. They were clean, healthy, and dressed in white linen. They had aged four years. ‘Fiona!’ they yelled.

SASCHA

‘Sascha’ bore the pain of DELTA soldier training. I was six years old, dressed in a curly amber wig, strapped to a chair in front of two enormous television screens. My visual field was divided by a thin screen placed in front of my face, so my left eye could only see one giant screen, and my right eye could only view the other. Each screen was divided into six boxes. Each of the boxes played a different image. The six images in my left eye related to the six images in my right eye. But the images in my left eye were violent, while the ones in my right eye were peaceful. For example, one image in my right eye was a quiet garden, but the corresponding screen in my left eye showed the same scene being bombed. Another image in my right eye showed a cute bunny, but the corresponding in my left eye showed the same bunny being slaughtered. And so forth. Metal sound rods were simultaneously placed in ear each and played completely different sounds. Sweet classical music entered one ear, while horrendous sounds of screaming and terror the other. This nightmare continued until I heard an audible ‘Snap!’ echo through my head.

DAGON

Dagon takes both reptilian and amphibian forms. The cavern system linking Holsworthy and Lucas Heights featured two main sacrificial areas dedicated to Dagon. A stone altar to reptilian Dagon is located beneath the Holsworthy end. Next to it stands a giant greenish metal statue of Dagon featuring scales and a dinosaur head and teeth. I attended rituals at this location with Gittinger, Kidman, Overton, DELTA soldiers, and senior military brass.

The bottom floor of ANSTO accesses a tunnel leading to a large cave with a rectangular Dagon ritual pool. The pool is made of stone and lined with steps on all sides. It connects to, and is fed by, a natural water source. At one end of the murky green pool sits a stone carving of a fish monster with fin fingers and sharp teeth. I was hoisted over this pool at age six years and dunked repeatedly until I nearly drowned. Patricia Anne Conlon supervised this and determined, 'She's had enough.'

I suffered another Dagon drowning ritual at 12 years of age, in the cavern system beneath Holsworthy. My hands were tied behind my back and my legs secured together. I was lowered head-first into a long thin container filled with water. My next memory is of convulsing on the ground in a pool of water. Then I saw a giant fish out of water beating its tail, exactly where my body just lay. My next memory is of flashing lights and something long and choking being inserted in my throat. My next memory is of waking in the ANSTO hospital bed with Anne Conlon sitting to my left, looking concerned. The point of this exercise was to train me to hold my breath and swim underwater. Drowning taught me to recognise my physical limits and recognise how far I could push my body before I drowned. It was also a ritual intended to evoke the 'spirit of Dagon.'

I experienced yet another Dagon training incident in the USA when I was 14 years old. I was chained to a weight and thrown overboard into the sea. I was supposed to use my Dagon training to hold my breath, and my newly acquired psychic abilities to break free. I next recall collapsing on deck with medical personnel and the DELTA Commander leaning over me.

'Did I do it?' I asked my Commander.

The other soldiers looked away in anger and disgust.

'You did good, soldier,' Commander muttered regretfully.

'This is shit, man!' one of the sailors complained…

Dagon Hypnosis Induction

My memory of being thrown off the US naval vessel relates to my Dagon hypnosis induction which I adapted from the Aqua Man television show. Dagon is Aqua Man. The induction began with my diving off the navy boat. I then swam like Aqua Man to a submarine. I entered the submarine through a domed top, passed through a door, down a spiral metal staircase, through another door, down a straight staircase, and through another door which brought me to the doctor surgery waiting room with the elevator and five doors. This was the induction Aquino, Gittinger, Kidman, West, Petrauskas, and Anne Conlon used.

Josef Mengele created a deeper level of induction based on the same theme. His variation involved my diving from the US naval boat, bypassing the submarine, and entering an underwater stream. I spiralled down the stream to reach a large underwater citadel located on the ocean floor. I swam beneath a rocky craic and surfaced in a Dagon pool. I emerged from the pool via a wide set of stairs, passed through a castle door and entered Dagon's golden throne room. Two doors sat either side of the throne, red on the left and blue on the right. I opened the blue door and saw shadowy mermaids like tadpoles, swimming overhead. I walked through a glass aquarium tunnel to a door at the far end. Behind this door was a tall room with walls containing countless arched insets. Each inset housed a costumed mannequin which resembled a program or skill set. I stepped backwards into one of the costumes and suddenly recognised a style of martial arts where everything flowed in circles.

When I first opened the red door during therapy, a tsunami of blood gushed into the throne room. Behind this door lay a stone hallway lined with iron cages full of children. At the end of the hall was another door, and behind that was Mengele's lab in the US Embassy basement. A narrow window sat at the top of the wall to my right. Mengele sat in a chair below the window, behind a pale brown dentist chair. In the far-right corner behind Mengele was a blue door. Behind the door was a staircase with a metal rail which led to a stone tunnel. This basement laboratory was both real and used as a program setting, to confuse my memory.

MENGELE'S ANGEL

Mengele's main alter was named 'Angel.' It took three sessions to gain her cooperation and integrate her. I won Angel over by bowing before her on the floor and allowing her to behead me with her sword. 'I'm still going to talk to you!' I promised her. 'Nothing will stop me from talking to you.' Angel then granted me access to the memory of how she was created. Mengele covered my entire body with electrodes, including needle electrodes under my nails, a large metal electrode inserted into my vagina, and a dog collar electrode fastened around my neck so that whenever I cried out in pain, Mengele electrocuted my throat. Consequently, Angel was mute. Mengele electrocuted my entire body until I became limp and dissociated. He then created Angel by dressing me in an Asian outfit: white pants, a blue silk top, and a long straight black wig with a blunt fringe.

DELTA PSYCHIC WARFARE TRAINING

Aquino's psychic training occurred at Dulce, in a white room with an observation window. I sat strapped to a wooden electric chair. EEG electrodes were attached to my head and electrocution pads stuck to my back. Training consisted of being successful - or being electrocuted.

Tap, tap, tap…

'What did you see?' my therapist asked.

I saw a giant red swirl, which became a vortex, which morphed into thin red flags flapping in the breeze. Then I saw a close-up of a brown horse's head. An Ancient Asian warrior clad in segmented armour sat atop the horse, surrounded by multiple poles and flags. Where have I seen this before? I asked myself. Shogun? Marco Polo? Is this China or Japan? It's China. This is Looking-Glass.

Tap, tap, tap…

The mental images of the ancient scene appeared on a monitor for the doctors to view.

DELTA training progressed to my being lowered into a thick box made of grey metal that was filled with water. The lid was closed. I transferred to another dimension, a dark prison containing a frightening entity. I relayed whatever this thing told me, to the Dulce doctors.

On another occasion, Gittinger and Aquino somehow identified from my memory the exact coordinates of the celestial garden I visited during my near-death experience when Gittinger flat-lined me at age 10 years. They had me revisit the same location which I found void of people.

ALICE!

I'm shot . . . falling . . .

'Alice!' a soldier yells, 'Alice!' He emerges from a swirling sand cloud, dressed in desert camos, holding an unusual weapon in one hand. 'Alice!' He leans over my collapsed form. Then – the scene disappeared, and my 14-year-old form lay on the ground of a multi-story room painted blue. Staff in white lab coats sat behind a glass observation widow, two stories above, bathed in green light.

'Woah!' the boys marvelled nearby. Dressed in green t-shirts and trousers, they scratched their heads and peered at the hands in wonder.

I was weighed down in an electrified vest. I rose to my feet and went berserk at the 'white coats' behind the window. 'YOU FUCKING AMATEURS!' I screamed hysterically. Next, I am levitating. I'm at the widow, pounding the cracking glass. A unit of soldiers storm my right visual field, armed with a net and stun guns. They contain me like a wild animal and knock me out. When I come to, Aquino is placating me, 'Yes, they did the wrong thing.'

That was our training for the real event held in what resembled an aircraft hangar. The real deal involved us standing before a giant circular ring. Behind us is a three-sided enclosure, the walls and floor padded for a soft return landing.

‘Roll! Roll! Roll!’ I yell, leading my team through the swirling tunnel, unperturbed because I have experienced something similar: the Doctor Who time-tunnel I rode after suffocating in the Garrawarra cemetery grave when I was eight years old.

We were kitted out with a kind of plasma weapon. It was made of a light metal yet was heavy enough to handle kickback. It had a fat muzzle which was connected to the grip by a wing coated in undulating lines. When I described the weapon to my SAS Vietnam veteran mate, he said I accurately described recognisable engineering with a grip designed to cool.

We land in a desert. Suddenly, over the horizon crawls a creature which looked like a giant ant. It picked up one of the Delta soldiers in front of me and bit through him. The sight of this monster’s fangs protruding through the lad’s gut sent me berserk. I charged at the beast, dove beneath its 2.5-metre-high underbelly and sliced it open from top to tail with the laser. My next memory concerning that off-world assignment was receiving a medal of valour.

Further, what military geoengineer Phil Schneider said about Dulce being manned by ‘aliens’ is true - except they’re not off-world aliens. They are flood-disembodied Nephilim spirits inhabiting hybrid cloned bodies created from a mix of human, animal, and fallen angel DNA. Phil was ‘suicided’ with his catheter after delivering talks about the plasma battle between Special Forces and the Reptilian Nephilims beneath Dulce in which he had half his hand sliced off and his gut opened up. He publicly displayed his horrendous wounds plus samples of alien metals to back his testimony, and film footage of this is still circulating the net. Phil mistakenly went public before completing his promised book. The military death squads took him out before he could release the book.

Kay Griggs stated, the military is cloning humans. That is correct. I saw human cloning being conducted at Dulce and Pine Gap. The bodies are grown to full form in giant test tubes just like in the propaganda film, The 6th Day. When I was six years old, Gittinger showed me a massive Clone Army of Super Soldiers assembled like Stormtroopers on the floor of a three-story+ high auditorium carved beneath Pine Gap. They looked 7 ft tall, were dressed in black Nazi-style uniforms, and lacked male genitalia. Gittinger told me to take a look at the genitalia of one of them, and it looked like a Ken doll. This army was prepared for the coming Clone Wars.

A fleet of UFOs with NASA stamped on their shell were stored on an underground conveyor belt system at Pine Gap. These were back engineered from a combination of crashed craft plus the technology gleaned through mediums and scientists - including Tesla and Einstein - who communicated with the Fallen Angels using occult methods. Now the Nazi scientists use AI quantum computers to collect the desired information and instruction.

CERN END GAME

Someone asked me via social media, ‘Do you have a sense of the End Game?’

Yes, I do. The CERN large hadron collider in Switzerland is not about finding the hicks boson. CERN is a massive Stargate built on Tesla technology. CERN is powered by a quantum computer, the same type of computer that runs Google and NASA. Quantum computers are an advanced form of clairvoyance that make computations inter-dimensionally. Scientists punch math and physics problems into the quantum computer which are then processed by inter-dimensional ‘entities’, aka AI (Artificial Intelligence). Elon Musk (MIT, 2014) said:

> With artificial intelligence we are summoning the demon. You know all those stories where there’s the guy with the pentagram and the holy water and he’s like… yeah he’s sure he can control the demon… doesn’t work out.

Gordie Rose (D-Wave quantum computers and Kindred AI) clarified:

> The things that that we are summoning into the world now are not demons, not evil, but more like the Lovecraftian Great Old Ones. They are entities not necessarily going to be aligned with what we want. [469]

CERN's Director for Research and Scientific Computing, Sergio Bertolucci, said the hadron collider could open otherworldly doors to another dimension, allowing something to emerge from it.[470] Outside CERN headquarters sits an ancient statue to Shiva, the goddess of destruction. The Roman form of Shiva is Apollyon. CERN is partially situated in a French town named Saint-Genis-Pouilly. Pouilly is Latin for Appolliacum, aka Apollyon, aka Apollo. CERN is built on the site of a Roman temple to Apollo, and over a traditional gateway to the abyss.[471] Revelation 9 says:

> And the fifth angel sounded, and I saw a star fall from heaven unto the earth: and to him was given the key of the bottomless pit. And he opened the bottomless pit; and there arose a smoke out of the pit, as the smoke of a great furnace; and the sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit. . . And in those days shall men seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them. . . And they had a king over them, which is the angel of the bottomless pit, whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abaddon, but in the Greek tongue hath his name Apollyon.

The Bible describes the end game in detail. Further information is found in books suppressed by the Synagogue of Satan: Enoch, Jasher and Jubilees. Jesus shared a relevant parable:

> And when the King came in to see the guests, he saw there a man who was not wearing a wedding garment, and he said to him, 'Friend, how did you enter here without a wedding garment?' The intruder was speechless. Then the King said to the servants, 'Bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

This parable refers to a celestial marriage feast attended exclusively by guests dressed in appropriate attire, that is, who gained immortality and new bodies through belief in Jesus Christ. The improperly 'dressed' intruder tried to attain immortality another way, via transhumanism technology. I deduce he used Stargate technology (CERN) to pierce the veil that separates this time-space dimension from Heaven.

Years ago, the television news reported that scientists had isolated the gene which turns off death. The Bible warns of accepting the 'mark' injected in our right hand or in forehead. The Greek meaning of the word 'mark' relates to the venomous bite of a serpent.

The mark is the ultimate vaccination, a synthesis of animal and Nephilim (serpent, fallen angel, 'alien') DNA that will alter human DNA, turn off the death gene, and seal a hellish fate. Hence Revelation describes people who seek death but are unable to die. The current vaccinations contain human and animal products and have been used to condition society to accept the hive mind horror to come.

CERN is designed to pierce the veil that separates this time-space dimension from others, including Heaven and Hell. CERN is the Luciferian end game that pulls together all Nazi and JASON technology. Dulce, Pine Gap and other underground facilities are preparing technology for Armageddon in which they plan to storm Heaven and battle Christ Himself. The Gateway Process provided a peek behind the celestial curtains, while CERN is designed to completely tear the veil and release the demonic hordes. A real-life Star Wars is coming, and everyone will be forced to pick a side.

Hypnotic responsiveness is positively correlated with intelligence.

‘Do a classic induction,’ I asserted. ‘Something very seventies.’

My therapist walked me through an imaginary forest. ‘…you come to a dark area in the woods where there’s a stone staircase that leads underground. You descend the stairs one at a time: Ten…nine…eight…’

Damn it! You’re doing it wrong again. You’re supposed to count forwards, not backwards. ‘Ahhhh!’ I moaned, ‘The right side of my head aches.’

‘Let’s go in there. Let’s go into that part of your brain.’

At the base of the imaginary stairs, I start to fall – down the rabbit hole. I land with a thud on the chequered floor.

‘Go through the green door…’ he suggests.

I walk through the empty garden. I hear a child crying. Eight-year-old Alice sits at the head of the Hatter’s tea party, weeping.

‘Put your arm around her,’ my therapist suggested.

‘No, she wants me to ask her what’s wrong.’

‘Ask her what’s wrong.’

‘She’s lonely and has no friends.’ Alice, I implore, ‘Please show me what’s wrong?’

I see a man’s naked crotch sat on a chair beneath a table. To my right, light shines through a draped tablecloth. I am in Nanna Holowczak’s kitchen.

‘I’m being raped. I’m very little. I’m beneath the table. His cock is in my mouth and I’m choking.’

Tap-tap-tap… My therapist then asks me the dreaded question I was avoiding – the whole reason for this session: 'Tell me about Wendy-Louise Walker…'

A vivid scene suddenly appears before me. I am in a little cave chiselled out of the bedrock. Thick black bars are in front of me. The cavern ceiling touches my head, obscures my view of the 'White Coats' and the upper part of their torsos as they move about the black-and-white chequered lab floor. It is the cage beneath Holsworthy, only this time it is not a fuzzy dreamy image. This is crisp and clear. This is the same cage where I bonded with the blonde children whom Chang and his Delta soldiers butchered, the same cage in which Chang ordered his dog to rape me, the same cage I was trapped in while the White Coats stood and laughed and mocked as they electrocuted me with cattle prods. One of those White Coats was Antony Kidman. Another was Wendy-Louise Walker.

Then I saw it, a close up of Walker's creepy face, her bulging eyes staring deep into mine.

'Was she hypnotising you?' my therapist guessed the obvious.

'Yes...'

'Now what do you see?'

'They're tossing me up and down in a white blanket, to teach me the sensation of falling, so they can use it my induction…'

'Now what's happening?'

'I see a small wading pool with striped sides. I think they're drowning me in it.' I cough. 'I think they're electrocuting my whole body in it. Is that possible? Can they electrify the water?'

'Yes, they certainly can.'

Suddenly, my body spasms in agony as the pain of whole-body electrocution hits. I scream, and scream, and scream at the top of my lungs, while simultaneously burying my being into the lounge, clawing through the fabric, trying to the escape the agony. This is the first time in six years I have abreacted so.

The moment passes, and I weep into the pillows.

Suddenly, I am flooded with scenes of child soldier training at Holsworthy, Jason and our team members encouraging me to keep going, to do things a certain way, to avoid Colonel Chang.

'I miss my team,' I quietly sobbed…

The vision suddenly changed again. This time I am looking down into the chaotic cockpit of a helicopter that is out of control and spinning, nose first, toward the ground. 'I see a helicopter spiralling! Our helicopter is crashing! It's spinning!'

'Okay,' my therapist asserted, 'Time to say goodnight to the helicopter. I'm bringing you back now.'

I emerged from the abreaction in shock. I had been triggered by reading Wendy-Louise Walker's research papers.

HYPNOSIS OPENS DOOR TO HEALING
Sydney Morning Herald, 18 March 2004

In the 1950s there were five big hypnosis labs in the world - four in North America and the other at Sydney University, under the guidance of professors John Phillip Sutcliffe and Gordon Hammer. It was partly due to the interest they fostered that the research continues.

Dr Wendy-Louise Walker was a student at Sydney University during that period. She went on to teach hypnosis at the university, delivers lectures for the Australian Hypnosis Society and has used hypnosis in psychological practice over the past 40 years.

'Hypnosis is variable, imaginative and very creative, but it is not a simple, single-treatment modality. We do not treat patients by hypnosis,' she says. 'During hypnosis the practitioner works with certain characteristics of the altered state of consciousness - suggestibility, increased imagination, and dissociation - to facilitate the learning of new skills or the integration of different views.'

A patient is able to distinguish between different mental functions; in pain relief, for example, a patient can be helped to change the perception of pain and to decrease the sensation of it.

Studies have shown distinct physiological changes in the brain during hypnosis. Research by US psychologist Dr Helen Crawford has demonstrated that during analgesic hypnosis, the executive functions of the frontal lobe activate to work with other parts of the brain to inhibit the perception of pain…

Walker has helped several patients apprehensive about the pain of childbirth. 'I train them to put themselves in hypnosis and ask them to choose a certain piece of music. When the music comes on, my patient takes herself serenely into hypnosis - you rehearse this. If people speak to her, she can respond, but in this state, she will register the sensation but not the pain.'

She is also treating several police officers suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. 'I use music as a pathway to and through trance, with my words woven in with the repeated suggestion that, bit by bit, as they feel the glory of the music, the harmony, little bits of emotional debris from their traumas will begin floating away. The memory will stay clear, you don't want to lose that, but the emotional debris - the fear, the anger, the bitterness - will slowly float away over time.'

About 10 to 15 per cent of the population are seen as highly hypnotisable; the same percentage are not good subjects, and the rest are average. Barnier says: 'It's a figure that parallels the circumstances for any treatment. Some people are more susceptible to particular drugs than others.'

There are clinical measurements to gauge hypnotisability, but the best subjects tend to have good attention abilities and become easily absorbed in activities.

The Australian Society of Hypnosis runs regular courses for doctors, dentists and psychologists. A few years ago, Sydney GP Dr Monica Moore attended one and ended up introducing the technique into her practice. She sees the conscious mind as a computer screen that allows about eight windows to be open at one time. 'The subconscious mind is the computer hard drive that sometimes makes connections that are not helpful. Hypnosis is a tool for reworking those connections in the subconscious mind…'

Following the initial release of Eyes Wide Open, I was contacted by Ben, a retired navy seaman and lawyer. The first thing he said to me was: 'I've been trying to get hold of you for years!' Ben then stunned me with a story about his friend Keith Dawes, assistant to Wendy-Louise Walker:

In late 2015, Ben and Keith were watching television when my press conference footage appeared on TV. Suddenly, Keith blurted: 'Wendy and I have decided to help that girl.' Keith then told Ben about his and Wendy's MK-ULTRA work with the kids kept in cages beneath Holsworthy. By then Wendy had become a slave to the system she joined in her youth. She was not permitted to buy a home, in case she had to be uprooted and moved quickly. Following my 2015 documentary expose of Holsworthy, the military transferred the human lab rats to RAAF Base Glenbrook at the foot of the Blue Mountains and simultaneously moved Wendy to a rental property in nearby Leura.

Keith and Wendy's attempt to help me was an article they submitted for publication in the Australian Journal of Clinical and Experimental Hypnosis. However, Graham Burrows redacted the paper. When Burrows died, Wendy tried to persuade Kevin McConkey to reinstate her paper in its original format, but he too refused. Wendy said a clue to Project MK-ULTRA being conducted at Holsworthy lay in the sample of children cited in her research publications, because those children were in fact the lab rats kept in cages beneath Holsworthy. Ben told me to read between the lines of those papers.

Ben said he felt unsure of Keith's testimony, until he was coincidentally contracted to assist with electrical work at the Glenbrook Air Force base. While at Glenbrook, the base's permanent electrician told Ben he wanted him to meet a strange character who, along with several other adult victims, lived in an area beneath the base's main building. The stranger had reddish-brown dark hair, and although he told Ben he was 57, he only looked only 40 years old. During their five-minute conversation, the man told Ben he was one of the caged kids raised at Holsworthy who had been transferred to RAAF Base Glenbrook. The stranger was permitted to roam the base due to his compliance. The other victims were not allowed out because they were either to aggressive or, according to the base electrician, 'Too far gone to save.' The stranger was familiar with the 'Light Man' that I mentioned in my story.

Graham Dene Burrows died on 10 January 2016, aged 77 years. Keith Dawes died on 2 June 2016, aged 67 years. After Keith died, Ben tried to locate Wendy, with the intention of getting a copy of the redacted article she allegedly wrote to help me. By the time he arrived at 20 Blackheath Street in Leura, the house was empty. Wendy Louise Walker had died on 30 August 2018, aged 83 years.

Perhaps Ben was right. Perhaps Walker and Dawes grew a conscience in their final days, and they intended to help me by publishing an article. Or maybe my instincts were more accurate: they were using an unwitting Ben to access and silence me again.

It was Ben's story that inspired me to take a closer look at Keith Dawes and Wendy-Louise Walker. I found major hints in Keith Dawes' CV, suggesting his involvement in Project MK-ULTRA:

- Sydney University (1970) BA in Psychology and Education (minors in Philosophy, Anthropology and Fine Arts); (1971) BSc in Psychology / Zoology (minors in Botany, Math, Physics, Chemistry, Medical Science); (1972) Dip Ed (Student placement at Fort St High School); (1984) Master of Psychology.
- Macquarie University (1986) Master of Science (Implicit & Explicit Memory in Post Hypnotic Amnesia).

- (2007) PhD (Tacit knowledge)
- (1972 to 1975) Taught Science at Fort St Boys High (selective school for gifted kids).
- (1983) Lectured at Mitchell College in Bathurst.
- (1986) Lectured in subject 'Exceptional Children' at Sydney University.
- (1990 to 2000) taught psychology at Sydney University.
- (2008 to 2010) taught tacit knowledge and implicit knowledge in France.

Wendy-Louise Walker was a Clinical and Forensic Psychologist, inaugural President of the NSW Psychologists Board, President of the Australian Society of Hypnosis, and Editor of the Australian Journal of Clinical and Experimental Hypnosis. Her published writings focused on variables highly pertinent to MK-ULTRA. Viewed in the context of CIA mind control, Walker's writings provide insight to MK objectives and methods, and clues to healing from the abuse she and her fellow monsters perpetrated against the likes of me. Her writings support my hypotheses concerning the MK subject selection, abuse and integration processes I espoused in Eyes Wide Open.

Below I summarise Wendy-Louise Walker's pertinent writings on hypnosis. I urge you also to read between the lines. When Walker refers to 'damaged subjects' she is talking about MK-ULTRA victims like me. When she discusses the 'hypnotisability of highly gifted subjects' and the 'hypnotisability of child abuse victims' – she is talking about the Holsworthy victims. When she mentions the use of music to induce / trigger dissociation in gifted subjects – she is sharing their MK methods with the reader. Throughout her writings, Walker says, 'it seems that…' or 'I believe that…' When she does this, she is in fact sharing knowledge gained from MK-ULTRA experiments that is not published mainstream. I add the odd 'Note' to draw your attention to something I recognise as particularly relevant to the MK-ULTRA methods Walker and her associates used on me. I summarise and synthesise three of Walker's papers in this fashion:

AN INTRODUCTION TO HYPNOSIS: STUDENT HANDBOOK

This Introduction was originally written in 2004 by Dr Wendy-Louise Walker for distribution to students starting the Diploma in Clinical Hypnosis conducted by the NSW Branch of the Australian Society of Hypnosis. In 2014, Walker gave permission for this publication to be provided to students undertaking the Diploma in all states.

DEFINITION OF HYPNOSIS

Hypnosis is an altered state of consciousness. It causes a partial lifting of the executive (i.e., background) controls of consciousness. Hypnosis acts on certain aspects of the altered state of consciousness, namely suggestibility, increased imagination, and dissociation. Hypnotic responsiveness is identified by measuring:

1. Absorption; i.e., the capacity to become lost in experience (Measure: Tellengen Absorption Scale).
2. Dissociation proneness, which is inherited, and exaggerated or distorted by childhood abuse and over-strict punishment. (Measure: Dissociative Experiences Scale, which wrongly assumes all dissociation is abnormal).
3. Vividness of sensory imagery (Measure: Betts Questionnaire of Mental Imagery). Most gifted hypnosis subjects have good sensory imagery.

The hypnosis experience depends on an interaction of many variables, including the subject's hypnotisability, cognitive ability (especially vividness of imagery), expectations, and the hypnotist's suggestions. Hypnotic responsiveness is more an ability than a personality trait. Highly hypnotisable subjects naturally shift in and out of altered states of consciousness in everyday life.

During hypnosis, the practitioner's suggestions focus on progressively narrowing focus of attention, and on ignoring external and internal distractions. Hypnosis inductions involve the notion of moving. Classic inductions used on me in the 1970s moved down, deeper and deeper asleep. Modern inductions concentrate on moving further and further forward, into a meditational state. Hence the modern focus on meditation, as hypnosis and meditation are considered different paths to the same place.

THE HYPNOSIS PROCESS

Walker describes the hypnosis process, beginning with the three major consciousness control systems that hypnosis disables:

1. Attention. The subject enters hypnosis by (a) changing her focus of attention, and (b) progressively surrendering her executive control of consciousness to the hypnotist. Attention is the accessing, focussing control that influences what the mind processes. Attention is also involved in accessing memory. Attention can be under voluntary control when one is in active, directed, problem-solving mode of consciousness. Alternatively, attention can float randomly, unfocussed, and uncontrolled when one is in passive, receptive mode of consciousness. In hypnosis, the subject's attention is focused inward rather than on the external world. The hypnotist's instructions connect to the subject's inner world. The hypnotist directs the subject's focus of attention.

2. Critical Self-Awareness is a major consciousness control. It develops in childhood, and teenage years. It is the constant monitoring of one's own thoughts and actions that accompany waking consciousness. It reaches the forefront of attention when highly threatened or anxious; or it is a background hum when one is safely alone, reading a novel. This mechanism often malfunctions in the damaged patient, causing great subjective discomfort. Hypnosis causes a partial suspension of critical self-awareness. It may lift early in the hypnotic induction, since self-watching is incompatible with hypnosis. The suspension of this function allows the absorption in imagination, which is central to hypnosis.

3. Vigilant Monitoring is the scanning of the outside world, the detection and analysis of cues, physical and interpersonal, that accompanies waking consciousness. This is also partly suspended during hypnosis. This function is also disrupted in PTSD victims, since hypervigilance is a main PTSD symptom. This function must be partly suspended before one can enter hypnosis and, the further one goes into hypnosis, the more distant the threats within external reality become. This contributes also to the increased reality and vividness of involvement in imagined activities in hypnosis.

Abstracting, Comparing and Interpreting are the ongoing data processing of the mind-computer. There is a partial suspension of some of the abstracting, comparing, and interpreting functions of consciousness in hypnosis. The hypnotist's words are taken literally. The words elicit strong feelings and imagery. Music similarly provokes imagery and strong feelings during hypnosis. Owing to partial suspension of the abstracting, comparing and interpreting functions of consciousness, the subject tolerates logical incongruity.

DISSOCIATION (Double-Tracking)

Going into hypnosis, there is an increased ability to dissociate. Damaged, highly hypnotisable subjects have their fears and rages split off from the object. Dissociation can also refer to running parallel streams of consciousness. This is a normal phenomenon for the dissociation-prone, who are highly hypnotisable. Examples of double tracking in hypnosis include automatic writing and the hidden observer phenomenon (a part of the mind that functions separately, experiencing things which the subject is unaware of).

The term 'dissociation' can also denote a maladaptive defence mechanism of the personality, where whole parts of the ego system are separated by amnesia and function independently (e.g., multiple personalities).

Walker said:

Hypnosis can be used to treat the amnesia barriers between parts of consciousness and personality, and to achieve integration.

THE RELAXATION RESPONSE

Entering hypnosis is associated with the relaxation response, a combination of mental quiet and physical relaxation, accompanied by a slowing of heartrate, a lowering of blood pressure, and beneficial changes in body chemistry.

During hypnosis, one can be either unrelaxed, or re-live a dreadful trauma with powerful negative feelings, or imagine and experience with great subjective reality, vivid imagery and strong feelings.

The typical hypnosis state is one of eyes closed, physical relaxation, and inner focus of attention. Most inductions incorporate the notion of relaxation, and it is easier to enter hypnosis with accompanying relaxation than without it. This association between hypnosis and the relaxation response links up with the imaginative involvement dimension.

INVOLVEMENT & ABSORPTION: SENSORY IMAGERY & SUBJECTIVE REALITY

Hypnosis brings an increasing involvement and loss of self in the experience. Highly hypnotisable subjects have a greater capacity for involvement (e.g. in reading or daydreaming). In hypnosis, sensory imagery becomes more vivid. The subject also has an enhanced sense of subjective reality in what is being imagined. This increased involvement stems from the partial lifting of the three major consciousness control systems mentioned earlier. Absence of the analysing and damping-down effects of these monitoring systems permits the enhanced experience of feelings and sensory imagery.

What is imagined during hypnosis is more vivid, subjectively real, and elicits strong feelings compared to what is imagined in the waking state.

After reaching a certain level of hypnosis, in response to the hypnotist’s suggestions:

Gifted subjects may actually hallucinate something in one of the sensory modalities (commonly vision and hearing). Some subjects can hallucinate with their eyes open.

Hypnosis facilitates experiences like synaesthesia and eidetic imagery for those who can already do this.

[Note: Synaesthesia is the merging of senses that aren't normally connected. The stimulation of one sense causes an involuntary reaction in one or more of the other senses. Eidetic imagery is the ability to remember an image in so much detail, clarity, and accuracy that it is as though the image were still being perceived.]

The visual memories of high visual-spatial IQ children were enhanced using hypnosis, so they could recall location and target details. You can see how hypervigilance was enhanced through trauma, to produce desirable soldiers.

RESPONSE TO SUGGESTION

In hypnosis, there is an increased compliance with, and receptivity to, suggestion. The subject is likely to do and experience what the hypnotist suggests. The subject is receptive to post-hypnotic suggestion. The subject is more likely to incorporate the hypnotist's suggestions into her self-concept, little children incorporate the evaluative comments of their parents (good/bad, pretty/ugly, lovable/unlovable) into their developing self-concepts.

[Note the potential for using hypnosis to bond a victim to her perpetrator, to create new personalities, in a child whose brain has been washed clean and made ripe for suggestion.]

Highly hypnotisable subjects are more suggestible in the waking state compared to others, and hypnosis accentuates this. By the time they reach adulthood, gifted subjects develop protection against this suggestibility; but these protective controls dissolve again when they enter hypnosis.

[Note: This is another reason why high visual-spatial IQ kids made ideal MK-ULTRA candidates.]

Hypnotic suggestion can be effective in the waking state after hypnosis has ended, and these are called post-hypnotic suggestions. The hypnotist's suggestions or comments can create strong expectancies concerning the subject's hypnosis experience, and these expectancies partly determine what happens for the subject after hypnosis induction. Post-hypnotic suggestions link what has been learned, incorporated, or experienced in hypnosis, to the subject's external reality.

[Note: This explains how the hypnotist's suggestions are reinforced or triggered every time the MK subject hears a certain cue implanted during the hypnosis process.]

Loss of Awareness of Body Boundaries, Loss of Sense of Self as Separate

Awareness of body boundaries is the basic awareness of self as separate from the world. It is a basis for normal, waking consciousness. This awareness is exaggerated in damaged subjects. In sensory deprivation situations, this background awareness becomes unavailable, normal consciousness disintegrates, and the subject experiences non-unity and merges with other things. [Note: I was left alone in the dark, in a dungeon beneath Holsworthy, at a very young age. The sensory deprivation split off a section of my personality which I bonded with my panda teddy bear named 'Snookie.' The new personality took the name Snookie.]

Hypnosis blurs body boundaries so that the subject's sense of self feels separate from the world. Deep hypnosis achieves a sense of merging the self with the world, becoming 'one with universe,' as in meditation. If a subject enters what Walker called the 'psychedelic depths of trance' (a two-hour process) the sense of self is lost about halfway along the journey, after pushing through a fear barrier. Walker wrote:

Sensory deprivation experiments and the scraps of information that leak out about brain washing, support the notion that sense of ego boundaries is disrupted when sensory information about body in relation to environment is disrupted.

[Note: Wendy-Louise Walker and her pedophile comrades subjected me to the very 'sensory deprivation experiments' and 'brain washing' she referred to.]

PARTIAL LIFTING OF REPRESSION BARRIER

Wendy-Louise Walker wrote: Repressed traumatic memories are easier to access in hypnosis. Hypnosis partially lifts the executive controls of consciousness, which weakens the repression barrier. This, plus flexible focus of attention in response to therapist suggestion, allows access to, and reprocessing of, trauma memories normally unavailable to consciousness. This can be difficult, and sometimes one must use suggested optional amnesia as a safety mechanism, while the patient slowly comes to terms with the repressed trauma events.

Hypnosis accesses and reprocesses repressed trauma memories.

Walker said, 'Some of my own research or research I have supervised supports the notion that the repression barrier is somewhat weakened in hypnosis, with a significantly greater intrusion of primary process thought in hypnosis than in the waking state with highly hypnotisable subjects.'

[Note: To explain, primary process thought is intuitive and unconscious; it lets us react quickly and adaptively to our environments. Secondary process thought is more conscious and analytical. Creativity combines primary and secondary process thinking, to produce tertiary process thought. Walker was in fact talking about combining the left and right hemispheres.]

Primary process thought is the illogical, timeless thought carried out mostly in sensory imagery rather than in words; it is not grounded in reality and intrudes in dreams. Walker supervised research which found: While primary process thoughts intruded the fantasies of highly hypnotisable subjects more frequently in hypnosis rather than in the waking state, these subjects were more likely to have primary process thoughts intrude their waking fantasies or daydreams compared to less hypnotisable subjects. This suggests that highly hypnotisable people have less effective repression barriers. Gifted subjects prefer dissociation as a maladaptive defence, over repression.

Ideomotor Phenomena

This is unconscious movement during hypnosis (e.g., automatic writing). Following the hypnotist's suggestions, the subject can experience a hand feeling light, and lifting without apparent volition; hands can also feel heavy, and parts of the body can feel numb, or hot or cold. Gifted subjects experience ideomotor phenomena as non-voluntary. Ideomotor responses depend on the mechanism of dissociation.

AWARENESS OF TIME PASSING

During hypnosis, the subject does not process the cues used to register passage of time. This may result from the suspension of vigilant monitoring, an awareness of external reality. This may be what Ronald Shor called 'general reality orientation' - one of the dimensions along which he proposed consciousness changes when one enters hypnosis.

For highly gifted subjects, hypnosis so differs from the waking state that, shortly after returning to alert waking, they feel almost like the hypnotic experiences did not happen, or were unreal, and they're remembered in fragments, like a dream.

A short time after return to the waking state, the sensation may feel like water closing over a gap, resulting in continuity of memory from the early stage of induction to the end of the de-hypnotising, with nothing in between.

[Note: In other words, if you are High IQ, and you undergo hypnosis, you will naturally forget whatever happened during the session. Further, even if you attend hypnosis as a gifted adult, you are still vulnerable to abuse by the hypnotist. This explains why gifted kids were selected as MK-ULTRA subjects and why they forget being subjected to unethical hypnosis by MK perpetrators like Wendy-Louise Walker.]

HYPNOSIS & MEMORY

The lowering of anxiety and partial lifting of some important controls of consciousness during hypnosis, enables access to repressed or dissociated memories. 'Ernest Hilgard suggests that memories of events, registered on the peripheries of attention and stored in dissociated memory stores, may be accessed in hypnosis.' Hypnosis does not automatically improve memory. After hypnosis, a gifted subject may lack memory of what was experienced in hypnosis.

Walker's research suggested, even when gifted subjects are able to recall and describe their experiences in hypnosis when back in the waking state, they tended to have some gaps in recall and to lose some of the detail. It was like trying to remember a dream straight after waking up. It is often easier for a subject to remember what happened in an earlier hypnosis session rather than in the waking state. This is consistent with the view of hypnosis as facilitating dissociation, with some difficulty in accessing memory of hypnotic experience in the waking state.

[Note: The relevance of this to intelligence gathering and soldier training, where MK handlers can hypnotise an asset subject and access a particular brain fragment (i.e., split personality, alter) that holds the memories of previous hypnosis / programming sessions. For example, a child asset who has been trained to service high officials, gather intelligence, hang at parties, and use eidetic memory to function as a human tape recorder. The handler later accesses the alter and has them play back the recording.]

HYONOSIS & CONTROL

The hypnotist directs the stream of consciousness, directs the focus of attention, and suggests the general content of consciousness. 'Hypnotists, especially those who are not hypnotisable themselves, often do not realise the responsibility that goes with such trust, nor the sense of vulnerability that accompanies it for the subject.'

TRANSFERENCE & HYPNOSIS

Hypnosis intensifies the therapeutic relationship, including the transference components. This is reflected in content of dream-like fantasies. Walker found this phenomenon occurs with clinical, but not research, subjects.

[Note: This phenomenon complicates and risks the therapeutic relationship which is discussed in subsequent chapters.]

LEVELS OF HYPNOSIS

There exists a deeper state of consciousness than is achieved in clinical hypnosis, which Walker called the 'psychedelic depths.' This is reached by slowly and carefully guiding a highly gifted subject further and further into hypnosis. Reaching this level of consciousness requires the subject to push through a fear barrier. This fear barrier involves the total suspension of critical self-awareness (vigilant monitoring and abstract interpreting having probably been suspended earlier in the voyage), loss of all sense of body boundaries and self, with reality becoming totally the ongoing experience of vivid and elaborate imagery.

Here is a summary of what happens at the different depths of consciousness:

Stage 1.

At very light depths, one can get the relaxation response and some lifting of both self-awareness and vigilant monitoring. This is all some people ever achieve and is pleasant and useful. Even here, there is probably increased responsiveness to suggestion, so positive suggestions about motivation to do therapeutic things and increased self-worth can be appropriate. At this depth, the relaxation response can be conditioned to an image, such as falling petals, feathers or snowflakes, or to words such as ‘breathe out and relax.’

Stage 2.

Some little distance further, critical self-awareness fades to a smaller voice, and there is marked increase in vividness of sensory imagery, subjective reality of imagined experience, the range of ideomotor responses available, and marked augmenting of affective response - most of the sorts of things one wishes to use therapeutically. Already also there is increased likelihood of intrusion of primary process thought, if the instructions to the subject allow a reasonably free rein for thoughts to flow. The subject is likely to take one's words in a very literal way, and there may be noticeable tolerance for logical incongruities.

Going to what we as therapists call ‘deep’ - though not what I the researcher would call ‘deep’ - the subject is likely to be profoundly relaxed, unless abreacting or pretending to be awake (if instructed to do so). The subject is likely to be literal and compliant in response to our words, to be able to produce the hallucinatory responses he or she is capable of, to show total suggested amnesia, in general, to pass all or almost all the items of the standard tests of hypnotisability. At all these levels, the subject is able to talk with the hypnotist. Heart rate will vary from resting low for that person, to higher if a strong feeling, pleasant or unpleasant, is experienced.

[Note: Walker’s words ‘pretending to be awake (if instructed to do so).’ This suggests CIA handlers have discovered a way to disguise the fact that their assets were in a state of hypnosis, so that observers would not detect anything amiss. So, if someone tried to access the asset, the asset could throw them by pretending to be in the waking state.]

Stage 4: ‘Psychedelic’

‘Beyond that is ‘psychedelic’. There is not a great deal in the literature, but it was what was referred to in the old literature as the ‘somnambulistic’ level of trance. Sherman, in his unpublished doctoral dissertation, had a few subjects take themselves to the depths and found a drop-in amplitude of alpha waves in EEG. Even at this depth, hypnosis did not look like sleep. By the time they reach the fear barrier, pulse rate is very slow, and the reported strong fear does not result in increase in heart rate. However, at this time I find the EEG flooded with theta waves.’

‘As my subjects go far beyond the usual involvement in hypnosis, they become profoundly relaxed, immobile and cold. They no longer speak. Heartrate drops and breathing becomes slow and shallow. It takes a long time to go to the depths and I give my hypnotic virtuosi a long time to come back. I always maintain contact by holding the wrist in case verbal contact is lost.’

One does not use these levels of hypnosis therapeutically; it is unsafe and unnecessary. If a subject accidently goes a long way beyond the depth you meant, bring her slowly and confidently back to a good working depth.

[Note: Wow! Remember John C. Lilly’s research with altered states of consciousness using a combination of psychedelic drugs, hypnosis, sensory deprivation in salt-filled floatation tank, and simultaneous hook up to an EEG? I was subjected to this very process during my core splitting at the ‘psychedelic level’ of consciousness. This same level was sought in Project Stargate. During all the training phases of all these procedures, my brain wave activity was monitored. Drugs were used to lower the fear response. Theta waves were relevant to reaching the interdimensional level of dissociation I described in earlier chapters.]

HYPNOSIS ABILITY

People vary in their responsiveness to hypnosis and, when it is formally measured, hypnotisability is distributed in a large, unselected population, in a more or less normal distribution, more like an ability than a personality trait. About 2/10 of a large population will be very hypnotisable, about 2/10 won't respond at all, and the rest distributed in the typical bell-shaped normal distribution, from a little bit hypnotisable to quite hypnotisable.

FOCUS IN DISSOCIATION (aka, Double-Tracking)

Wendy-Louise Walker considered dissociation in the context of child development. Inheritance determines variability in proneness to double track or dissociate. Dissociation is not normal or abnormal, but simply a cognitive style. Those with a marked capacity to dissociate (whose upbringing did not inhibit development of the gift) are highly hypnotisable. Walker wrote:

> We then divided our very-young dissociation-prone into two pathways:
> (1) those who were abused, or who suffered horrendously in childhood,
> (2) those who did not suffer undue damage.

[Note: Walker gives no reference to the sample of children she refers to here. This sounds like the Holsworthy child victim sample Ben spoke of. Walker included 'burn victims' in the sample of very young kids who suffered horrendously in childhood. Does this mean kids were burned at Holsworthy, the way Nazis experimented with burns?]

THE RELATIVELY UNDAMAGED

The non-abused dissociation-prone child would naturally develop skills of double tracking (to alleviate boredom) and some splitting of affect and cognition (where appropriate). She would also develop capacity for loss of self in experience (i.e., 'absorption') to alleviate boredom and stress (e.g., love of nature, fiction), especially when her childhood lifestyle facilitated this. Such children learned spontaneously to use fantasy not just for fun or escape, but for rehearsing difficult situations.

We noted that highly hypnotisable people did not have a set particular personality type.

[Note: Having no set personality type allows for creating multiple new personalities within all MK child recruits. It also says that creating personalities will not affect hypnotisability.]

When highly hypnotisable subjects presented for therapy (whose hypnotic gifts hadn't been distorted by child abuse) Walker taught them about the gifts and vulnerabilities of the highly hypnotisable. This is the script she suggested using with clients:

> You have a special kind of gift, being highly hypnotisable, that only about 1 or 2 in 20 people have. It is almost certainly inherited. Since you have doubtless learned that we get nothing for nothing, there is a flip side, a set of vulnerabilities that go with this gift, and it is important to recognise and manage these.

[Note: Victims like me were continually told we were 'special.' Use of this word creeps me out and tells me this is grooming and predatory language. I would be concerned that any high IQ adult is vulnerable to being recruited via hypnosis administered by any member of the Australian Hypnosis Society.]

Dissociation-proneness. You have demonstrated in the hypnotisability scale that you can run two tracks of mental processes at once; the gift is great flexibility and interest. For flexibility you pay in error proneness in any complex system. When you are tired, have a hangover or have been stressed, it is easy to feel separated from the rest of the world; or less than a whole person.*

[Note: A hangover caused me to dissociate and experience a vivid visual flashback to serving in Nicaragua.]

When faced with life-threatening crisis, you are likely to split off from your panic or distress and focus just on calm problem solving, and this is fine as long as you retrieve and work through the feelings a bit later (not leaving them split-off and not accessible to memory as part of your life experience).

High level of suggestibility both in and out of altered states. This is one of the correlates of high hypnotisability and it means that, even in the waking state, people of this kind are extremely responsive to suggestion both in the sense of compliance (by behaviour or experience) and incorporation of the content of evaluative suggestions into the self-system. This is an open invitation to those in the family and workplace to play the highly hypnotisable with guilt and manipulation.*

Recognising this, the subject must learn to be aware of the processes of suggestion and to evaluate which suggestions will be accepted and which rejected. This can cause a quite radical increase in experienced self-esteem! Further, self-talk is a very important medium of change for the highly hypnotisable, since they can respond to their own suggestions (compliance and incorporation into the self-concept) and, aware of this, they learn to recognise when they are producing negative feelings by their negative self-talk.

[Note: Hence why Gittinger had me write my own script, since the programming is better accepted and will stick if I create the scenario and imagery.]

Capacity for loss of self in experience, absorption, vivid imagery. This is the area of choice for selecting treatment methods in hypnosis for the highly hypnotisable, as it teaches them flexible and creative ways of living and of producing an harmonious and joyous inner life. This can involve using music as the pathway in, through and out of trance, using other artistic media like poetry if it suits your own style, eliciting and modifying emotional responses, rehearsing coping in difficult situations. I have a comprehensive workshop in imaginative involvement and music which I love teaching.*

Anxiety-proneness and proneness to phobia are associated with high hypnotisability, but on the other hand, such patients have the gifts to learn to manage the vulnerability with great style and flourish.

[Note: The above description fits the creative, high visual-spatial IQ individual I described in Relevance of Intelligence. High IQ children make the best hypnosis candidates, which is another reason why Gittinger targeted the likes of me.]

THE ABUSED OR BADLY DAMAGED HIGHLY HYPNOTISABLE

If dissociation-proneness, absorption and suggestibility are hallmarks of those who have inherited high hypnotisability, if these children are severely abused, sexually, physically or psychologically, the gifts of dissociation and absorption are their only coping mechanism. Their gifts develop in highly distorted and pathological ways, with multiple personality disorder and other highly abnormal dissociative disorders like fugue states at the extreme. Less extreme will be disorders of reality perception and self-perception, which may lead to mistaken diagnoses of schizophrenia or borderline personality.

Substance abuse distorts and amplifies tendency to dissociate. Alcohol is particularly potent.

Alcohol is dangerous when regularly combined with marijuana. However, opiates lessen dissociation proneness for a time, which may be why many formerly abused young people end up addicted to heroin.

These patients display a great range of symptoms and in therapy they often fear abuse, have a terrible lack of trust, and a terror of loss of control. They are horrendously difficult and complicated to work with but, of course, very rewarding sometimes.

The central aims of therapy are to achieve unity of personality, with acceptance and re-education of the less likeable parts, control, and a capacity for peace, joy and love.

Re-parenting is often a relevant concept in understanding what is needed in therapy. Teaching the patient eventually to understand and redevelop her hypnotic gifts is part of therapy.

[Note: Acceptance of the less likeable parts is what I found the most difficult aspect of the integration process. To integrate these splits or parts, I had to break their cycles of pain and feelings that manifested as mood swings or sensory flashbacks. I had to recall, observe, feel, and acknowledge (i.e., actually relive) the abuse experiences committed to create and maintain each part. Then I had to, in my mind, visualise comforting and verbally acknowledging their abuse. Then I had to visualise physically cleaning and dressing the part and move her to a pleasant mental location for her to permanently reside, to replace her previous nightmare place in my mind. For example, and in my mind, I physically bathed young alters in the bath in my early childhood home. Then I sat them on the 1960's vinyl lounge in my actual childhood home, turned on our old TV, and handed them two spoons and a jar of the Italian choc-hazelnut spread my mother would buy from an inner Sydney delicatessen.

The amazing thing is, during this reprocessing, I recalled details of our bathroom and lounge that I could not previously remember. This entire process aligns with Walker's emphasis on the therapist's reparenting of the child parts.]

GENERAL COMMENTS ON DISSOCIATION, REPRESSION & HYPNOSIS

That hypnosis partially suspends some important controls of consciousness, allows a great deal of flexibility in hypnotherapy. While hypnosis does not magically enhance memory, it facilitates retrieval of memories unaccessible to awareness, whether they be repressed, stored in somewhat dissociated memory banks, or simply overlaid by the passage of time and difficult to access.

Trains of thought or very strong feelings can be terminated appropriately in the session, and suggested amnesia can be used as an optional temporary defence to prevent the patient from being overwhelmed with distressing memories until she can cope with them.

INCREASED COMPLIANCE & SUGGESTION WITH HIGHLY HYPNOTISABLE

The general increase in compliance with suggestion means that subjects usually focus attention as requested, and experience or do what the hypnotist requested of them. Carried through into post-hypnotic suggestion, the therapist can influence motivation in the waking state, sometimes mood for a time; and suggestion, as mentioned earlier, is used to carry what is learned in the dissociated state of hypnosis into behaviour and experience in everyday life. Subjects in hypnosis are also more liable to incorporate statements by the hypnotist into their ego systems, their beliefs and values relating to themselves. The therapist must be careful not to create conflict by making suggestions that are contrary to the patient's central values or personal goals.

IMAGINATIVE INVOLVEMENT

Walker said: 'The increased vividness of sensory imagery in hypnosis, the enhanced subjective involvement in what is imagined, the loss of self in experience… This is my own very favourite area.' [Note: Walker preferred the main feature of MK programming.]

THE GIFTS & VULNERABILITIES OF THE HIGHLY HYPNOTIZABLE: RELEVANCE FOR THERAPY

This paper discusses the gifts and vulnerabilities of highly hypnotizable clients. It also explores the relevance for therapy of those in this category and the differences between those who are damaged (e.g., traumatized) and those who are not damaged.

Gordon Hammer taught: Only those in the far-right tail of the norm distribution are actually hypnotized at all.

Highly hypnotizable subjects experience major and complex shifts in consciousness, and they are simply different. This view is supported by the research and writings of the Spiegels, the Hilgards, and Wendy-Louise Walker's own work and self-observations.

Hypnotisability is more an ability, a cognitive style, rather than a personality trait. There is almost certainly a genetic factor in hypnotisability. The learning and experiences that foster or inhibit development of hypnotisability, are relevant to therapy. Walker wrote:

The role of abuse in childhood is almost certain to exaggerate, or make pathological, the capacity for dissociation and double tracking (c.f., compartmentalization) with which the highly hypnotizable are born.

[Note: Walker demonstrated familiarity with the notion that, traumatising high IQ kids induced the dissociation and brain compartmentalisation necessary for creating mind-controlled slaves.]

One study showed that undamaged highly hypnotizable subjects reported using dissociation when very upset as children…

Walker described the highly hypnotizable as 'probably stimulus hungry.'

For the highly hypnotizable, hypnosis accentuates a process they already practise. Focus of attention is the access key. Hypnotic suggestion is the driving program. Walker wrote:

The highly hypnotizable go in and out of altered states of awareness, and switch hemispheres, quite readily.

They do not need a 'crisis' or to have been abused, to shift. The undamaged highly hypnotizable keep themselves to themselves [i.e., introverts]. They may occupy all sorts of jobs but tend to gravitate to the arts. When they are actors, they go for method acting rather than Lawrence Olivier's carefully constructed performances.

Looser background controls of consciousness lead to greater flexibility, which leads both to creativity and to increased error. The highly hypnotizable are a group for whom background controls are very readily lifted; indeed, they often spontaneously shift this control. When highly hypnotizable people are damaged, upset or drunk, they can appear strange, but are clearly differentiated from schizophrenics.

DISSOCIATION PRONENESS

Dissociation is the double tracking of consciousness. It is not a disease process but something that some (1 to 2 in 20 people) do easily and habitually.

Double tracking is par for the course for the highly hypnotizable, engaging two competent sets of cognitive processes, with self-awareness and executive awareness flitting back and forth. This hinders total recall, since memory access is easier with material that was in the central focus of conscious attention. Advantage: great flexibility, rarely get bored, can get a lot done. Disadvantage: memory gaps, especially when tired. However:

The second consciousness track can often be accessed by entering other information, especially sensory information.

SPLITTING AFFECT FROM COGNITION

There may also be dissociation in the meaning of splitting of affective components of cognition and memory. Highly hypnotizable people use this as a conscious mechanism in an emergency. When it is unconscious and extensive, it is a defence mechanism. Advantage: excellent for crisis, can put terror aside, ride with the demands, carry on 'as if in a trance' [Note: An essential DELTA soldier ability]. For the non-damaged highly hypnotizable there is no problem: They need to process the feelings soon after the event, just postpone a little, meet the practicalities first, and then weep. [Note: This is why I was allowed moments to cry and grieve, under the supervision of Patricia Anne Conlon.] For the damaged, this is done automatically, non-volitionally, then it splits off feelings from perceptions and cognitions; if this is in a major way, life becomes unreal, bleak, two-dimensional, and they may be misdiagnosed as schizophrenic!

There can be a splitting off of whole systems.

Dissociation may also refer to the splitting off of relatively sizeable chunks of consciousness (systems of cognitions, motivations, and patterns of affect) separated by walls of amnesia.

There is major loss of control, with MPD and fugue states as the extreme. The damaged highly hypnotizable tend to use dissociation in a maladaptive way, as a defence, rather than repression. These major maladaptive dissociations may very likely be initiated and fostered in childhood.

Highly hypnotizable people, even those without damaged personalities, have more of a sense of multiplicity, they have looser controls of consciousness. Multiple personality is the abnormal extreme. An important goal with highly hypnotizable patients, who come for help because they have been damaged, is fostering a sense of flexible unity in the personality, of accepting the different facets. [i.e., Integration.]

The spontaneous emergence of primary process thought in the waking state is more frequent among the highly hypnotizable, and primary process thought is more frequent in hypnosis compared with the waking state.

EVERYDAY IMAGINITIVE INVOLVEMENT & SPONTANEOUS HYPNOSIS

Non-damaged highly hypnotizable people report this area with pleasure and commonly produce it on purpose and guard against it when it is likely to seem inappropriate. Damaged patients have less ability to shift consciousness and have a sense of loss of control of consciousness in everyday life, and a fear of this. Walker's own work on imaginative involvement suggests that it can be a great refuge and a rich and growth-provoking experience. Equally vividly, it can create a sense of doom. For example, if a husband is late home and the thought that he might be dead emerges, the highly hypnotizable can experience trains of imagery and affect which are quite commonly self- propelling. The flexibility and vivid loss of self in imagined experience with access to vivid emotional responses accessible to the highly hypnotizable, are great for problem solving, magical, but need to be kept on leash.

For the undamaged highly hypnotizable, this is the quality-of-life dimension. They automatically use this for stress management (e.g., get lost in nature, sparrows in rain puddles, off with music). They use it for problems-solving (e.g., rehearsal), for recreation.

They read novels and poetry and extend their life experience and spirituality. Sometimes things just ‘pop into their heads’…

The damaged highly hypnotizable tend to underutilize this dimension as a source of entertainment, wonder and joy. Also, it is their major source of unharnessed, negative and overwhelming suffering. The goal then is to teach them controls and limits. The negative future is created and reacted to, and negative suggestions are amplified imaginatively into complex vistas of creative suffering, with ensuing wear and tear on the body. The greatest gift of being highly hypnotizable becomes shut off, because it can generate such suffering. For therapy: Teach about the area, teach how to use self-direction, self-talk to direct these processes, controlled involvement.

SUGGESTIBILITY

Both damaged and undamaged highly hypnotizable people are highly suggestible, both in the sense of compliance with suggestion, and in terms of incorporating suggestion into the self-concept. The undamaged highly hypnotizable learn to protect themselves against undue invasion quite early in childhood. The damaged highly hypnotizable are confused and tortured by this dimension, and continue the suffering with negative self-talk, which acts as suggestion. Teach the damaged highly hypnotizable about their qualities, teach them to have imagined ‘force fields’ around them. Teach them to evaluate suggestions before responding or incorporating. Teach them to use self-talk in a positive and creative way. Education is a powerful modality in therapy and is very necessary for the highly hypnotizable. Teach further limiting and harnessing of their great gifts.

HYPNOTIST INTERACTION

There are differences here according to transference and reality components of the relationship, and according to whether it is taking place in the context of therapy or research. The highly hypnotizable can be very concrete in receiving instructions, but they may not always be compliant. Even in research, with the weakening of executive control in hypnosis, one may find spontaneous regression or abreaction. This occurs infrequently in research because of the contract. Interpersonal relationships are greatly intensified when we use hypnosis in therapy, especially with the highly hypnotizable. The relationship needs to be kept safe, and proper limits set.

HIGH HYPNOTISABILITY & MEMORY

Spiegel suggests that the highly hypnotizable have very good memory, but they are probably prone to amnesia gaps. Many of the memory problems of damaged highly hypnotizable patients are probably dissociative rather than repressive.

Gifted subjects are skilful at alternative accessing of memory stores, e.g., by using sensory imagery rather than words to access memory.

[Note: This points to Gittinger’s extensive combining of visualisation and hypnosis to structure multiple personalities. It also helps explain how and why *Art Ther*apy can effectively access MK memories. It also suggests that these memories are technically dissociated – not repressed, and that effective therapy should focus on integration.]

TREATMENT IMPLICATIONS

Walker emphasised the notion of, first of all, fostering a sense of control and unity at the central core of personality. Use hypnotic techniques in the beginning to foster this sense. Teach the subject what it feels like going in and out of hypnosis, and to defend against trancelike consciousness in inappropriate situations via voluntary barriers. Emphasize in and out of hypnosis, the joys of having a creative and flexible mind, but emphasize also that we get nothing for nothing. Anxiety proneness and the sense of the mind slipping out of gear, are liabilities that accompany the gift. For self-hypnosis, use ritual such as listening to a piece of beautiful music with trance directed by that music, and the direct suggestion with such beautiful music that no negative or discordant experience is possible. With highly hypnotizable clients, it is also very easy to transfer fragments of the hypnotic state into waking habits.

Highly hypnotizable people are unpredictable to hypnotize; they require sensitivity and attention; and 'routine' hypnosis is not suitable. Get constant feedback about what is being experienced and learn to use language appropriately. The damaged, highly hypnotizable person needs structure and clear definition of the hypnotic experience. Their needs are somewhat different from less hypnotizable people, and from my 40-plus years of experience with them, 'indirect' methods are often quite noxious to them.

COMBINING MUSIC & WORDS AS A PATHWAY THROUGH HYPNOSIS: PRACTICAL GUIDELINES

Music has powerful effects on consciousness and, combined with appropriate hypnotic words to guide attention and experience, makes a natural pathway into hypnosis. Music makes an effective deepening technique. Music can also be used as the primary focus of attention for induction. Also, when hypnosis is achieved, music can be an effective vehicle for carrying verbal suggestions, a primary stimulus for production of emotional experiences, or a background for therapeutic fantasy, guided imagery, or imaginal rehearsal.

Hilgard (1979) noted that her highly hypnotisable subjects were more likely than less hypnotisable ones to become absorbed in classical music rather than pop or jazz. [Note: I was raised with rock music and forced to watch Countdown weekly. While my teenage peers listened to The Cure, Sex Pistols and U2, I preferred Mozart, Handel and Bach.]

Sensory imagery elicited by 'imaginative' music is more vivid and subjectively real in hypnosis than in the waking state. Sensory imagery tends to be highly individual across different subjects. There is more loss of self in the experience of listening to music in hypnosis than in the waking state. [Note: Disney's Fantasia, which relied on this phenomenon, was used for programming.]

COMBINING MUSIC & WORDS FOR HYPNOSIS INDUCTION

If hypnotic instruction is combined with the correct consciousness-altering music, the two inputs augment each other. Music as a focus of attention is more attention-holding than watching a spot on the wall. Music reduces intrusive thoughts during moving into hypnosis.
Walker used flute, guitar, and lute music of Bach's Arioso, Boccherini, Vivaldi, Handel and others, and Celtic harp music. Highly hypnotisable subjects prefer music that captures consciousness (e.g., Baroque). Baroque chamber music can make excellent deepening music, a slow rendition of Pachelbel's Canon, can be powerful as a deepening pathway. Renaissance dance music can also be effective, and the suggestion would be that the mind dance into hypnosis with the music.

When music is combined with the hypnotist's verbal suggestions, the highly hypnotisable can't recall the verbal suggestions after the hypnosis

[Note: MK-ULTRA programming is characterised by an inability to remember the abuse. The role of music in that process seems obvious, after reading Wendy-Louise Walker's hypnosis methods.]

CONCLUSION

Reading between the lines as Ben suggested, I found Wendy-Louise Walker's writings validated my memories. They strike me as clandestine instructions for accessing high-IQ trauma victims. They seem to elucidate things Walker can't mention in professional journals. Walker's writings suspiciously lack mainstream research references to support how she acquired much of her knowledge. She provides almost no referencing for how she reached her conclusions, what subjects were used, or the nature of the research from which her conclusions were drawn. Consequently, I'm inclined to believe Ben: Walker's knowledge of hypnosis was founded on unethical hypnosis, drug experiments, and Nazi-style torture and trauma conducted on little children kept in cages like lab rats beneath Sydney military bases.

I had a dream where I stumbled upon a five-year-old girl with long straight dark blonde hair floating face down in a starfish position I a shallow wading pool. It was me. My brain was telling me the age I was when Wendy-Louise Walker drowned and electrocuted me.

'That was horrendous,' I complained. 'That was the worst session in six years. It left me in shock for days. Jon accidentally startled me the next day and I screamed my head off again. I just don't want that again. I did a full year of that and it's just too painful.'

'What was so bad about last week?' my therapist asked.

'Oh, perhaps drowning plus whole-body electrocution in every orifice is incredibly painful!'

'But we've processed equally painful experiences before, like drowning and -…'

'Yeah, I know. The Dagon drowning ritual was worse. I don't know…'

'Can I tell you my take on it?'

I nodded.

'I reckon there's more.'

'Shut up! I don't want to hear that.'

'Well, we could do week-on, week-off, and concentrate on stabilising and calming you in between sessions?'

'That's just annoying. If we're gonna do it, I'd rather just rip the bandage off in one go.'

'That's what I figured.'

'I don't have a fucking choice, do I?! I'm between a rock and a hard place. If I don't do the memory recalling, I suffer all the same emotions and pain attached to the memories anyhow, and this keeps cycling until I diffuse it. So, I recall the trauma, integrate that part – and then it starts all over again with another memory. But at least the remaining stuff isn't compounded by the recently surfaced stuff.'

I phoned my friend who had experienced the same programming and asked her why she thought the previous session was so painful.

'Obviously it's opened up whole new batch of trauma memories.'

'Oh, shut up! That's exactly what my therapist said!'

They were both right.

The induction began with an image of my floating down to earth on a cloud.

'Like Monkey?' I asked.

'Yes, like Monkey.'

That's easy, I thought. Monkey was one of my favourite TV shows as a kid.

He began counting forwards to ten. 'What do you notice?'

'White haze. I see a pink lotus flower. Someone is sitting on a cloud, crossed-legged, beneath a rainbow. He's dressed in a gold-orange-yellowish robe. He's bald. He's a swami. He's wearing wooden beads. Keep counting.'

He began counting to 20.

'Black,' I said. Keep counting.'

'…twenty-nine…thirty.'

'Red. I see red. Keeping going.'

'…forty.'

'Pink. I see a birthday party. People are up close, dressed in party hats. One blows one of those whistles with a paper tongue.'

'…fifty.'

'Green. It's colour programming.'

'…sixty.'

'Yellow.'

'…seventy.'

'Orange.'

'…eighty.'

'Light blue. It's a multi-coloured stick of rock candy with segments of different flavours stuck together.'

'…ninety.'

'Light grey. It's changed. I see a pack of coloured Textas now.'

'…one hundred. What do you see?'

I continued counting in my own mind, taking myself deeper, to two hundred. I recalled standing in a vat of liquid, at Lucas Heights nuclear reactor, looking up at White Coats working on perforated metal deck surrounding reactor. I per down and see feet are in water. I am standing on some kind of translucent blue surface which is lit up from beneath. My arms are bound. 'I'm stuck. I can only see right. You have to guide me so I can turn my head.'

'Look around.'

'I see the exit to a corridor directly ahead. There is a light source behind me. My arms are tied. They're doing something with, with radioactivity. You know -…'

'Isotopes?'

'Yeah, something like that. I don't understand.'

At the end of the session, I was left feelings confused because I had not identified the part responsible for these memory fragments. I was still feeling the part's emotions. So, I did a 20-minute session with Ros, to identify who was holding the memory. I identified 'Red Alice' and that her system existed behind a red door at back of the Alice in Wonderland setting located behind Gittinger's green door.

I slipped right into Red Alice's memories and immediately remembered the missing fragments. 'Red Alice was the part trained in psychology. She was the one who scanned the MMPI data in class and concluded in minutes that the female patient should not work with a male therapist. Red Alice was trained by Wendy-Louise Walker. They trained me to maybe take her place at Holsworthy. That's why they let me study psychology. They thought I might go back and work for them. And I almost did. I actually started looking at applications for ASIO. I read their requirements and had never seen such a fit for my abilities. It was perfect. And Bond encouraged the ASIO application, saying how 'perfect' I would be for that job. They threw me out of psychology the moment they realised I wasn't going back.'

Red Alice's memory system clearly recalled the order and significance of the memory fragments. 'Wendy-Louise Walker visited me at Nanna's house. She did the induction in her kitchen. I was three. She attached the Red Alice alter to my sexual assault beneath the kitchen table. She was there for the assault, instigated and orchestrated it. Kidman was the one seated naked at the table. Wendy-Louise Walker created an induction based on a real stick of multi-coloured rock candy plus a packed of Textas. It all happened there in Nanna's kitchen. I remembered standing in the kitchen later at age 14, with my back to the sink, thinking about it.

'The birthday party was a mock party for my sixth birthday. It happened at Holsworthy, the day after the hunting party by the ocean above Kiama. I was upset about my birthday being ruined, so they put on party hats and teased me about it. Kidman was the man who blew the whistle in my face.

'And the incident at Lucas Heights occurred in the reactor room. They were agitating the molecules in my body with electricity, or something like that, to affect the radiation somehow? I don't exactly know what that was about.'

Doing voice dialogue with the parts calmed everything down in just 20 minutes. Ros typically asked: 'What was your role, job, what did you have to do?' and add, 'I'm really sorry you had to do that.' Ros doesn't create a whole lot of emotion but tries to keep the alter in her left brain while reminiscing. There is no exact formula for treatment, because the abuse process is too individualised. The process is tailored to the client's voice tone and body language during therapy.

The therapist quickly gains the part's respect and trust when he exhibits genuine care and concern for the person, plus demonstrates knowledge of the part's system, perpetrators, mind control techniques, and what the alter has generally experienced.

During my next session, the induction was based on coloured jellybeans, because that was another cue Wendy-Louise Walker used to hypnotise me. Again, I fell down the rabbit hole and landed on Gittinger's foyer floor. I headed directly for the red door located at the far end of the Wonderland set.

On the other side of the red door I found myself in a cluttered pantry lit up with a red light, like a photographer's dark room. I emerged into my grandmother's Engadine kitchen. It was broad daylight. I walked into the loungeroom. There I saw my 21-month-old self, wearing in a long-sleeved white flower girl dress. I stayed with Helena Holowczak while my mother was in hospital with my brother Dale who was born six weeks premature on 26 July 1971.

About the same time, I was back at Nanna's being measured for a flower girl dress for the wedding of Helen's Slavic friend. This was the very first time I was left alone with Nanna. I was there at least a week.

I was seated in a tiny chair with my little white head cocked to one side, leaning on my right hand. I was listening intently to Wendy-Louise Walker who sat opposite me on the lounge. Antony Kidman sat in an armchair to my right. It was Kidman who orally raped me beneath Helen's kitchen table. That is my first memory of being sexually assaulted – by psychologist Antony Kidman, in the presence and under the instruction of, psychologist Wendy-Louise Walker.

'Take the little girl and lead her into the kitchen,' my therapist suggested.

'I can do that,' I agreed. 'I can freeze frame the loungeroom scene.'

'Yes, because this is inside your mind and you are in control… Sit her at the table. With you… Now, is there anyone else who would like to join you?'

'A whole bunch. Their faces are blurred out. I'm confused.' A pain struck my heart. 'They stored Red Alice in my heart. They flatlined me at ten. The heart contains actual brain-like memory. Doctor Chang knew this. It was his specialty…'

My head began to throb – a tell-tale sign of electrocution and alter creation. An image returned to mind, the same one I had during the previous session. 'I remember being tall and leaning with my back to the kitchen sink, staring at the room and remembering back to when I was first abused by these people - in my grandmother's kitchen. It was her, leaning against the sink. You need to talk to Red Alice.'

Therapist: 'Invite her to sit at the table. I'll join her there.'

I visualised the four of us at the table. 'Hey, this is weird. I can actually picture us around the table!'

There ensued a heated discussion between Red Alice and my therapist, about her difficulty connecting with him.

'I'm sorry,' he eventually conceded.

I moved into Alice's mind and began to explain: 'Wendy-Louise Walker made me. She taught me psychology. I'm the one who rapidly scanned that MMPI in psychology class. They compartmentalised my natural ability and enhanced it by shutting out all distraction and increasing focus and a-…'

'Attention,' my therapist nodded.

'Which is the key to all enhancement. They were training me to take over from Wendy, to become a perpetrator. They had me do the same to other kids.'

I drew Red Alice seated at the table, for my therapist to see just how evil she was.

'She's dripping in blood,' I said.

'Hey,' he cooed, 'she was just a little kid. It wasn't her fault… Why don't you go put your arm around her?'

I'm so sorry, I consoled Alice. I led her into the bathroom nearby, ran a bath, and began to bathe her. The bath quickly filled with blood. So, I emptied and refilled the bath, and tried bathing her again, washing her hair. I almost had her clean when she grabbed a blade and slashed her left wrist.

'It's not working! She just slit her wrist. She's the one who slit my wrist all those years ago.' I showed my therapist the small scar on my left wrist. 'She was trying to communicate what happened. It's not working because she wants me to know what she did. That's the pattern: I remember what they made the part do, and then she can be washed and safely stored.'

Tap-tap-tap…

I mentally re-entered the small cluttered red-lit room. This time, I emerged into a Delta operation. It was dark and green. I wore night vision goggles. I saw a man seated on a lounge. It was an ambush… an assassination.

'She did assassinations. Delta shot entire families. Kids, everyone. We made it look like the father killed his entire family and blamed it on him. What a nightmare…' Sometimes Delta teams shot the adult members of a family and took their children for trafficking.

I had seen enough. I bathed Red Alice again, this time in the shower, due to the memory of my step-grandfather sexually abusing us in the bath. Alice broke down crying in the shower, her head flopped forward, and her wet body convulsed so she could hardly stand. I consoled her again and dried her. I turned and was surprised to find a long white linen dress suspended on a clothes hanger.

Now I had to find a place for her to rest, both her and the toddler.

'She's had enough of this world,' I explained. 'She wants out.'

I know where I can put you. You don't have to be here anymore.

I visualised a portal to the garden I saw during my childhood near death experiences, where the children were dressed in white linen.

I led Alice and my toddler self to the portal and said:

Go and wait for me there. I'll join you later, when I'm done here...

Integrating Red Alice was significant because suddenly, the evil perpetrated against me during my psychology studies at Bond University lost its rawness and faded into an old, distant, vague memory. Further, I suddenly lost my superior ability to create words with Scrabble letters. I was becoming like the Pink Floyd song: 'comfortably numb...'

The next therapy session began with a memory of a mobile made of phthalo blue-green coloured mica teardrops that hung at Wendy-Louise Walker's home. I was seated in a chair beneath an awning at the rear of her home, focussing my attention on the mobile.

Next, I revisited the house we ambushed at night. Again, I entered via the small room cluttered with pots and pans and emerged in the loungeroom. Again, I saw the green hue suggesting we wore night vision goggles. Again, I saw a chubby aging man seated on the couch. I put a bullet in the man's head and indicated to my three accomplices to search the three doorways to our right. I headed toward the dark opening to the kitchen ahead. I saw a flash of a small girl reclining on the old man but wondered if I were imagining things. I entered the kitchen and noticed a small pantry across the room. Inside the pantry I saw a small figure crouched in the corner.

'It's just a doll,' I told my therapist.

'Oh, that's okay,' he sighed.

'No,' I explained, 'I see a doll because it's okay to shoot a doll.'

Tap…tap…tap…

'I see flashes of blue, green and yellow doors.' I sighed, 'Of course. We did the red door. These are Wendy's other doors.'

Therapist: 'Let's open them up and see what's inside.'

Behind the yellow door I saw a Holsworthy science lab. 'I see a lab bench like we had in science at school, only there's a sink in it.' The picture cleared and I saw the torso of a young blonde boy lying on a metal table. 'It's a wet lab. This is where they did autopsies on the kids in cages. They cut them open to see the effects of their experiments. Lots of kids. An endless supply…'

Behind the blue door I saw my teenage self, standing in front of a chalk board, delivering lessons on strategy to a group of six-year-old children seated cross-legged on the floor. Wendy-Louise Walker and her friends sat observing from the back of the room, impressed with my teaching style.

Behind the green door I saw a classroom with rows of desks facing a board. My teenage self was sat at a desk, being taught the military application of psychological test after test after test… 'This is what clinicians use these tests,' said my instructor, 'but this is what the test was actually designed for…'

Therapist: 'Is there a white door?'

'There's always a white door,' I lamented.

Behind the white door was thick fog that cleared to reveal the fat Tibetan monk meditating beneath the rainbow. Then I noticed an endless hallway lined both sides with every coloured door, like a mega pack of Texta felt pens…

'Wendy created so many doors when I was young, so that whenever she needed to lay some new programming throughout my development, she just had to pick one of the ready-made coloured doors.

Therapist: 'Doors within doors…'

Our next session focussed on accessing the myriad of multicoloured doors that lay behind Wendy-Louise Walker's white door of hypnosis. My mind fell on the mica mobile at Walker's house. Then I recalled her making me focus on a shiny Christmas decoration hanging from the doorway lintel separating the kitchen and loungeroom of my grandmother's Engadine home.

I had to recall an irritated Red Alice from her hiatus to help me access the doors.

'I need the trigger word.'

It was ‘Black Widow.’

I opened a green door to my left and found a giant spider’s lair based on the demon in Lord of the Rings. Behind that I found a memories of luring targets with sex and assassinating them.

Next was a pink door. Behind this I saw a bunch of pink helium balloons. Then I saw lemon tea cake and women gathered for a baby shower in a mafia drug lord’s mountaintop mansion.

Behind a yellow door I saw a white civilian looking CIA plane. In the next snippet I saw me being accompanied by a Delta operative through a Havanan marketplace.

Behind a red door I saw terracotta brick paving in Tuscany…

The rainbow of doors represented Delta assignments and tactical programs laid by Wendy-Louise Walker at Holsworthy Army Base.

Psychology 101

You can be a psychologist like a rock star and have fame and money - and that's what I intend to do.
- Martin Seligman, CIA psychologist

The white uniformed figures shifted in and out of focus as they rushed about my limp form, sticking things onto my chest, and inserting things into my arms.

‘Do you wish you were dead now?!’ someone yelled at me.

‘Nooo…’ I moaned.

‘Have you ever harmed yourself before?’

‘No.’

Two weeks prior, I was a typical college student with no medical history, when I suddenly began suffering vertigo and insomnia. I was walking sideways into walls and had not slept for a fortnight. My GP found no apparent cause for the vertigo, and he prescribed sleeping pills – which I took all at once.

‘What happened last night?’ a doctor asked me the following morning.

My brother’s fiancé, who was also my best friend and roommate, arrived home late last night. I had taken a sleeping pill long before Rosalind awoke me, giggling about suddenly ending her engagement to my brother and marrying Glen instead.

Glen?! I was confused. She’s ditching her Tom Cruise lookalike high school sweetheart to marry some scumbag we just met at church?! I wondered what it was about his coke bottle glasses and 70’s porn star moustache that she found so attractive. Only weeks ago, this Glen had gushed, ‘I don’t know who I love more, Fiona or Rosalind.’

Rosalind’s revelation proved too much after recent events. Two weeks prior, my step-grandfather was found hanged to death in his chicken coop.

I did not feel my body as I floated to the kitchen, fetched the medicine bottle, unscrewed the lid, and downed its entire contents. I did not feel the pills touch my throat. I did not wonder whether it might be dangerous. All I remember thinking is, Now I’ll get to sleep. I was found unconscious the following morning.

‘Have you ever seen a psychiatrist before?’ a young psychiatric registrar asked. He would go on to fail his final psychiatric exam six times. I now wonder why he was rejected by the medical fraternity. Was he that talentless compared to the other morons I encountered in the industry? Or perhaps his rejection was punishment for encouraging me to remember.

‘Yes,’ I answered.

‘Who?’

‘Ian Cole.’

‘When was that?’

‘I was sixteen.’

‘Until when?’

‘Until I left school at eighteen.’

‘Who referred you to him?’

‘No one. I was friends with his daughter, and we were talking on the phone.’

‘Are you depressed again?’ Zoe had asked.

I was 16. Wasn’t everyone depressed at 16? I had always suffered a kind of existential depression which exacerbated as my home life deteriorated. What’s the meaning of life? I clearly recall despairing at age five years. What's the difference between dying when you are 80 and dying at eight, when you are going to die anyhow?

'Here's Dad!' Zoe passed the call to Dr Ian Cole.

That is how I ended up in psychotherapy two school lunchtimes per week without my parents' knowledge or a doctor's referral. It was an unconventional therapeutic relationship in other ways. Sometimes I attended the mega parties Ian Cole hosted at his Upper Burringbar property, where the smoke of incense and marijuana entwined as adults and minors lounged on Japanese inspired décor, sharing bongs. The revels were an extension of the '60s counterculture, where budding artist Ian Cole partied with Sydney's avant-garde scene in which parents got drunk and high, leaving a generation of kids to be preyed on by the likes of Dave.

Dave climbed into a bed at Ian Cole's house where Zoe's 14-year-old friend Sharon lay asleep. Sharon awoke to Dave sexually assaulting her. Ian put Sharon's subsequent trauma response down to a lack of 'open-mindedness.'

'Open-minded' is how Zoe described her model boyfriend Craig's attitude toward being drugged and raped at a gathering of teachers including his uncle, the principal who covered up the Education Department pedophile ring I eventually exposed. The morning after the party, Craig awoke in the bed of our gay Murwillumbah high school Careers teacher with no memory of how he got there. Terry Cleal stood naked in the bedroom doorway, mincing at Craig, 'It's okay, sweetie.'

Zoe had sex with Craig when she was 13 years old. Ian Cole's reaction to this was warning her daughter, 'Hey, don't get pregnant.' Ian's youngest daughter Jessie had sex with her boyfriend Gabe very young also. The Cole's were a living example of Margaret Mead's sexual revolution. Ian divorced Zoe's mother Kerry when Zoe was three, after he was caught screwing a nurse named Jan at the psychiatric hospital he worked at. His high school sweetheart, Kerry, attempted suicide after discovering the reason for Ian's regular overnight stays at work.

Ian Cole discarded his family like a fast food container and started a new one with the nurse. Zoe felt displaced by this, especially after her mother remarried and had a son to a domestic violence perpetrator. Suddenly Zoe and her older sister Billie belonged to no family. People dismiss the impact of divorce on the displaced children of the first marriage and its contribution to youth suicide. 'I love all my children equally!' Ian protested following Zoe's death. Zoe felt differently.

Zoe moved in with Ian's new family at the start of high school. Her arrival shoved a bomb beneath Ian's slice of hippie paradise. I was the only one who realised this was no Brady Bunch moment. I was the only one who detected the mental pain Zoe was in. I was the only person Zoe warned that she was contemplating suicide.

Zoe's older sister, Billie, joined Ian's family a few years later and graduated from my high school. Billie presented as a cold character who preferred the Japanese culture she eventually adopted. I never understood Billie until I had a daughter just like her. Zoe felt inferior to Billie who was voted school captain, dux of her grade, came second in the state for Japanese translation, and won the regional debating final. Zoe's lousy high school certificate marks seemed to be the final straw. She left for Germany where she lamented to her friend Emma, 'I can never go home until I'm famous.' I know because I visited Emma in Hamburg after Zoe's death.

Zoe was living in Sydney when I received her final letter. It contained one standout sentence scrawled in alien handwriting: 'Sometimes I feel like committing suicide…' I tried to show the letter to its intended reader - her father - but he rejected my concerns. ‘No, no!’ Ian threw his hands up in protest, ‘What goes on between you and Zoe is your business.’ He refused to read the letter.

Zoe’s subsequent suicide in Amsterdam instigated a wave of mourning that extended from Murwillumbah to Byron Bay. How could someone so pretty, talented, popular and strong kill herself, they wondered. Everyone was shocked - except me.

‘There were no signs!’ her father exclaimed.

Yes, there were. Zoe had been dropping hints for years. She began cutting her wrist while living in Sydney with Ian’s friends. ‘She’s just attention-seeking,’ the psychiatrist couple concluded.

I met Zoe’s mother in a Sydney restaurant.

‘Billie had warned me about meeting up with you,’ Kerry confessed halfway through lunch.

‘Really. What did she say?’

‘She said you were very intense.’

‘Well,’ I sighed indignantly, ‘suicide is pretty intense.’

‘Suicide is a one-way street. When I saw Zoe, she was lying on a metal table. She looked like a frozen lump of meat. The only thing that seemed natural was her hair, so I stroked that. That wasn’t Zoe lying there. Zoe was somewhere else -…’

As Kerry spoke, my brain turned her description of my dead friend into a movie which was stored in long-term memory as if I had been standing in that morgue. The mental image never faded but functioned as a suicide deterrent.

‘You know,’ she continued ‘it’s amazing. I had a guy, sitting exactly where you are, last week try and convince me that I should use cocaine.’

I eyeballed Kerry and asserted, ‘Don’t listen to him. He was lying. Cocaine won’t fix this.’ Cocaine was the recreational drug of the moment, hailed for being non-addictive. I knew otherwise.

Kerry continued, ‘I couldn’t get an autopsy done on Zoe because they don’t do that on suicides in Holland. But I suspect Zoe was pregnant to some guy called Dave. She kept going on and on about some guy called Dave. Who the fuck is Dave?’

My gut dropped. ‘Ian has a friend called Dave. It’s not him, is it? He’s old enough to be Zoe’s father.’

Kerry showed me a picture of Zoe in Greece - with Dave.

‘That’s him! Ugh! He’s a Vietnam Veteran. He was a patient of Ian’s. He doesn’t work. He hangs around Ian a lot. He’s on some huge veteran pension. He convinced the government psychiatrist to grant him the highest pension rate by picking up the psychiatrist’s desk and throwing it through the window. I met him at Ian’s parties. My friend spied him talking to Billie in town, constantly perving down her top. He’s a sleaze.’

Dave was present during my final visit to Ian Cole’s Upper Burringbar home. I sat at the kitchen table until midnight, watching the men get drunk and reminisce about Zoe. Toward the end of my visit, Ian confessed he had recently battled the compulsion to chop his family up with a carving knife. ‘I had to throw the knife up the back paddock,’ he explained. Then he smiled knowingly at me, ‘Do you want to see Zoe?!’

‘Okay,’ I shrugged, wondering what was about to happen.

Minutes later, my former psychiatrist returned with a wooden urn containing Zoe’s ashes. He fetched a dessert spoon from the kitchen draw, opened the urn lid, scooped out a spoonful of Zoe’s ashes – and ate them.

'The intent being,' Dave commentated, 'to return Zoe from whence she came.'
Ian abruptly closed the urn, gathered it under his arm, and rushed outside. I followed behind and watched him unceremoniously scatter my friend's ashes amongst the ginger plants next to the kitchen widow.

'I'm sane!' I yelled at God on my drive home that night. 'I'm sane! That was insane!'

I appealed to my current psychiatrist for help with Ian Cole's madness. Yet again, my concerns went unheeded. I was not surprised when Ian Cole committed suicide at his Upper Burringbar property two years later. Ian died of guilt. He paid a hefty price for 'free sex.'

A former close friend of Zoe's contacted me after reading the above story on my blog site. She and Zoe were best friends at an ACT primary school but lost contact after age 10. The friend unexpectedly encountered Zoe four years later at a Murwillumbah eisteddfod. Zoe did not greet her former best friend as expected. Instead, Zoe blurted something about being made to perform oral sex on an adult male - and walked off.

Some found my account of Ian eating Zoe's ashes far-fetched. Yet, Jessica Cole, the daughter Ian had with the nurse, subsequently published her memoir, Staying, which describes her father's decent into insanity following Zoe's suicide, including the time he was arrested for breaking into a stranger's house, smearing himself in excrement, and writing all over the walls.

USELESS PHYSICIANS

I have dealt with hundreds of counsellors, psychologists and psychiatrists as both a recipient and provider of mental health services. I have spoken to countless victims of ritual abuse and mind control. I have liaised with and advised therapists who work with victims. I experienced the criminal workings of the organisations that regulate and control the Australian mental health industry, and I have met other victims of these governing bodies. Based upon this wealth of experience, I must conclude that the Australian mental health industry is a putrid mess of dysfunction and corruption.

The experts in charge of the mental health industry responsible for determining who can practise what, are proven perpetrators. The therapists under their auspices are mostly complicit, lazy, incompetent, or nuts. Most therapists present to patients as condescending, unskilled, unempathetic, unethical, fearful, and generally useless. Most therapists are angry control freaks, of average intelligence, criminally insane, or sexual perverts. Most therapists lack the ethics, professionalism, and skill needed to support a client in general, never mind a victim of the most extreme abuse. Suitable therapists are rare. It took me 35 years to locate a clean, trauma-focussed, EMDR-trained, genuine Christian psychiatrist with expertise in treating ritual abuse and mind control.

I will now discuss the main reasons why victims of ritual abuse and mind control typically find it impossible to locate a suitable therapist who uses effective trauma and dissociation treatment methods. Australian therapists lack the ethics, knowledge and skills to effectively treat victims of extreme abuse, due to the following factors:

1. Australian universities have long been infiltrated by perpetrators of pedophilia and MK-ULTRA (as I demonstrated with Bond University);
2. Psychology theory and practise are based on MK-ULTRA experimentation;

3. Treatment interventions were designed to perpetuate and maintain trauma and dissociation; and
4. The CIA introduced denial theories which underpin all teaching, training, clinical and forensic practise in Australia.

MIND CONTROL ROOTS OF PSYCHOLOGY

The pioneers of psychology and psychiatry engaged in practises that were dubious, abhorrent, or just plain weird. Carl Jung based his writings on Alchemy and the ancient mystery cults, particularly Mithraism, and founded his own religious cult, the tenets of which are found in the New Age movement and the modern Kundalini-spirit-filled charismatic churches. [475] Sigmund Freud intentionally hid his clinical finding that his patients' 'hysteria' stemmed from dissociated memories of child sexual abuse:

> The event of which the subject has retained an unconscious memory is an unusually early experience of sexual relations with actual excitement of the genitals, resulting from sexual abuse committed by another person; and the period of life at which this fatal event takes place is earliest youth – the years up to the age of eight or 10, before the child has reached sexual maturity. A passive sexual experience before puberty: this then is the specific cause of hysteria… In some 18 cases of hysteria I have been able to discover this connection in every single case and, where the circumstances allowed, to confirm it by therapeutic success.[476]

Freud replaced his finding with the Oedipus Complex theory that children fantasise about have sex with their parents. Thanks to Freud, VIP pedophiles like his own grandson dismiss child abuse memories as 'false memories' and child abuse victims as 'fantasists.'
All modern psychology is mind control. Those Psychology 101 lectures we attended in college were a basic introduction to a military monster hidden in plain sight. Investigative journalist Hank Albarelli documented the CIA's employment of psychiatrists and psychologists to conduct their mind control experiments during the 1950s to '70s.[477] He concluded:

> Virtually anyone that was anybody in terms of psychology or psychiatry in the United States… virtually every doctor in the '50s and '60s, was on the CIA payroll.

Carl Rogers, father of humanistic psychology, documented his CIA recruitment in a 1956 memo to the University of Chicago's chancellor:

> Dr Harold Wolff of Cornell Medical School is one of the world's leading authorities in psychosomatic medicine… A week ago, he asked me if I would serve with him as a consultant to the Department of Defence on a top-secret matter having to do with mental health. He said, 'I am asking the five top-ranking men in the country in this field to serve on this task. You are one of the five, and I hope you will serve.

Harold Wolff was a world-famous neurologist appointed by the CIA Director to investigate Soviet brainwashing methods. He and fellow researcher Hinkie were the first to identify that the 'Soviet technique rested on the cumulative weight of intense psychological pressure and human weakness.' [478]

Carl Rogers built on Ivan Pavlov's research in which the Soviet paired a bell with electrocution to trigger fear in dogs at the sound of the bell. In 1959, the Human Ecology Fund financed Rogers to conduct MK-ULTRA research which examined the 'Correlation of Psychological and Physiological Variables in Personality and Personality Change.' Roger's study involved attaching electrodes to patients to 'ascertain their inner state of mind' and contributed to MK-ULTRA Subproject 97 which examined:

> Process of personality change during psychotherapy. Focus upon schizophrenics, with Control [group] composed of normal individuals. To provide certain techniques of influencing human behaviour that might have significance to the Agency.

B.F. Skinner, known as the father of operant conditioning, studied human responses to environmental cues. Two corollaries of his operant conditioning were aversion therapy and desensitization. Aversion therapy uses traumatic reinforcement like electric shock to reduce an unwanted behaviour. Skinner was a consultant to Ole Ivar Lovaas, who was hired by Major Louis Jolyon West to conduct MK-ULTRA experiments at UCLA. Documented in mainstream newspapers and magazines, including Psychology Today,[479] these experiments involved behavioural conditioning of autistic children using cattle prods, physical violence, and electrocution via a metal floor.

John B. Watson, father of behaviourism, produced an animal phobia in the famous baby named Albert who consequently suffered permanent mental health issues in adulthood. Watson boasted: 'Give me the baby… I'll make it a thief, a gunman or a dope fiend. The possibilities of shaping in any direction are almost endless. Even gross differences in anatomical structure limits are far less than you may think… Men are built, not born.'

Carl Rogers, Rollo May, Aaron Beck, and Albert Ellis attended a 1985 precursor to the annual Evolution of Psychotherapy conferences organised by Jeffrey Zeig. A woman involved in a conference held in Anaheim in the early 1980s, told me the group hired out Disneyland for two nights. Their rationale for spending two evenings at the MK-ULTRA facility was to 'get in touch with their inner child.'

Freud, Jung, Skinner, Rogers, Watson, May, Beck, Ellis – their opinions and research underpin all psychology training.

NAZI 'THERAPIES'

The Nazis murdered at least 300,000 psychiatric patients. Paperclip resettled an estimated 5,000 Nazis, including prominent psychiatrists and behaviour modification experts, in the USA post WWII, with others immigrating later.[480] At least 137 Nazi scientists are known to have been resettled in Australia under Matchbox. These Nazis trained the MK-ULTRA perpetrators who fathered modern psychiatry and psychology and influenced the post-WWII transition from Freud's philosophical approach to physical interventions: anticonvulsants, antidepressants, deep-sleep therapy, drug abreaction sessions, electroshock, endocrine supplements, insulin shock, lobotomy, narco-hypnosis, and stimulants. These 'therapeutic' interventions are intended to induce and maintain trauma and dissociation and prevent integration. Treatment methods are inappropriate and ineffective if they:

- Were used to cause the victim's trauma and dissociation in the first place.
- Perpetuate and maintain trauma and dissociation.
- Do not connect with the right hemisphere and implicit memory.
- Deny the existence and nature of the abuse.
- Do not retrieve and fully process the trauma memories.

DENIAL-BASED TECHNIQUES

Psychotherapy is based on Freud's denial of child abuse peppered with Jung's occultism. Talk therapy on its own is useless, because talking is a left-brain activity. Trauma memories are stored in the right hemisphere's implicit memory system and can't be accessed by verbal interactions based on left-brain cognitive or logical processes. Hence a victim can work hard at therapy for 20 years but make zero progress.

Behaviour Therapies include Positive Psychology, CBT (Cognitive Behavioural Therapy), ACT (Acceptance Commitment Therapy), DBT (Dialectic Behavioural Therapy), and Schema-Focussed Therapy. Behaviour therapies are ineffective and cruel because behaviour is a symptom of the underlying problem, not the problem itself. Based on CIA-funded torture experiments on children, these methods were designed to stop therapists and victims processing ritual abuse and mind control. Behavioural therapies contain a two-prong attack on recovering repressed memories:

1. Passivity:* The basic premise of these techniques is for victims to loosely acknowledge they were abused but do nothing to explore the abuse experiences trapped in implicit memory. My Counselling Psychology lecturer taught us to, 'Just let the memories sit there. Let them be.' In other words, surrender, remain in the passive state of acceptance and learned helplessness that Seligman pioneered, because there is nothing we can do.
2. False Action:* These therapies simultaneously misdirect victims' energies toward identifying and changing specific thoughts and behaviours. For example, thought loops implicitly created via conditioning are combated by thinking of a red Stop sign at every intrusive thought. Happiness is the therapeutic goal, and positive thinking and mental distraction are the keys to success. Positive thinking excludes focussing on negative topics like witnessing kids being butchered. Instead, if you force a smile, your brain will be tricked into following and you will eventually genuinely feel happier. Willpower is no match for sophisticated brainwashing techniques. It is like defending yourself against a warship with a popgun. These methods impose a mental discipline which the victim can't satisfy. When they surely fail, victims are blamed for exerting insufficient willpower.

Positive Psychology correlates with Positive Illusion - inaccuracy regarding reality

Antony Kidman, who introduced CBT to Australia, explained the application of CBT ‘for people suffering from psychosis’ in a 2014 ABC Radio interview:[481]

> NORMAN SWAN: So, what do you do? Do you confront somebody, say, if you're starting to believe that the world is against you and people are talking about you?...
> ANTONY KIDMAN: Well, we do, but of course we don't challenge necessarily the fact that they say, 'People are trying to kill me,’ or 'There's people from the CIA or ASIO across the road in a car sending me messages'. The therapeutic approach is to say, well, 'What does that really mean?’ or ‘Just elaborate on how you feel about that?’ without saying 'That's a load of nonsense!' - but not accepting it either.

Here is my retort to that interview. How should we ‘feel’ about the following?

- Kidman died four months after giving the above radio interview, as a direct consequence of my reporting his CIA abuse of me to the NSW Health Board.
- The NSW health board previously received similar complaints concerning Kidman.
- I have since heard from multiple Antony Kidman mind control victims or their therapists.
- I took photos of the head ASIO who stalked me at Marrickville, posted one on social media, and submitted a full body closeup shot to the police who took statements from the two credible witnesses to the incident, plus from two of the ASIO agents who panicked at being exposed.

Kidman’s notion of focussing on the victim’s feelings and what their memories mean for them - while denying the truth of the CIA-ASIO child trafficking victim’s experiences - is the same denial approach contained in APS Guidelines on Repressed Memories (written by MK-ULTRA psychologists):

- Psychologists should seek to meet the needs of clients who report memories of abuse and should do this quite apart from the truth or falsity of those reports.
- Psychologists should explore with the client the meaning and implications of the memory for the client, rather than focus solely on the content of the reported memory.

This year 30 senior Australian psychologists underwent training to become supervisors of trainee psychologists. The consensus between all 30 psychologists was that CBT has zero efficacy and simply does not work. Consequently, those 30 supervisors will not be spreading CBT to the next generation of therapists.

DISSOCIATIVE-BASED THERAPY TECHNIQUES

The following therapies stem from the mystery religions and incorporate methods which CIA perpetrators use to dissociate victims:

[481] ABC Radio National, Health Report, Cognitive behaviour therapy for psychosis, 5 May 2014.

Visualisation activates the right hemisphere and is used to facilitate dissociation for hypnosis, astral travel, and interdimensional access.

Chanting (Om) creates a resonance which causes the brain hemispheres to synchronise their frequencies with the frequency exerted by our physical surroundings. It is used to facilitate interdimensional access.

Transcendental Meditation is a dissociative tool is used by Asian cultures (Yogis, Tibetan monks, Ninjas, Shaolin Masters) and to tap into an esoteric power source, mute physical pain, lower heart rate and breathing for survival purposes, and summon Chi (electromagnetic energy) to increase physical strength, harness and weaponize psychic ability, levitate physically, move objects using the mind, and access other dimensions. MK-ULTRA victims were abused using the same esoteric practises.

Yoga in the 1970s consisted of healthy exercises that stimulated the vagus nerve, internally massaged the body, and exercised the eyes to improve visual processing. Modern yoga practises focus on mediation, chanting Om, awakening the chakras, and evoking Kundalini.

Mindfulness is both a denial and dissociative approach stemming from Taoist and Buddhist religions. Mindfulness incorporates dissociative techniques: transcendental meditation, visualisation, and astral projection. These practices repeat the victim's abuse experiences, promote dissociation, reinforce programming, and inhibit integration. The basic premise of Mindfulness is to live more in the moment and spend less time contemplating past stressors or worrying about future problems. Mindfulness encourages victims to change their perception of reality or themselves, which makes it another denial therapy. Mindfulness-based cognitive therapy (MBCT) combines mindfulness with CBT, thereby delivering a double dose of denial. Not surprisingly, UK and USA studies found meditation and mindfulness trigger panic, confusion, mania, depression, psychosis, and hallucinations.[482] [483]

Psychedelic Drugs open the veil that separates this dimension from other dimensions. The MK-ULTRA perpetrators I studied, used LSD to create the initial brain splits in MK-ULTRA victims, and for layering in subsequent programming. LSD and other hallucinogens return victims to the state of consciousness they were in when being tortured and programmed; they trigger and flood victims with trauma memories, preventing them from grounding, and placing them at risk of getting stuck in a flashback. Drugs also open victims up to spiritual problems. Any doctor who suggests using LSD as a treatment method for traumatised and dissociative clients is either dumb - or dirty.

Somatic Therapy is a grey area. Somatic therapy combines psychotherapy with physical activities, some of which are fine. When somatic activities involve meditation, yoga and theatre, that is unsuitable.

Theatre (i.e., acting methods) employs shamanic practises of centring, meditation, visualisation, dissociation and channelling. Like John bell and Frater 6161 said, theatre is ritual. As in ritual, theatre summons entities into this dimension. As in ritual, actors invoke entities to possess them, so they can perform.

FRONTAL LOBE DESTRUCTION

Lobotomy, electrocution, and psychiatric drugs all disengage the frontal lobes by physically severing this area from the rest of the brain. ECT damages the dorsolateral prefrontal cortical region, the same area targeted in surgical lobotomy. ECT electrodes are placed over the frontal lobes and the most intensive electrical surge fries the memory centres in the tip of the temporal lobes. That is why CIA perpetrators used lobotomy, electrocution and psychiatric drugs to split the brain and repress memories.

Electrocution

Victims are subjected to copious amounts of electrocution in the form of cattle prodding, crash cart paddles, giant electrodes, electric chairs, and ECT. In adulthood, I had flashbacks of being electrocuted in different brain areas, depending on which ones they wanted to separate from the rest of the brain. They also precisely administered electrocution to specific brain regions via a needle inserted into my scalp. John C. Lilly pioneered the method for inserting electrodes into the brain to stimulate exact centres of anger, anxiety, fear, pain and pleasure. Lilly mapped the entire brain for this purpose.

As a result of electrocution, victims may suffer a lifetime of symptoms including heart attacks, strokes, nervous system damage, and memory loss. These conditions may occur in a victim's youth or degenerate with age. I suffered a heart attack at age 37, a stroke at 39, and now experience tingling, numbness and pain in my hands and limbs consistent with nervous system damage caused by electrocution.

ECT has zero therapeutic benefits for victims. Doctors claim ECT temporarily reduces anxiety, depression, and suicidal ideation, when these feelings are in fact symptoms that typically precede a trauma memory as it edges toward conscious recall. ECT stops the trauma memories surfacing. Like drugs, ECT is used to silence patients and so make the psychiatric staff feel more comfortable. The anaesthetic does not reduce the trauma felt during ECT. It simply buries the pain back beneath an amnesia wall. The anaesthetic increases the brain damage ECT causes.

Hospitals all over Australia still illegally administer excessive bouts of ECT without patient consent, including my local Tweed Heads District Hospital. A movement to outlaw ECT is backed by sound research has been blocked by pedophiles in power.

Drugs

During my 30-year recovery attempt, I was rarely prescribed drugs. The longest I ever took medication for was for three to six weeks. I have a hypersensitive nervous system which, I suspect, stems in part from the amount and variety of drugs that my perpetrators pumped into my system from a very young age. My sensitivity precludes me from taking most drugs, and I can only handle small doses.

A retired pharmacist gave me some advice: 'Never take the newer drugs. You'd be lucky if a new drug has been tested on 10,000 subjects, making you a human guinea pig. Stick to the old and tried drugs.' For example, the drug Cymbalta is making abuse victims suicidal, and withdrawal from it induces such bad side effects (such as heart problems) that people can’t withdraw from it. Some of the newer antidepressants have reportedly caused hallucinogenic type reactions.

Valium can be effective for immediate relief from fresh trauma and flashbacks but is too addictive for long-term usage. The older style beta-blockers (like Inderal) are seemingly effective for PTSD. For example, processing memories can trigger an adverse heart response. Beta-blockers may provide relief from the heart’s constant reaction to the stress of reliving traumatic memories during therapy and providing witness testimony to police and courts. While certain research studies suggest the beta-blockers are effective for trauma memory restructuring, I wonder whether their mechanism of action interferes with brain integration. One psychiatrist prescribed me an asthma medication to take when I anticipate being triggered or have just been triggered. This is effective for about two days, after which its effects reverse to cause anxiety and asthma.

NEUROFEEDBACK

Soviet neuroscientist Yuri Kropotov (who discovered the function of the basal ganglia) visited the Tweed Shire in 2015. During this he publicly stated, ‘Psychiatry has failed’ and that neurofeedback is the modern means of combating mental health disorders – that plus the lobotomies his Pavlovian brain institute regularly perform in St Petersburg.

I participated in Kropotov’s neurofeedback study in which data taken from thousands of Australian trauma victims was sent to the Pavlovian institute in Russia. The neurofeedback training programs used in the study, also designed by Russians, featured triggers including Egyptian occult symbols and walls of dripping blood.

My Russian relative (a victim of Soviet mind control) threw a fit when I joined the study. ‘You’ve been Total Recalled!’ she screamed at me. ‘They’re reprogramming you! You wouldn’t know what they’re doing to you! They can create a back door! They’re interested in you! You’re a fucking CIA asset! And now your entire brain has been downloaded and sent to the Russian equivalent of the CIA! Whatever happened to sovereign borders?! They’re sending sensitive information about how Australians respond to trauma - to Russia! They’re committing treason!’

Indeed, the alpha-theta biofeedback training induced a hypnotic trance state during which I was subliminally influenced. Immediately afterwards, I made an atypical, unprecedented misjudgement while driving, which caused a serious wreck and exacerbated my pre-existing head injury. I believe this was an attempted hit, because I almost suffered a similar accident one week prior. When I confronted my therapist over the neurofeedback-induced car crash, her work with the Russians, her relationship with local cult members, and her pedophile father, she became enraged, personally attacked and blamed me, and terminated therapy.

HYPNOSIS

On 21 November 2011, UK Channel 4 aired a program called Derren Brown – The Assassin featuring celebrity Stephen Fry. Hypnotist Derren Brown demonstrated that a person can be influenced under hypnosis to do that which they normally would not then forget the behaviour afterwards. Brown successfully hypnotised a person, programmed him to fire a gun more accurately under hypnosis, instructed him to shoot Stephen Fry upon spying a visual trigger, and to completely forget the incident afterwards.

Beware of hypnosis, particularly if you are at the start of your healing journey, or if you completely dissociate and lose all memory during therapy. A dirty doctor could do anything to you under hypnosis and you would not recall it. Because unethical hypnosis was used to abuse victims, the mere employment of hypnotherapy is triggering. Further, the victim was hypnotically programmed with hundreds of access codes, so unless the therapist knows those codes, or how to avoid their effects, they could trigger a programmed instruction for the victim to attack the therapist or themselves.

NLP (Neuro-Linguistic Programming)

> NLP is a way of 're-patterning' the human brain to turn us into super-beings – confident, non-phobic, thin super-beings who can sell coals to Newcastle and know what people are thinking just by their eye movements. It is the theory that we are computers and can be reprogrammed as easily as computers can. You were abused as a child? That makes you a badly programmed computer who needs a spot of instant reprogramming. Forget therapy: just turn off the bit of the brain that remembers the abuse…
> I first heard of Bandler in 2002, when a former US special forces soldier told me he'd watched him, two decades earlier, bring a tiny girl into special forces and reprogram her in seconds to be a world-class sniper…
> If you hear voices in your head, [Bandler] says, tell the voices to shut the fuck up. 'If you suffered childhood abuse, don't go back and relive it in your mind. Once is enough!' He says psychotherapy is nonsense and a racket: therapists are rewarded for failure. The longer a problem lasts, the more the therapist is paid. Who cares about the roots of the trauma? 'Don't think about bad things!' Bandler says. 'There's a machine inside your brain that gets rid of shit that doesn't need to be there. Use it! I can give myself amnesia. I can just forget.' He clicks his fingers. 'Just like that.' [484]

NLP is a subtle form of hypnosis that subconsciously influences victim behaviour. NLP is primarily based on the work of MK-UKTRA hypnotherapist Milton Erickson and psychotherapist Fritz Perls. It was founded in the 1970s by Capt. John Grinder (US Special Forces and Intelligence) and student Richard Bandler at the University of California in Santa Cruz under the supervision of MK-ULTRA anthropologist and linguist Gregory Bateson. In November 1986, Bandler stood trial for the shooting of prostitute Corine Christensen after he left the scene of her murder. Despite overwhelming forensic evidence that he shot Corine, Bandler used NLP techniques to sway the jury who later cried in regret for letting a killer escape.

NLP is aimed at activating the right hemisphere's implicit visual and emotional systems and deactivating left brain logic. NLP is used by cult and trafficking network members to gain a victim's trust, with the goal of manipulating or framing the target. NLP perpetrators employs the following tactics:

- Glean Information: Observe target's visual and auditory clues (eye movement, pupil dilation, winks) to determine the target's brain hemispheric processing preference, method of brain processing and memory storage, preferred sensory system arousal, and honesty. For instance, looking up indicates visual memory retrieval.

[484] Jon Ronson (2006). Don't Worry, Get Therapy. The Guardian, 20 May.

- Establish Rapport: Mirror victim's body language and speech to make them drop their guard and become suggestible.
- Use language that encourages visual imagery, to activate the right brain hemisphere which unquestioningly accepts suggestion. ('Can you see…' or 'Look at…')
- Elicit emotion in the target's right hemisphere by leading, language, and having the target visualise the perpetrators desired result.
- Anchor a suggestion in the target's mind by using physical cues (e.g., touching the target's shoulder).
- Use vague language to induce a hypnotic trance.
- Use permissive language. ('Feel free to...')
- Use gibberish to confuse the target and make them accept a lucid suggestion.

CIA DENIAL APPROACHES

Anthony 'Tony' Robbins popularised NLP which, he claims, has helped 'people with multiple personalities.'[485] This is concerning since investigative journalists recently exposed Tony Robbins' sexual misconduct and his abuse of vulnerable victims. At his conferences, Robbins employs mind control techniques including sleep deprivation, and he publicly berates victims of physical and sexual abuse who disclose in front of large crowds. Robbins said of a rape victim, 'She's fucking using all this stuff to try and control men.' Robbins negated the existence of abuse by attacking the notion of being a victim. He stated at a 2018 conference, '…victimhood is now rewarded in our culture. . . it's now leverage. Someone can now come and make claims about anybody…' Tony Robbins uses denial to blame victims for reacting normally to their trauma. Denial of sex abuse is a perpetrator trademark.

Not buying into the 'victimization narrative' was a dialogue feature of NLP practitioner Keith Raniere whose NXIVM cofounder was personally trained in NLP by Bandler. In his Twelve-point Mission Statement for the NXIVM sex trafficking operation, Raniere wrote: 'There are no ultimate victims; Therefore, I will not choose to be a victim.'

Child abuse denial is the CIA's trademark

USELESS PHYSICIANS

Therapists who possess no relevant knowledge, skills or experience with ritual abuse and mind control, are at a treatment loss when victims like me enter their practise. Few therapists are willing to adjust their usual practise protocol to research an entirely new area of expertise just to accommodate one client's unorthodox treatment needs. They are busy, and their time costs.

Ethical practitioners who do possess the capacity to work with victims of organised trafficking undoubtedly come under perpetrator surveillance. That is how child trafficking remains secret. Those who help victims typically find themselves professionally and personally threatened. If the therapist works under the umbrella of an organisation, that organisation tends to stop the therapist's efforts. If the therapist runs their own business, that business is usually targeted until the therapist is forced to choose between their livelihood and loyalty to the client.

[485] Tony Robbins (1991). Awakening the Giant Within, Simon & Schuster, 22.

Therapists are paid to care. No psychologist ever told me their initial reason for entering the industry was to help others. The majority were attracted due to their own unresolved personal issues. A portion were lured to the earning potential of a psychologist, or the travel opportunities it affords. I studied with a student whose goal was to work in New York and enjoy shopping on 5th Avenue. Some are motivated by their passion for research and a desire for social recognition. Many demonstrate unmanaged autism, which would explain why clients are treated robotically and without empathy. An alarming number of therapists seek sexual access to the vulnerable. A student I studied with said when she worked as an administrator for the NSW Psychology registration board in the 1980s, the main complaint she received everyday concerned psychologists taking sexual advantage of their clients. She added that she was raped by a University of Sydney psychology lecturer.

Psychiatrists and psychologists are trained to listen, feign empathy, and say little during sessions. Clients mistake this silence for intelligence or understanding. Like the proverb says, ‘Even a fool seems wise if he shuts his mouth.’ Therapists follow a clinical script which they began learning from day one of their training. At university, we were made to prepare and memorise such scripts. Our Counselling Psychology lecturer said empathy can be scripted, learnt, faked until achieved. That approach does not work with victims of ritual abuse and mind control, because their visual-spatial processing capacity enables them to read micro facial expressions and detect feigned empathy. Victims dismiss fake therapists as untrustworthy and plain stupid.

Many clients do not know the difference between psychiatrists and psychologists. Psychologists have a more varied repertoire of therapy interventions compared to doctors. At a minimum, psychologists have studied four years of psychology theory followed by two years of supervised clinical training acquired either through a university master program, or under the supervision of a community practitioner. Master program training is standardised and thus superior. But do not be impressed by a PhD, as this only demonstrates someone can complete a PhD. Most academics are arrogant, left-brain dominant, and cognitively inflexible.

Psychiatrists study medicine and are essentially drug pushers who attribute most mental health conditions to a biochemical imbalance. Most psychological issues stem from childhood trauma. Psychiatric facilities would quickly empty if doctors adopted a trauma-focused treatment approach. Psychiatrists religiously consult their diagnostic bible, the DSM (Diagnostic and Statistical Manual for Mental Disorders), a scientifically invalid collection of opinions. Basically, a group of men on the CIA payroll met and reached a consensus regarding what constitutes mental illness. The DSM has been used to silence victims ever since. Most mental health patients are typically forced into one or more DSM categories. My university psychology class were pressured to squeeze clients into at least one DSM category. If we did not do this, the case reports in our clinical folios had to be edited and resubmitted until we complied Medical schools instil an inflated sense of self-importance. The University of NSW repeatedly told their medical students, ‘You are the chosen ones.’ How amusing, considering the average IQ of a medical doctor is 120 and the exceptionality they refer to starts at least two standard deviations above that. Egotistic therapists can’t work with victims of ritual abuse and mind control. In fact, they make the worst therapists in general. Pride and ego will always interfere with the therapist’s objectivity and motivation. Unfortunately, the mental health industry is full of egotists indoctrinated with an us-and-them mentality.

If a therapist is not altruistically motivated to be concerned for victims, when the client’s condition becomes critical, and the therapist is forced to choose between them and their café lifestyle, registration, reputation, research, business, overseas holidays, long weekends, interstate conference with all-inclusive wine tour, private school fees, regular restaurant dining, latest Tinder date, intellectual pursuits, social recognition, or personal safety – they will not choose the client. Most therapists will sell out and suddenly change a client's diagnosis to 'mentally ill' the moment the client exposes their professional inadequacy, insincerity, incompetence, and unwillingness to deviate from their 'money for old rope' routine.

If a victim bonds with one of these secular professionals for the purpose of processing extreme abuse, they risk being prematurely abandoned at a most crucial time. It is safer not to commence the recovery process at all, rather than die halfway through. And do not think the therapist will take responsibility for their part in the victim's downfall. They will justify their abandonment according to their code of therapeutic engagement and management, and ultimately blame the victim for their poor choices. The client was after all, just another personality disordered nut, and they have a filing cabinet full of those to fill the void. All mental health workers reserve their perceived right to hide behind a façade of professionalism. Arrogant or not, they will in times of stress, fear, or ignorance, revert to this default setting. Every psychologist and psychiatrist I have ever consulted fits this behavioural pattern. Here is an example:

I once thought I had found the perfect psychiatrist. This woman claimed to be a Christian, EMDR trained, and highly experienced at working with ritual abuse and mind control. The psychiatrist made a time to see me at short notice. By the time of my appointment, she had watched my Candy Girl documentary plus my Seattle conference presentation. I was impressed. The doctor bulkbilled my session to Medicare, listened intently to me, offered sound advice, prescribed a novel medication that I found beneficial, and agreed to be available if and when I ever needed a medico-legal report. Perfect… or so I thought.

I remained in light contact with the psychiatrist, sent her the odd text or email. The day came when I needed a medico-legal report. It had been 18 months since my initial consultation with the psychiatrist, when I confidently requested an appointment and a report. I was surprised by her email response:

I have only been able to do … supportive reports as appropriate for patients that I am treating.
I would have thought your psychologist, GP and neurologist reports are credible ...
I have not done a psychiatric assessment of you ... but supportive meeting x2 years ago...
I remember you telling me you are not dissociative... and whilst I accept the veracity of your statement, I have not seen anyone in clinical practice who has experienced severe CSA from preschool age and primary school age who had not had severe dissociation ... even DID... as an adaptive response to deal with the intolerable ...
Complex PTSD does in my clinical view involve dissociation...
I also have some concern that being interstate makes my clinical opinion potentially vulnerable ... I have had to battle in court in the past against a senior colleague who accused me of having 'a major confirmatory bias'... whilst the court outcome was successful for the victim, I was able to challenge as my assessment was detailed and there was medical and protective co-oberation.
It would seem that your residual struggles impacting on your functioning are neurological and somatic predominately ...
I am involved in current medico legal cases in which I have to be so meticulous....
I would have thought you would have had more than enough from what you have gathered already.

'So, she called you a fraud, Fiona?!' my psychologist exclaimed.
'Well, she didn't exactly say that-…'

'Yes, she basically did,' he insisted.

I sighed and nodded reluctantly. 'She might as well have called me a liar.'

'Did she bill you to Medicare?'

'Yes, and I provided her with a GP's referral.'

'And you have prescription medicine with her name on it?'

'Yup.'

'Then she fucking treated you, Fiona!'

'She's a blatant liar. I never told her I wasn't dissociative. I said I'm co-conscious during dissociation, and that my alter switches are seamless due to the sophisticated techniques and equipment used. She watched the Seattle conference video in which I talked all about that, and about the exact nature of my dissociation and integration.'

'Why did she do this?'

'I don't know. Threatened, I guess.'

'She might have been a setup. Or she's going to set you up, Fiona.'

'After everything I've done for victims all these years, at great personal risk, I ask for one thing, just one report – but no.'

'You've done enough. Time to stop saving the world.'

'Oh, trust me – I'm nearly cured of that.'

He laughed.

I sighed. 'So, can you recommend a new psychiatrist?'

'Err, no.'

'Huh?'

'I don't think any of them will want to get involved.'

'Why not?'

'Because you're Fiona Barnett.'

Alternatively, victims can line up at one of the community-based counselling services affiliated with the church denominations currently under the Royal Commission investigation for covering up child abuse. Non-government organisations dedicated solely to child abuse counselling are poorly staffed and are typically infiltrated with perpetrators. Child actor Sarah Monahan documented how Bravehearts tried to sabotage her lawsuit against the actor who sexually abused her on-set of the Hey Dad TV show. Paul Wilson's wife was on the Bravehearts advisory board. Following her husband's pedophile conviction, Bravehearts replaced her with the Bond University lecturer / Queensland Police detective who lied to destroy my psychology career.

Complex trauma resulting from severe child abuse requires years of therapy. During critical recovery times, multiple weekly sessions need to be interspersed with a residential care facility staffed by experts with specialist training. Unfortunately, no such thing exists in Australia. During the late 1980s and '90s, a standard therapy session lasted 60 minutes. The victim of severe child abuse could expect to attend two sessions per week. At university, I was taught that the APS recommended 1.5-hour sessions for highly traumatised victims to ensure they did not leave therapy in a hyper-aroused state. However, income greedy modern practitioners only offer one 50-minute therapy session per week. In accordance with industry guidelines, they deduct 10 minutes per hour for writing case notes and reports. Fifty minutes per week is ridiculously insufficient for victims of extreme child abuse to process their experiences.

Experienced psychologists may charge around $330 per session. Inexperienced or unskilled psychologists are usually desperate for clientele and therefore more willing to be paid $130 per hour to counsel victims of crime. Psychology receives scarce funding from the Australian government. Presently, Medicare will cover about six therapy sessions, which is just enough therapy to trigger a victim to suicide. Psychiatry is completely funded via Medicare and therefore more accessible to victims who have been too busy surviving to earn high incomes.

The moment you engage a therapist under a government scheme like Medicare, your personal information is recorded in a powerful system that may come back to bite you. Your case notes can be subpoenaed, and your diagnoses used against you in educational, professional, and legal settings. Therapists often operate within clinical teams, attend supervision, and debrief with peers, friends or relatives. In this way, therapists may unwittingly disclose your identity and whereabouts to your perpetrators. If your therapist knowingly reports to the network, they may use their position and connections to set you up for false internment in prison or hospital where victims are silenced. As a precaution, engage a counsellor who ranks low on the mental health power hierarchy, use a pseudonym, and pay in cash.

‘I know. I was so good at what I did. I just wanted to work with gifted kids. . .’

‘Fiona, would you like me to help you get your registration back?’

I closed my teary eyes and shook my head.

‘I mean later, when you’re ready?’

‘It’s too late,’ I lamented. ‘The damage is done. Honestly, if AHPRA turned around right now and offered me my rego - I’d tell them to go fuck themselves.’

‘Really?’

‘My passion for psychology is dead.’

Trauma-Focussed Integration

I shifted restlessly on the lounge which was grubby from a thousand clients' sweat and tears. I reluctantly began to speak, 'I was swimming laps yesterday. I got to my eighth lap and felt a sense of relaxation come over me, like I was finally cognitively digesting last week's session. Then I heard an inaudible voice say, 'It's okay. I'll take care of this.' Initially, I thought it might be a God thing because it felt similar – but that wasn't God. I said out aloud, "Who the fuck are you?"'

'Who was it?'

'An alter.'

'Do you want to talk with her?'

My eyes widened. 'No!'

'Why not?'

'I'm scared of her.'

'Oh, so you know who she is?'

'A name came to mind. Sascha.'

'Who's Sascha?'

'A scary Amazonian warrior. She's fierce.'

'Okay, so let's chat with her.'

I glared at him with trepidation.

'Of course, you want to do this!' My therapist positioned himself near me, placed a cushion on my lap, and motioned for me to rest my hands on it. 'So, I just want you to set up a meeting and have a chat.'

'Let's just get one thing straight: I am not going to let her into my mind and experience this from her perspective, coz that will end in one of two ways: either she seduces you - or beats you up.'

'Well, if those are my two choices, I suppose I choose seduction.'

I smiled. 'Yeah, well she did take out a therapist once when I was young.'

He began tapping my hands. I reluctantly cooperated. I began picturing a meeting room in my mind. It was a basement in Holsworthy, where Gittinger first assessed me. I saw pale grey concrete walls, a wooden table and two chairs. Sascha sat opposite me, dressed in Army uniform. She was seven-foot tall with auburn hair that fell past her shoulders in wavy layers. Her muscular arms were crossed in front of her chest.

I awkwardly began, So, err, hi.

The tapping stopped. 'What's going on?' my therapist asked.

I described the scene. 'I really don't want to talk with her. She's just one of those angry aggressive lesbian types that I don't gravitate toward.'

'Oh, so that's what this is about. She's gay and you feel uncomfortable with that.'

'Well, yeah. Amazonian warrior princess alters are man-hating lesbians. That's what the cult women are. The cult women are gay or bisexual. The only reason they get married is to fulfil their duty to breed Illuminati children. They tried to condition or train me to be the same. But I'm not.'

'So, you have an issue with her being gay.'

'Err, I also have an issue with a few other things – like her killing people!'

'Right.'

'She killed Jason!'

‘So, you didn’t do that. Sascha did.’

‘Of course, it wasn’t me! I had no bloody say in it! I didn’t even have time to think before she just took over, walked up to him - and snapped his neck!’

‘Okay, so I want you to talk to her. See what she has to say about this.’

I closed my eyes again while he resumed tapping my hands. I was back in the Holsworthy room, sitting opposite the angry lesbian. So, I tried again, As you can see, we need to talk- . . . Sascha leapt from her chair, grabbed me by the throat, and slammed me hard up against the wall.

The tapping stopped. ‘What’s happening?’

Me: ‘Well, I am dangling in the air with her fingers around my throat. You might want to tap a little longer next time.’

Tap-tap-tap . . .

Stand . . . down . . . Soldier . . . I managed.

She dropped me.

Now, I continued, I am your commanding officer and you will do as I say. Sit down.

She returned to her chair.

You are part of a unit. Right now, the unit is going in one direction, working toward a common objective, but you are doing your own thing, going the opposite way. You are causing chaos and jeopardising the entire team. It's not okay to just eat meat and drink beer. Some others in the unit want to eat fruit and veggies. And you can't go about swearing all the time – my mother and Jon are giving me grief over that. And lay off Jon! He's the one who supports the unit. He buys your beer!

The tapping ceased. 'What's happening,' my therapist asked again.

I relayed what just occurred.

He said, 'You're doing all the talking. We want to hear from her. I'm sure she has something to say.'

Tap-tap-tap . . .

I returned to the room. You must talk. I am ordering you to talk.

She scowled at me with contempt and spoke: You think I'm stupid.

'What did she say?' my therapist asked.

'She said, "You think I'm stupid!"'

'Ohhh, so you think she's stupid.'

'Well,' I stumbled, 'I think she's . . . all action.'

'So, you think she's stupid. Well, isn't that nice. That must make her feel really accepted.'

Tap-tap-tap . . .

Look, I began sheepishly, I appreciate everything you've done. You've been out front this whole time, defending us all. You did all the hard work – and, you did it well. But now it's time for you to find something new to do instead of . . . killing people. You seem to like swimming. That Dagon training incident is obviously your thing, so maybe you can take care of the laps?

She began to cry.

'What's happening?' my therapist asked.

'I made her cry.'

Tap-tap-tap . . .

There's more to you, I puzzled. I stretched to see what was behind Sascha. There must be more of you. Suddenly - the scene changed. I was in the Holsworthy underground. The rough walls were carved out of rock. A small girl sat on the ground before me. She looked no more than eight years old. Her auburn curls sat in layers. She was sobbing aloud. Her tears drew clean lines down her filthy face. A gun was slung over her shoulder.

'Why don't you approach her?' my therapist asked.

'Because she's holding an AK-forty-seven!'

'Talk to her. Find out what's going on.'

Suddenly, I was viewing things from the child's perspective, behind a cocked gun. It was like being in a computer shooting game as I kicked open a row of cell doors and mowed down the occupants. Then - I was back in front of the sobbing child, her clothes splattered in blood. I crouched down in front of her and examined her face. Her eyes faded to blue and I recognised myself.

She snatched the gun and pointed it at my eyes: Back up! she warned between clenched teeth, Or I'll blow your fucking head off!

I tilted my head to one side, smiled with pity, prised the gun from her little hands, scooped her tiny frame into my arms and hugged her close. Her entire body began to convulse against my chest. It's okay, I assured her. I'm so sorry. I began stroking her hair which fell off in a clump, revealing long, straight blonde hair. It was just a wig. They dressed me in a wig to create another alter who assumed responsibility for the killings.

I returned to the meeting room where Sascha had sat. Instead of the angry warrior, I saw a petite teenage girl dressed in khaki, staring shamefully at the floor. She sighed in resignation as she pulled off her auburn wig to reveal long straight blonde hair.

‘They’re just children,’ I shook my head. ‘Both are children. They’re minors.’

‘Yes, they are. It wasn’t their fault.’

‘What?!’ The words felt like a burning sword piercing my being.

I dropped my head into the couch and wept…

‘Come on,’ my therapist almost whispered as he gently placed my limp hands back on the cushion. He tapped as I cried and cried from some unfathomable place.

‘I want my mummy,’ I finally uttered. Just then I remembered Anne Conlon approaching to console me - but pushed the mental image away in disgust.

Eventually I settled, wiped my blurry eyes, and spoke. ‘My daughter made me do a personality test.’

He laughed. ‘Which one.’

‘I don’t know, some vocational test. She’s doing an intro psych unit and the lecturer has the class playing around with personality tests. She hassled me until I agreed to do it. She reckoned it was accurate. So, I did it. I couldn’t believe it. It was spot on. It perfectly described what I’m like in relationships, what I was like at work and uni. It explained how I can extract conversation out of anyone, and how that enables me to identify people’s strengths and delegate work tasks to them. Guess what profession it matched me to?’

‘What?’

‘Psychologist.’

We laughed.

‘And the other career choices were interests that I’ve already sort of pursued, like teaching, writing, journalism, and acting. It identified that I get bored easily and need jobs that are forever changing and allow me to be autonomous and creative. It also described me as the most friendly and caring personality type. . . I’m not a bad person.’

‘Who said you were a bad person?’

‘Oh, Bond and . . . all the other pedos.’

‘Well of course they’d say that - that’s what perpetrators do.’

‘I don’t help people because I was abused and now suffer Save-the-world Syndrome. I help people because that is a feature of my core personality. The test identified my core personality that exists apart from my child abuse. I am more than my abuse.’

His mouth gaped open at my pivotal realisation.

‘Wow.’ He sighed. ‘Let’s sit with that. You are more than your abuse.’

‘I am not solely defined by my child abuse. That test showed me I have a personality beneath the PTSD. I have a good, healthy personality that has nothing to do with my abuse.’

AUSTRALIA'S THERAPEUTIC WASTELAND

I processed the first half of my abuse, primarily incest and ritual abuse experiences, during the early 1990s. My last drawings of that memory retrieval phase showed my being spun in an egg-like contraption in a CIA lab beneath ANSTO. I showed the drawings to my mother who asserted, 'That's enough now. You don't need to remember anymore.'

So, I stopped.

Stopping the memories was probably a good decision since I had insufficient therapeutic support at the time. Although I had seen psychiatrists since my sixteenth birthday, they caused more harm than good. The first committed suicide. The second failed his final psychiatry examination six times. The third dismissed my PTSD flashbacks of ritual abuse as a 'metaphor for incest,' and his nursing staff mocked me as I lay in a foetal position beneath my hospital bed, screaming at vivid images of babies being murdered. I defiantly poked my 20-year-old finger at the useless physician's face and asserted that while I may not have understood my memories, I refused to deny them. I also refused to numb myself with their vile drugs.

I was on my own. I had no way of understanding what I was experiencing. Australia offered no experts, no books, and the internet had not been invented. So, I implemented the only thing my state school education taught me – how to teach myself. I set about researching my condition.

After completing art college, I fell into post graduate studies in art therapy. That course contained an introductory unit of psychology. The study of psychology seemed more scientific than drawing Jungian mandalas, so I transferred to that. Psychology, followed by motherhood, led me to my ultimate passion – gifted education. The combination of academic knowledge of psychology, art psychotherapy, and gifted education, formed the foundation of my escape from the matrix. I also fell into supporting victims of ritual abuse and mind control, where I discovered how to bypass the conscious mind and access implicit memories using drawing.

Finally, 25 years after my first flashback, I possessed the knowledge, skill, and fortitude to finish the task. I found therapists capable of executing my design. But don't mistake this for some kind of happy ending. None of these practitioners wanted me on their books. Like most Australian therapists, they were clueless about ritual abuse and mind control. Yet this time round, I refused to let therapist inadequacy interfere with my goal. I planned every step of my integration process and hammered my therapists to help implement my plan. Eventually, my 35-year marathon paid off. I remembered what was done to me and why, which smashed the programming and facilitated integration.

WHY INTEGRATE?

Research indicates there are benefits to integration. One study found, 'Patients with dissociative disorder who integrated their dissociated self-states were found to have reduced symptomatology compared with those who did not integrate.' [486]

I was relatively high functioning immediately prior to integrating. I'm not saying I was perfectly healthy, but I was certainly as stable as 99 percent of the mental health workers I have ever met. Victims like me often present as high functioning, which is why victims are over-represented in the helping professions. Victims can compartmentalise their lives into roles (which is the only benefit of forced dissociation). For example, prior to my stroke, I coped easily with doing two master level degrees at once. I could totally immerse myself in academic study from dawn to midnight and block out all else. I felt most relaxed when writing research papers about complex issues - in a state of Csikszentmihalyi's 'flow.' Victims like me feel comfortable and function optimally under extreme stress. We perform amazingly under pressure in hospital emergency rooms and under cross examination in the court room. We are the type you want in a life-threatening situation like a terror attack. But don't ask us to stand in aisle six and decide which brand of tea to purchase. Soldiers with PTSD do the same, perform brilliantly in the field yet fail to cope with simple decisions at home. Someone has to take that slack.

Before integration, I was impossibly demanding and stressful to live with. My children were vicariously traumatised to the point where they needed therapy themselves. My family felt responsible for fixing a situation only integration could alleviate. My husband's health was adversely affected by his constantly trying to placate me and juggle my mood swings. Our family safety was compromised by the vulnerability dissociation brings because a dissociative victim is accessible. Perpetrators trigger victims to keep the programming active, force the victim into error as part of a set-up, or access and instruct them under hypnosis.

When a victim is triggered by something that reminds them of the past, their right brain hemisphere is activated and reacts as if the trauma incident were presently occurring. They may feel angry, afraid, dizzy, and or nauseous, for example. Because their left brain is deactivated during a trigger, they do not know they are reliving a childhood trauma. Instead, they think they are emotionally reacting to something that is happening now. The left brain mistakes this right brain emotional perception as new stimuli related to the current surroundings and sets about doing its job of sequencing and ascribing context. It pins the blame on someone or thing in the victim's immediate environment. I typically blamed my husband and kids.

Trauma-Based Forced Dissociation damages the frontal lobes and splits these areas from the remaining brain. The frontal lobes conduct the brain, like someone conducts an orchestra. Frontal lobe executive dysfunction impairs the victim's ability to plan, organise, concentrate, remember, multi-task, make decisions, control emotions, put the brakes on inappropriate behaviour, and find the motivation to start a job task. The result is chaos, like when every instrument in an orchestra plays a different tune. When someone is not integrated, the burden of their chaotic mind falls onto others, mainly family. It takes a team of mental health workers, plus many thousands of dollars, to manage a dissociative client's daily life. The workload and associated costs are severely reduced by integration.

I integrated because I hate pain. I could not stand the physical pain caused by dissociation. I could not stand that sickly, confused sense of dread that consumed my being at Halloween and other significant ritual dates. I was tired of unconscious trauma memories manifesting as depression, anxiety, terror, anger, hypervigilance, nightmares, and inexplicable mood swings. I was tired of losing control of my emotions and will. My entire life was one big trauma response. Prior to integration, every decision I made was informed by my trauma experiences.

Sleep disturbance is another reason to integrate. Prior to dealing with my issues I suffered dreadful sleep disturbances. In my youth I awoke from nightmares, screaming. I had trouble falling and staying asleep. A clue to the relevance of consistent sleep is found in the following extract:

> A study was carried out at Stanford University some years ago concerning the nature of brainwashing… Not interruption of sleep but lack of dreaming was important. Theories now suggest that what we experience during the day is processed through dreams at night; when this continuity is broken, we lose our psychological equilibrium and controls.[487]

Sleep is essential for processing. Victims are typically programmed not to sleep, to stop them processing, remembering and integrating. I slept soundly for the first time in my life, after processing my ritual abuse memories in my early 20s.

CONVERTED

I spent two years trying to convince my DID friend to integrate, and all I got in return was constant resistance and arguments. Then, one day, she announced she was pursuing integration. When I asked why, she said the same thing I had been saying:

You feel all the pain and negative emotions associated with the torture and trauma anyhow, in a constant loop, so you may as well just face the fear, process the memory, and break the loop. That way, you have one less set of painful memories impacting your daily life. And with each integration, you begin to stabilise more and more.

INTEGRATION IS NO CURE-ALL

I had hoped integration would completely cure my PTSD. It didn't. Complex PTSD may be a permanent, developmental condition. The standard treatment for PTSD involves convincing the client that although they were unsafe during the original trauma, they are safe now. The problem is, the victim must remove herself from the source of trauma in order to heal. In the case of victims of ritual abuse and mind control, the abuse is ongoing thanks to perpetual harassment from the trafficking network. Thus, my fellow victims and I have never had the chance to completely recover.

Another limitation is that the brain only has so much plasticity when it comes to reversing personality changes forcibly created during development. It is like sending a young child to ballet to straighten out her twisted knees. The resultant changes stick for life. Similarly, I can't easily switch back to the introvert I was until age three years.

While a victim's brain can't be completely restored as though it were never tampered with, successful integration achieves remarkable clarity of mind and dramatic symptom reduction, making it a worthwhile goal. Integration completely removed many symptoms of forced dissociation, and dramatically reduced the intensity and duration of my PTSD symptomology. The difference between dissociation and integration is like comparing a nightmare with dawn.

INTEGRATE WHILE YOUNG

I tried to fully integrate in the early 1990s but lacked the therapeutic support to do so. Consequently, I had to wait another 25 years to finish the process. I found integration extra physically and mentally gruelling due to my older age. Young people bounce back more easily. With integration I began noticing the physical pain my body had always been in, particularly the nerve damage years of electrocution caused. My integration correlated with a sharp decline in my neurological health including memory and concentration. I think it caused brain damage. So, I recovered mentally just in time to begin my physical decline into old age.

I integrated too late to do something constructive with my life. I am now too old and disabled to work, to start all over again in some career. Had I integrated 30 years ago I might have been able to establish myself in a chosen profession unheeded by susceptibility to triggers. Most importantly, I woke from my dissociative slumber to realise my kids were grown, and that I had not been psychologically (or sometimes physically) present for them. I longed to experience motherhood all over again with an in-tact mind.

These are the reasons I recommend victims pursue integration in their youth.

RECIPE FOR THERAPY SUCCESS

I will now explain what worked for me and why. I will offer my approach to the forced dissociation typically encountered within ritual abuse and MK-ULTRA mind control. I am not presenting my experience as a set formula for fixing this type of abuse. Like I said, no two cases are identical. Each victim's abuse is individually tailored to their unique combination of personality, environmental, and other variables. Individual subject characteristics, the quality of technology used, plus perpetrator skill, shape how abuse manifests in a victim's therapy and daily life. For example, my perpetrators were the MK-ULTRA pioneers and used military grade equipment. When I was spun (as all victims are) it was on sophisticated equipment instead of a home-made spit roast set-up. A further example of difference is, I received a Grande Dame version of the Princess programming other victims report experiencing. These differences likely contributed to why:

1. My personality switches were comparatively seamless and manifested as mood swings, instead of blatant Sybil style switching.
2. I was co-conscious during therapy, while most victims remain dissociative and typically emerge from a session oblivious to what just occurred.
3. I have never heard voices, when most of the DID survivors I know do so.

I tested highly intuitive, creative and intelligent. This may explain how I designed and drove my own therapy process in the required direction. I trusted that my implicit memory knew where to go, based on its intimate knowledge of what Gittinger did to me. Further, I had experienced therapy both as a client and a practitioner, which armed me with understanding of how people's brains typically respond to therapy, how trauma memories behave, and how productive therapy feels.

Another factor to consider is, my experience of ritual abuse and mind control is the most extreme example imaginable, incorporating the entire menu of child abuse possibilities. Therefore, my integration was destined to be unusually complicated, intense, and dangerous. So, to reiterate – do not use my experience as a blueprint for recovery.

MY AIM

The purpose of this chapter, and the entire book, is to validate victim's memories and trigger new ones. For therapists, I provide clues regarding what happened to their clients, and suggestions for guiding victims on the healing path. The most important thing therapists say I provide them is an understanding of the programming and the roles played by dissociative parts. Therapists say I have helped them to: realise what questions to ask of clients; gain the trust of dissociated parts; relieve the guilt and shame felt by parts; convey belief and validation of client experience; relieve repressed emotion; and make sense of the trauma experience.

My primary aim is to provide victims with a sense of hope in the face of impossible adversity. My message is this: If I can do it, if I can survive the ultimate abuse experience, so can you. There is a way out of your unique programming matrix, and with persistence and trust in your Right Hemisphere, your implicit brain will lead the way.

DEFINITIONS

Understanding begins with appropriate language usage. Psychology and psychiatry are saturated with language and labels that simply do not explain or match my abuse experiences. Consequently, I have adapted or created my own relevant terms.

1. Trauma-Based Forced Dissociation is a term I created to describe when a victim is intentionally traumatised, using refined techniques, to artificially induce the brain's natural ability to dissociate. To explain, the brain is created with a defence system that kicks in when overwhelmed by sensory input. Consequently, when someone goes through the windscreen during a car crash, they might recall the moment prior to this, or perhaps the ambulance ride afterwards, but typically not the moment of impact. The brain naturally dissociates to protect the person from feeling overwhelmed by the trauma.

In 1991, psychiatrist John Briere conducted a study of post-traumatic dissociation in 450 male and female adults receiving therapy for child sexual abuse. On average, the abuse started at age 6.5 years, lasted 11 years, and involved two perpetrators. Near 60 percent of subjects experienced abuse-related amnesia before the age of 18 years. The study also showed the likelihood of memory repression increased with certain variables: abuse at an earlier age, longer duration, and greater violence (e.g., multiple perpetrators, physical injury, threat of death if victim disclosed).[488]

Dirty doctors, psychologists, and neuroscientists conducted unethical research experiments to understand this natural dissociation phenomenon. They discovered how sensory overload techniques (including spinning, torture, auditory and visual stimulation, and psychotropic drugs) coupled with unethical hypnosis, could induce dissociation on demand. The result of trauma-based forced dissociation is a compartmentalised brain. Each 'alter' sits isolated behind amnesia walls and possesses its own network of neural circuitry. Experts in personality and motivation then load each isolated brain section with an independent set of memories and personality characteristics. The abusers also intentionally create neural circuits which act as thought loop traps, so that instead of processing the abuse memories, the victim's mind gets stuck in unproductive thought cycles in the form of intellectualisation, or obsessive thoughts.

2. Integration is the retracing and unravelling of the forced dissociation process. Integration results when the victim's brain overwrites the unhealthy neural pathways that perpetrators created via unethical conditioning, and then rewrites those pathways with new knowledge. This process depends on neuroplasticity, the brain's ability to change. Belief in the brain's plasticity is what enables the victim to cut replacement neural pathways and so achieve integration.

To illustrate, I suffered a vestibular system stroke in 2009 which affected my vision and balance. Following the stroke, I could not balance on one leg, when immediately prior to my injury I attended a weekly acrobatics class in which I effortlessly performed front walkovers. Thinking my stroke was in the visual processing system, I embarked upon a relevant rehabilitation program. While this did restore a significant amount of functioning including improved balance, a vestibular rehabilitation program six years later was life changing. My rehabilitation therapists attributed my success to my belief in neuroplasticity, in the brain's ability to cut new neural pathways to bypass my stroke damage. They drew comparison to a physiotherapy student who failed the same therapy program simply because he did not believe it could work.

My point is, victims must have faith in the therapy process. They must believe their subconscious brain knows exactly what happened to them and will tell them what steps to take in order to heal. In fact, the victim's brain will usually know better than any therapist.

3. Trauma-Focussed Therapy identifies and processes the traumatic incidents that initially caused the dissociation. It treats the cause instead of the symptoms of dissociation. Nothing substantial results from topical therapy techniques that superficially manage anxiety and depression, or which focus on meeting every dissociative part. The MK-ULTRA perpetrators know this, which is why their modern therapy approaches designed to keep victims in a perpetual state of dissociation, helplessness, vulnerability, and dependence on a psychiatric system that has failed to heal since its inception 100 years ago.

4. Developmental Trauma Injury (DTI) is a term derived by James Shanahan to describe a permanent condition caused by chronic early childhood trauma. This condition has no name within mainstream psychiatry, notably the DSM. While it lacks a name, it therefore has no treatment and can be misattributed to other inappropriate and unhelpful labels. This problem is by design since psychiatry traditionally taught doctors that child abuse has zero harmful effects.

Two DSM labels that mainstream psychiatry and psychology use are DID (formerly MPD) and PTSD. These terms do not adequately capture the complexity of ritual abuse and mind control. Trauma has its greatest impact during a child's first decade and becomes more like PTSD with age. So, PTSD does not accurately describe the impact of childhood trauma on a developing brain. The terms Complex Trauma and Complex PTSD have been used by trauma-focussed therapists, but they too are developmentally insensitive and not listed in the DSM. Van Der Kolk[489] provided an argument for the inclusion of Developmental Trauma Disorder in the DSM-5; however, the word 'disorder' beguiles the criminal nature of what was inflicted upon victims. I think Developmental Trauma Injury best describes the impact of early-onset child abuse on development.

NATURE OF TRAUMA-BASED DISSOCIATION

Treating mind control victims requires an understand of what the perpetrators did to cause the dissociation. Knowing removes the power that mystery has over the victim and transitions the victim from learned helplessness into feeling empowered to act. Conscious awareness is the key to rupturing and collapsing the programming, just like the final scene of The Matrix film.

The MK-ULTRA mind control process is based on trauma. Trauma is employed at every step of the way. Trauma is used to: create the initial attachment violation; bond victims to their perpetrators; fragment the brain into multiple personalities; program or condition a victim; and enhance a victims' natural abilities. Since mind control is trauma based, it is essential for victims and therapists to understand how perpetrators manipulate the human body's natural trauma response, and treat victims using a trauma-focussed therapy approach. There is a known typical response to chronic trauma experienced during childhood. This response kicks in when a child is exposed to multiple occurrences of sexual, physical or psychological abuse, or neglect. This trauma response is what most leading psychologists and psychiatrists in the 1950s - 70s were CIA-funded to study and artificially induce within a laboratory setting. Considered in the context of ritual abuse and mind control, the trauma process reveals how and why CIA perpetrators manipulated it.

CIA-funded scientists mapped exactly which part of the brain does what. The public have not been granted access to this information. Instead, a general idea of perpetrator methods is obtained from examining and comparing: what mainstream therapists know about the effects of chronic childhood trauma; the relationship of this to the attachment process; the content of mainstream scientific research publications relevant to trauma and memory; and the wealth of knowledge stored in victims' implicit memory.

Victims typically know what was done to them and why. Gittinger stored this information somewhere in my brain, in preparation for my becoming a programmer. While I do not immediately recall this content, if I follow a hunch it invariably leads to a flood of recall.

IMPLICIT TRAUMA MEMORY STORAGE

A RIGHT → LEFT → RIGHT model of hemispheric processing makes sense of how the brain processes trauma. The right hemisphere is emotional, intuitive, tactile, and visual-spatial. It receives new stimuli including sight, taste, smell, sound, touch, and body position. The right brain functions implicitly. Its implicit functions include attention, learning, thinking, and memory. It communicates non-verbally via facial expression and body language. The left hemisphere compares new information with known information. It sequences and categorises new based on previous experience, which stamps the experience with a time-date-place. The left brain applies simple language to a new experience so it may be discussed by the victim.

Different types of memory are supported by different brain systems. One major distinction exists between short and long-term memory. Long-term memory is further divided into two categories:

- Explicit memory is conscious, verbal, comparative, and stored in the left hemisphere.
- Implicit memory is non-conscious, non-verbal, and is stored in the right hemisphere. It include visual images, emotions, and body sensations.

The right brain unconsciously stores and responds to emotions, faces, gestures, places, smells, sounds, and touch that a victim experienced in childhood. Body sensations are unconsciously regulated by the autonomic nervous system (which controls heartbeat, blood flow, breathing, digestion, etc). Hence a direct link between implicit memories and body reactions.

Traumatic memories are not processed like ordinary ones. Trauma causes the explicit memory system to fail and the implicit memory system to activate instead. Trauma experiences enter the right hemisphere. They are not passed to the left hemisphere for processing. Consequently, trauma memories remain fragmented and stuck in the right hemisphere as unconscious pictures, emotions, and physical sensations. Trauma memories lack the left-brain sequencing that makes sense of experience, and the language application needed to verbally describe experience. This is how repressed trauma memories form, and how the body remembers what the conscious mind forgets.

The body remembers what the conscious mind forgets

Research indicates trauma and dissociation are localised in the implicit right brain. For instance, fMRI research shows mainly right hemispheric activation in PTSD patients during dissociation.[490] Further, flashbacks activate the right hemisphere and deactivate the left. Specifically, Brodmann's area 19 lights up in the right brain while Broca's area blacks out in the left.

The hippocampus is essential for certain forms of learning and memory. Autobiographical memories rely on hippocampal processing and storage of what, where and when life events occur. The hippocampus is associated with implicit memory, including relational memory for face-scene pairings, incidental learning, long-term memory retrieval, and rapid associative learning. Chronic trauma damages the hippocampus and causes difficulty with storing and recalling information. During a trauma event, the flood of sensory information short-circuits the hippocampus. Trauma memories, including emotions and visual images, bypass hippocampal processing and move directly to implicit memory where they stay undigested, perpetually stuck in the age at which the trauma happened.

Mainstream scientists recently developed a prosthetic hippocampus. When a brain receives sensory input, it creates a memory that travels through multiple areas of the hippocampus. The signal is re-encoded at each area until it reaches the final region as a completely different signal that is sent off for long-term storage. DARPA (US Defence Advanced Research Projects Agency) commissioned university and hospital scientists to create an artificial memory system that interfered with this encoding system.[491] Researchers identified a brain's neural firing patterns, synthesised a neural firing code from this, and used an electrode implant to communicate this code. They then bypassed a section of neural pathway in the hippocampus and used their implant to bridge this gap by relaying the implant's neural message, in the brain's own code.

Publications on this project have been vague and varied. Depending on what we read, the device reportedly bypasses the hippocampus, is a hippocampal implant, forms new long-term memories, creates short-term memories, creates implicit memories, reinforces learning, replaces memory, or improves memory. Whatever the description, DARPA, who are solely into weaponizing everything they fund, developed a brain implant that can be used to implant implicit conditioning (programming), repress memory, and create false memories. Declassified documents reveal the US military have long possessed science and technology that is decades in advance of mainstream publication. It is therefore plausible that MK-ULTRA perpetrators possessed the technology for manipulating the hippocampus back in the 1970s.

PAVLOVIAN FEAR CONDITIONING

The hippocampus plays a role in regulating the fear response. Hippocampal damage prevents the person consciously remembering they were conditioned to fear something - but does not affect the actual fear conditioning itself. Also, strong emotions including fear naturally bypass the hippocampus and prove hard to extinguish.

The fear response is an example of classical conditioning, a type of implicit memory which formed the basis of MK-ULTRA mind control. Pavlov (1927) paired a bell (conditioned stimulus) with a shock (unconditioned stimulus). This pairing triggered an aversive emotional state (fear) at the sound of the bell. The conditioned stimulus elicits an innate behavioural response, plus physiological responses controlled by the autonomic nervous system or the endocrine systems.

Classical conditioning develops and maintains PTSD. Orval Hobart Mowrer's (1960) Two-Factor Learning Theory incorporated classical and operant conditioning. The first factor is learning by association (classical conditioning). The second factor is instrumental learning (avoidance behaviour) which involves consistent avoidance of both the conditioned stimulus (bell) and the unconditioned stimulus (electrocution). This theory explains PTSD triggers. The fear generated by child abuse is associated with other cues (e.g., medical procedures) which are avoided by the victim.

At age 10 years, I was conditioned with the fear response as follows. ANSTO staff strapped my body to a medical bed and connected my brain to an EEG. They electrocuted my chest with paddles every time the EEG monitor indicated I was starting to fall asleep. This produced terror, a heart reaction, and an adrenalin surge. Consequently, when extremely threatened in adulthood, my fear triggered a physical sensation, a flashback. Every time I began falling asleep, I was jolted awake by a massive adrenalin surge, chest pain, and a heart that exceeded 240 beats per minute – perhaps higher, as that was the measurement device's threshold.

FLASHBACKS

These are resurfacing visual images, sounds, smells, emotions, and physical sensations that were stored in the right brain's implicit memory during a trauma experience, and which flash into conscious awareness unchanged by the passing of time. During flashbacks, victims experience the images, emotions, and physical sensations they experienced during the trauma incident (which became frozen in time and remained undigested in the right hemisphere) as if they are experiencing them for the first time.

My first and clearest visual flashback occurred in 1991. I was sitting in a hospital bed when the room completely disappeared, and an entirely different scene appeared. It was like someone suddenly changed the channel on an enormous television screen. Suddenly I was looking close-up at a waterfall of blood cascading in slow motion. At the time I had no idea what I was seeing. After drawing the experience, I realised this was a memory from when I was five years old. I was kneeling in front of a table with my hands tied behind my back. My step-grandfather and his next-door neighbour were murdering the neighbour's three-year-old son on a makeshift altar in his front room. I was drugged, which explains why everything was a little fuzzy and moving in slow motion during my flashback.

My most bizarre visual flashback occurred early one morning. I awoke hungover from a party the night before. I awoke in a mildly dissociative state due to the alcohol which, according to Wendy-Louise Walker, causes dissociation. I was disturbed by light streaming through the window. Every time I closed my eyes, I saw a sepia-coloured film projected onto the back of my eyelids. I saw landscape moving away from me at a rapid pace. I opened my eyes, thinking I was imagining things, then closed them again. Next, I saw landscape moving toward me. I stayed with the image and soon realised it was a visual flashback. I was riding in the back of an army jeep with a unit of male soldiers dressed in combat gear and carrying guns. I was seated on the left side with my back to the outside. When I looked toward the front of the vehicle, I saw two soldiers: a driver on the left, and a passenger seated in the right-hand side wearing a helmet and holding a gun. When I looked out the rear of the jeep, I saw we were driving on a dirt road. The landscape resembled parts of Australia, but it wasn't. I explored this memory further using EMDR and remembered I was in Central America at age 14. I Googled the guns, uniforms and landscape I saw in my visual flashback and concluded it was Nicaragua.

My most memorable physical sensation flashback occurred when I was asleep. I suddenly awoke at 1am, screaming and arching at being electrocuted when I was 10 years old. It felt exactly like being electrocuted in the here and now. I could feel a huge 50cm wide electrode on my back and the individual pin pricks of heat. I screamed like I was being murdered. My startled husband stuffed a pillow over my face for fear of the neighbours phoning the police, which didn't help.

Some flashbacks last days. On one occasion I had a flashback of being drugged. I felt stoned for three days. The most excruciating episode was a three-day pain flashback which I likened to drug-free childbirth. Valium did nothing to reduce the pain.

Flashbacks like these are rare and increase in intensity and duration when the victim actively seeks integration. More commonly, repressed memories surface as comparatively mild physical sensations including: headaches, migraine, isolated external head pain, chest pain, limb pain, weakness, fatigue, sleepiness, racing heart, shortness of breath, dizziness, unsteadiness, vertigo, fainting, chest tightness, shaking, itchiness, sweating, nausea, stomach aches, numbness, tingling, surreal sense, choking sensation, hot flashes, cold chills, blurred vision, ringing in the ears, and irregular heartbeat. Victims, therapists, and doctors are typically clueless regarding the cause of these symptoms, so they treat them with drugs instead of identifying and treating the trauma that caused the symptoms.

> Other symptoms of survivors include grand mal epileptic seizures with a temporary cessation of breathing. Doctors managed to strap one survivor to an EEG machine in the midst of a seizure – his brain waves registered normal – in other words, the fit was not a true grand mal, but a body memory of electric shocks years after the torture occurred. [492]

STATE-DEPENDENT MEMORY

Flashbacks are triggered when the victim returns to the state of mind they were in at the time of the original trauma. This mechanism is based on the concept of state-dependent memory which determines that memory retrieval works best when a victim is in the same state of consciousness they were in when the memory was created.

In 2015, researchers identified a brain mechanism that can (a) hide traumatic memories, and (b) retrieve those repressed memories.[493] Scientists administered to mice a drug that stimulates extra-synaptic GABA receptors. These receptors alter the brain's state and can make a person 'aroused, sleepy, alert, sedated, inebriated or even psychotic.' The drug made the mice mildly inebriated. The doped mice were put in a Skinner box and electrocuted. When the mice were returned to the same box the next day, they did not recall being electrocuted and so behaved normally. However, when scientists drugged them before putting them in the box again, the mice froze in fear. The mice remembered being electrocuted after they were returned to the same brain state created by the drug.

This experiment demonstrates that:

a. extra-synaptic GABA receptors help to encode trauma memories and store them in the subconscious memory system; and
b. trauma that occurs while extra-synaptic GABA receptors are activated can't be remembered unless the same receptors are reactivated.

In lay terms, this study indicates that drugs and electrocution can be used to create, and then access, repressed trauma memories. If a child is drugged while being electrocuted, the drug reroutes processing and forces the brain to store memories in the implicit system where they can't be consciously accessed. To access the implicit memory, the brain must be returned to the same state of consciousness as when the memory was stored - the same emotional mood, physical place, activity, drug-induced condition, or hypnosis-induced dissociative state. The mice study suggests something else – that triggers may be used to retrieve repressed memories.

TRIGGERS ARE TREASURES

Trauma causes the child's brain to create a neural pathway that is managed by the instinctual part of the brain. This lower brain area assumes control over brain and body functions including the fight-flight response. The new pathway is maintained by reminders of the original trauma. These reminders, or triggers, can be smells, tastes, sounds, sights, situations, or body movements. When exposed to the trigger, the child responds as if being traumatised again, and shifts into fight-flight mode.

Perpetrators regularly retraumatise the victim throughout childhood and adulthood, to keep desired neural pathways open, unwanted neural pathways shut, and the final programming structure intact. The CIA and their complicit organisations employ agent scum, informants, and provocateurs to continually harass, set-up, and retraumatise adult victims. To the outsider, this highly organised, standardised operation looks like the victim is either paranoid or - as one of my friends labelled me - a 'shit magnet.'

Victims of ritual abuse and mind control are conditioned to avoid triggers. People place trigger warnings at the start of videos and articles about the subject. Therapists are careful not to trigger their DID clients. In the early 1990s, therapists were taught to ‘respect patients’ defence mechanisms,’ which was another way of saying, do not trigger clients. This avoidance of triggers is another means of keeping victims stuck in their trauma cycle.

Since 1991, I have swum against the ignorant tide and encouraged victims to bulldoze through their defence mechanisms and embrace triggers. Triggers are the key to memory retrieval. Consider: when you lose your car keys, your memory must be triggered for you to recall where you left them. It’s a common-sense, right-brain concept.

Triggers are the key to memory retrieval

Here is an email to my therapist which provides an extreme example of how I used triggering to retrieve my memories. My co-consciousness allowed me to steer the therapy process. Using EMDR as an ignition, I could dive into my subconscious mind, target specific memories, fish these out and draw them into my conscious awareness.

20/02/2015 3:08 PM

This is what I need to do –
I need to deal with the attachment violation.
Whatever Gittinger did to abuse this phenomenon has risen to the surface of my consciousness.
It is preventing me from functioning.
Unfortunately, I must endure more pain
before I can deal with it.
I can’t concentrate, study, function
In this state of distraction.

Anticipation of this planned remedy is all that is sustaining me right now.
I need a double session asap.
I am getting Jon to download the footage of Gittinger, join the several segments of his speaking, repeat this footage over and over on a loop and place the loop footage on a DVD.
Then, I need you to do the EMDR.
As soon as you have done the EMDR
I need Jon to play the Gittinger footage on our TV.
I need you to do the EMDR 3 times allowing me to process and react between each dose.
I do not want you to refuse to repeat the EMDR – no matter what you perceive my reaction to be.
I know exactly what I am doing and you must trust me.
My heart will certainly hold up -
it was fine even during the flat-lining regression.
It is just a simulation and not the real thing,
if that makes sense.

You and Jon must not touch me during any of this - unless I tell you to.

You must not talk during this process – because saying the wrong thing pulls me out and prevents me from revisiting the place I need to see.
I do not want to be grounded in any way to the present.
I must be allowed to completely relive this one.
Do not tell me that ‘it’s over’ or to ‘just let it be there, do not fight it’ –
These instructions are, and have always been,
Counter-productive and inapplicable to what I am doing.
I suspect I must travel back through 3 layers of programmed walls to reach the attachment programming.

If we screw this up –
I will only have to start all over again and I will not be able to move forward until this process is achieved.
I anticipate this will rip open the attachment programming.
If I have Gittinger’s voice playing on a loop in the background
I should be able to trigger myself and steer my mind to locate the memory.
I do not care how exhausting or dangerous it looks –
It is only me revisiting the past.
I know when this is happening that I am not actually there.
I am more than prepared for this.
I am in no way at risk.
I just need you to trust me and follow my instruction.

INTEGRATION RISKS

I do not suggest others copy how I did things. I knowingly, stubbornly flogged my body to its limits. I could have suffered a heart attack while processing the worst of my memories. Ideally, I should have had a medical team on standby during this stage of my healing and completed the most intense work as an inpatient in a suitable clinic with nursing staff and therapists who knew what they were doing. But this does not exist in Australia, so I winged it.

Integration is a dangerous, painful process, the risks of which should be carefully considered before commencing. Beside the risks associated with abreaction, know that memory recovery triggers the programmers’ built-in defence system. Each program is connected to a trauma incident which, when remembered, destroys the program. Consequently, programmers do everything to stop victims remembering their trauma. The programmers protect each program with a booby-trap which, when triggered, initiates conditioned pain, OCD thought loops, depression, anxiety, flooding, flashbacks, suicidal ideation, or the desire to self-harm. It is crucial for the victim to realise, these are not her thoughts, behaviours or will, but externally imposed thoughts and feelings. The victim must be relieved of the guilt and blame associated with artificially induced thoughts, feelings and behaviours. This includes being turned into a Manchurian Candidate and made to commit criminal acts they would otherwise shun from had they not been brainwashed zombies.

THERAPIST CHOICE

Integration starts with a suitable therapist. The last thing a victim needs is a lousy therapist who ditches them mid-integration. To maximise your chances of successful integration, select a therapist with a minimum 10 years of experience as a trauma-focussed practitioner. Ensure they possess advanced EMDR training and regularly update their skills at trauma-relevant workshops. You want someone stable who has worked on their own crap, and who entered the industry because they like helping people rather than to fix their own issues. Avoid someone who started off enthusiastic but has since become disillusioned with the industry. Ask them how and why they ended up in psychology, and whether they themselves have experienced therapy. If they become defensive at your probing, wave goodbye.

A therapist must be intelligent and intuitive enough to work with bright victims. Psychologists gained an idea of their IQ level while learning IQ testing. Ask your candidate therapist what their IQ is. If it is under 130, they will prove too left-brain dominant and narrow-minded, feel threatened by victims, not understand your cognitive style, and relish at every opportunity to disprove your intelligence. Sounds immature, but it happens all the time. Some therapists will even use the power imbalance to punish victims.

You need a therapist who is open-minded enough to appreciate that reality stretches beyond the limits of their own experience, so they do not mistake our legitimate experiences for insanity. You want someone who understands the spiritual dimension without erring toward the occult. Genuine Bible-believing Christian therapists are by far the best, but these are rare. Christianity is the cult’s favourite cover. Most churches are social clubs at best, child trafficking operations at worst. For this reason, avoid most church-based counselling services.

Therapist Gender

For all victims, there are benefits to experiencing both male and female therapists at different stages of their healing process. But the implications of therapist gender should be considered. Many therapists have sex with their clients. And I am not just talking about male therapists. Female therapists will seduce male or female clients. I know of a female therapist in my local area who had sex with a dissociative female client’s child alter. I researched the predator to find she was a proud member of the Freemason Order of the Eastern Star.

Sometimes an unsuspecting therapist can be seduced. The sexual advances of a young, attractive female specifically trained to target and arouse men can be hard for male therapists to resist, since the male brain shuts down at a certain point during arousal. This is one way a victim will test the therapist. If he fails the test, he will likely meet a less attractive personality with combat skills. So, I recommend female victims engage a female therapist until the Beta alter is an integrated conscious brain component.

Therapist Commitment

Embarking upon the integration process is akin to boarding a roller coaster. Once the ride commences, the individual has three options: endure until the end when integration is achieved, be captured by the cult and reprogrammed, or jump. The therapist must commit to supporting the victim for the duration of the ride before it begins. Pulling out half-way can kill a client. It is the therapist’s responsibility to ensure they have the knowledge and skills to do the job, and not chicken out the moment things become uncomfortable – as they surely will.

TRAUMA & ATTACHMENT

The impact of trauma is buffered by a child's attachment bond to their parents. If the attachment bond is missing, the child stops depending on others for help, and she can't regulate her emotions. Consequently, she becomes anxious, angry, and long to be cared for. Perpetrators intentionally destroy the child's natural attachment bond using torture to cause overwhelming trauma. They then take advantage of the child's longing for caring by using love bombing to create artificial attachment bonds between the child victim and her perpetrators. The bond between therapist and mind control victim is unique because it is influenced by the attachment violation perpetrated against the victim at a young age. The child's natural attachment to their biological mother was purposely and viciously severed. The victim was artificially bonded to a surrogate mother, the Grande Dame. My attachment with this person was particularly strong, considering my Grande Dame candidacy which made her my mentor and confidant. To further complicate the usual therapeutic relationship, most abusers are psychologists or psychiatrists.

All this guarantees the victim will displace their feelings for her abusers, plus their attachment issues, onto the therapist. Subsequently, apart from the standard cult harassment and threats, the therapist's greatest challenge is managing the client-therapist bond which must be firmly established before any major integration work starts.

THERAPEUTIC BONDING

The therapist provides a substitute attachment until the victim can develop a secure internal attachment. This process took me 18 months and it was a terrifying act of trust. Bonding with a therapist is essential for memory access and brain integration. Once the bond occurs, and all personality fragments agree to trust the therapist with their lives, the victim automatically transfers all feelings for the perpetrators onto the therapist. The upside to this situation is, the therapist is granted unprecedented access to the victim's mind and memories. The victim responds to the therapist's voice and instruction like a robot. Such passivity enables the victim to be pacified during times of extreme distress, by the mere sound of the therapist's voice.

The downside to this bonding is, the victim is totally dependent on the therapist for as long as the portal to her past is open. At each trauma, bout of excruciating pain, wave of fear or terror, the victim seeks the therapist's voice - like when a screaming baby settles upon hearing her mother. If that voice does not come, the victim's pain and panic escalate. As in a mother-child relationship, the victim is pacified by just knowing the therapist is contactable. Much internal chaos can be avoided if the therapist is merely available. A sense of availability reduces the number of times the victim needs to physically contact the therapist. If the therapist is largely unavailable, if the victim must demand, beg and work for every minute of productive therapy received, this exacerbates the victim's frustration, anger, exhaustion, and the sense that she is losing her mind.

As part of the bonding process, every front personality fragment will manifest and test the therapist, to determine whether they are intelligent, ethical, caring, humble, and spiritual enough to see the process through to its conclusion. Even after the therapeutic relationship is established, the victim will test the therapist at regular intervals, to check they are sufficiently committed for the victim to progress to the next level. The therapist may be challenged on every aspect of their existence. This makes the victim demanding, yet her demands are purpose driven: the victim is checking whether she will die during the encroaching integration process.

The bonding process is exacerbated within the client if the therapist maintains an us-and-them mentality toward clients. All the above can be avoided if the therapist presents as an equal to the client and discards the elitist attitudes typically fostered in therapists at university. Therapy only works once a mutual relationship, akin to friendship, is formed between the victim and therapist.

EFFECTIVE THERAPY APPROACHES

The therapeutic goal is to cut new neural pathways that allow the brain's isolated systems to work together. Effective therapy stimulates bilateral processing, releases the content of implicit memory, and lets the left brain transform right brain implicit emotional learnings and visual and somatic experiences into explicit verbal events. Effective therapy enables the victim to identify and verbalise emotion and make logical sense of the trauma experience, so she can cognitively respond rather than emotionally react to triggers. Responding involves the victim consciously recognising she has been triggered and taking practical steps to stimulate her vagus nerve and calm her sympathetic fight-flight system.

The therapeutic goal is to make all brain systems work together

THE INTEGRATION PROCESS

'Phase-orientated' therapy for DID follows three recognisable treatment stages:

- Establish safety, stabilisation and symptom reduction.
- Contain and process trauma memories and feelings.
- Integration and rehabilitation.[494]

However, treating DID stemming from ritual abuse and mind control is not that simple, for two reasons:

1. our abuse is ongoing due to constant targeting, and
2. our brain splits were intentionally, not organically, created.
3.

If your recovery can follow the above neat pattern – great. Mine could not. My treatment was a messy blur. I did identify a sequence to the memory retrieval process. I repeated three basic steps for each trauma incident:

1. Remember
2. Articulate
3. Abreact.

If I processed a memory according to these steps, it never bothered further. Sometimes revisited the same event that I experienced in more than one state of consciousness, in more than one personality state, or from a different physical position. For example, I processed being near drowned in a ritual pool in a cavern system beneath ANSTO and Holsworthy. Years later, I had to process this same experience, only this time it was a memory of being suspended in the air above the pool. My brain had somehow stored the single event as two separate experiences.

Trauma memory recall typically starts with the victim experiencing a nightmare, emotion, visual image, or body sensation flashback. The victim then attends therapy which focusses on that symptom. Effective therapy accesses the visual images of the trauma incident, body sensations, and emotions experienced during the childhood trauma. The victim must verbally describe the trauma incident. At some stage, she must feel the repressed emotion that occurred with the abuse; this may be delayed, hitting the person the following day. Ongoing therapy intervention and aftercare are essential to the integration process. Drawing the abuse incident provides further detail and clarity. Swimming aids hemispheric digestion and soothes the sympathetic nervous system.

According to this sequence, I processed the first half of my memories using art therapy, and the second half using EMDR in conjunction with drawing. Internally, the process of art therapy and EMDR feel similar. Both bypass the unethical hypnosis, ECT, and drug effects to access implicit memory. Both allow victims to resurface and process trauma material at a manageable pace and intensity level. The brain only brings up what it can cope with at the time.

The brain only ever raises what it can cope with at the time

ART THERAPY

Art therapy is both a learned skill and an intuitive artform. Anybody can acquire basic skills, but it takes innate creative ability to read a drawing like a brain scan and direct the process. The victim does not need artistic ability to do art therapy. If they can draw stick figures, they can do art therapy. Besides, they soon free up and surprise themselves. The only material required are fat crayons in a range of colours and a pile of copying paper. It is important for the client to know that it does not matter whether what they draw is an actual event or a product of their imagination. All roads lead to Rome. The unconscious memory content will seep out in either symbolic or concrete form. Telling the client to 'just guess' what might have happened to them, accesses implicit memory and stimulates intuition. And I found that repeating an instruction at least three times helps to bypass unethical hypnosis.

EMDR

When I first heard about EMDR, I dismissed it as a hypnosis offshoot. Like hypnosis, EMDR is a form of bilateral stimulation. Unlike hypnosis, it is non-suggestive. There are two main ways of delivering EMDR: (1) Directed eye movements, or (2) Alternating bilateral hand taps. I experienced both. When dealing with the strongest memories in the lead up to integration, the therapist would wave a hand back and forth across my eyes. I would then sit back and wait for whatever came to mind. My next therapist had me place my hands face down on a pillow and alternatively tap the tops of my hands.

During EMDR memory reprocessing, memories are retrieved from implicit memory, processed in working memory, and re-stored in long-term memory. The left brain reprocesses and reorganize the implicit trauma experiences; it sequences the event, applies context (time-date-place), and finds language to describe what happened. The pivotal trauma memories must be retrieved and fully processed, including re-experiencing, or abreacting, the emotions.

EMDR cognitively processes traumatic events.[495] The underlying neural mechanism of action of EMDR remains unknown. EMDR does not appear to produce the altered consciousness state associated with hypnosis.[496] EMDR may act as hemispheric synchronization.[497] The psychologist in charge of the Monroe Institute advertises EMDR as a form of hemispheric synchronization. Neurobiological models suggest EMDR increases interhemispheric communication via the corpus callosum. The most recent hypothesis is that EMDR simultaneously increases connectivity between the two hemispheres, plus within the right hemisphere.[498] [499] Trauma memories are disseminated into the right hemisphere as meaningless, dissociated fragments, like pieces of a shattered mirror. The goal of EMDR is to reassemble those visual, auditory, and somatosensory fragments.

ABREACTION

Freud coined the term abreaction to describe the release of the strong emotion associated with a repressed trauma memory. The emotion became stuck in time at the point of the original childhood trauma and is being properly processed for the first time, though abreaction. When a victim abreacts implicit trauma memories, the mind and body react as though the childhood event is presently happening. So, when I abreacted being flatlined at age 10 years, I was in danger of my heart stopping again in adulthood.

EMDR pioneer Shapiro devoted a significant portion of her original clinical manual to defining and describing abreaction, and to providing guidelines for using EMDR to accommodate abreaction of repressed emotions.[500] On page 96, the author specifically addressed the inherent risks associated with reprocessing near death experiences and torture by electrocution. Shapiro described how practitioners prepared for extreme cases by having resuscitation equipment and medical staff ready.

Abreaction is essential. Presently, I see no other way of processing the emotional trauma associated with extreme abuse. Yet mainstream therapy is changing the definition and therapeutic role of abreaction. One of my therapists argues that abreaction is too traumatising and has no place in the EMDR reprocessing experience. They prefer to focus on how I feel now about my childhood trauma, as an adult reflecting on the abuse, instead of at the time of the childhood abuse. This is the denial approach pushed by Antony Kidman and the APS guidelines on repressed memories.

‘FLASH’ EMDR

This latest addition was devised to address concerns about clients like me whose trauma memories are extremely intense, and who dissociate during EMDR. Flash EMDR produces favourable results in relatively minor trauma cases that involve natural dissociation and adult trauma experiences. It does not effectively process developmental trauma stemming from forced dissociation. Do not compare ritual abuse, trauma-based mind control, and ongoing cult and government harassment, with anything less. The intensity of repressed emotion and subsequent abreaction is proportionate to the severity of the trauma to which it is attached and must be treated accordingly.

THE VORTEX

I clearly recall the moment the 'vortex' to my past opened. It was during an initial EMDR session. I was suddenly struck with a memory and I nearly leapt from the chair. I describe the vortex as a deep, jagged wound, shaped like the opening an old-fashioned can opener cuts into a tin can. It remained open for 1.5 years and closed the day after Richie Benaud's death at Easter 2015. My brain informed me the moment it closed, by sending me a soft yet clear image of a thin veil of fresh flesh covering the wound.

The opened vortex allowed unprecedented access to my memories and let me relive and feel the pain associated with my child abuse. During therapy, my memories usually emerged as faint visual images followed by a flood of thoughts and feelings that I experienced at the time of the abuse. I would describe what I saw, before being struck with the repressed emotion. I abreacted the emotion and felt the physical sensations as though the trauma incident were presently occurring. I relived torture, spinning, drugging, unethical hypnosis, and electrocution. I felt the pain as though the torture were happening today.

I once heard a radio interview with a leading USA neurologist. He hypothesised that psychological pain registers in the brain as physical pain. The problem with nervous system pain is that others can't see it, and therefore they are likely to dismiss its severity. My pain was akin to having one's physical body smashed up in a car wreck and left to rot without anaesthetic for 1.5 years.

When a memory began surfacing, unless it was immediately processed my symptoms would exacerbate and I became increasingly at risk. The moment I finished processing my memory via EMDR and abreacted the accompanying feelings, the symptoms dissipated, and that memory immediately ceased to bother me.

The most critical times during the therapy process occurred when Gittinger's suicide programming was activated. Outside of the vortex being opened, and my being triggered, I was not a suicide risk. I did not even contemplate the notion of harming myself. However, mind control programming is layered with commands to involuntarily suicide.

Memory recovery was a violent experience that commenced with vertigo and ended with mild brain damage; it included memory loss and extreme light sensitivity. I suffered vertigo, nausea, chest pain, and cardiac dysrhythmia. The most critical 18 months of memory processing included Mengele's Core split plus Gittinger's attachment violation. These months took such a toll on my body, on several occasions I required physical nursing, which was non-existent.

GROUNDING

Despite being EMDR trained, my therapist knew nothing about grounding. I innately grounded myself to the present, to stop me becoming stuck or lost in the trauma memory. Visiting the past feels like dropping through a chasm in the floor, while holding someone's hand makes me feel like I will not fall. One time when I needed to wake up out of dissociation, I told my therapist to take my hand and squeeze it very hard. Although co-conscious during therapy and aware that I am not actually back there, I'm still at risk. I once got stuck mid-abreaction such that I looked at my therapist in terror and exclaimed, 'Don't leave me here!' At other times, when I needed to retrieve a deeply buried memory, I ensured no-one touched me.

HYPNOSIS

I used hypnosis long after I integrated my Core, and once I felt sufficiently stabilised. Hypnosis returned me to the state of consciousness I was in at the time of the abuse, thereby granting me unprecedented access to my hypnosis-related memories. I found it beneficial for processing deep, residual memories. My therapist combined hypnosis with EMDR, which accessed the most deeply buried memories.

If you could undergo hypnosis with a clean expert like Corydon Hammond, I'd say 'go for it.' Find Hammond's astounding Greenbaum Speech on YouTube and consult his hypnosis handbook[501] to gain idea of the base hypnotherapy skill and understanding required to work with ritual abuse and mind control. Review Shapiro's comparison of EMDR versus hypnotically induced abreaction.[502] Read Secret Don't Tell: The Encyclopedia of Hypnotism (1998) by Carla Emery, for a comprehensive overview of the history of unethical hypnosis. If your therapist does not know or agree with this reading material, move on. If your therapist mimics what Wendy-Louise Walker practised – run.

VOICE DIALOGUE

This is part of the Hearing Voices approach that I discovered via a retired therapist who had success treating adolescent youth labelled schizophrenic (i.e., 'traumatised'). She trained in trauma and Voice Dialogue and adapted this to working with the dissociated parts of mind control victims. I was thrilled to finally have an alternative therapy technique I could recommend to ritual abuse and mind control victims labelled psychotic, schizophrenic, bipolar, or personality disordered who were subsequently thrown in the 'too hard' basket. Psychiatry reduces everything to an illness originating in the victim, which is just another form of victim blaming. The Hearing Voices approach emerged from realising that peoples' environmental experiences are meaningful and determine the thoughts and behaviours that psychiatrists label symptomology. It explores the person's internal dialogue and how they make sense of the world, rather than what the DSM describes.

The Voice Dialogue method recognises that the right hemisphere's unconscious processes are more dominant than the left's conscious, logical nature. It focuses on attachment style, which develops and continues to motivate behaviour at an implicit level. The method is influenced by Transactional Analysis and recognises that everyone has different components of self, such as internal child part and an external parent part, that interact to cause conflict. Treatment consists of identifying these parts and their roles, and changing the relationships between parts, to facilitate emotional awareness and collaboration between the fragmented selves. When a client hears voices, that is usually an indication that a part of self has become disowned by the system and is screaming to be heard.

It is easy to see how the Hearing Voices approach is readily adapted to working with a dissociative victim of ritual abuse and mind control who has multiple personalities. The goal is to dialogue with the parts that hold trauma memories, dissociated feelings, emotions and sensations. The method allows the therapist to facilitate the processing of a trauma memory held by a part, without the Core person being exposed to the trauma memory. Voice Dialogue is about changing the relationship between the Core person and their dissociated parts. It also involves negotiating between the parts so that they do not assume dominance over the Core person, so that everyone is working together. It involves recognising that each part played a crucial role in helping the Core person survive extreme trauma. Another objective is to assign each part a new meaningful role, to replace the role imposed on them by perpetrators.

I intuitively engaged in the process of role reassignment by taking up Judo, classical singing, and shooting. I engaged in Voice Dialogue and used it as a therapy gap filler. I found one-hour therapy sessions insufficient; they left me dissociative and distressed, and my trauma-focussed therapist never recognised or addressed my front alters. So, after my weekly therapy session, I typically phoned my retired therapist friend who worked with me for another few hours to finish what my therapist had only just started. She would ask to speak with the alter who is aware of the trauma experience causing the symptoms, and simply ask what that alter knew. In response, I would download copious amounts of information stored in implicit memory. All someone ever had to do was ask me the right questions.

There is a place for alter recognition, but this must be limited and purposeful. Alters are real, mini personalities with their own neural circuitry, who experienced and hold the memories of trauma. At some stage, alters and their trauma need to be acknowledged, validated, and relieved. Therapists mainly need to know front alter names and roles. Each front alter represents a myriad of back alters, so if you win over the front alter, you cover the alters hidden behind them.

My front alters were namely Soldier Alice, Intellectual Alice, Ritual Alice, Red Alice (a combination of the former three) and Glinda. Sascha and Angel were also front alters, but more hidden. Soldier Alice protected my internal system and co-operated with Intellect Alice to manage interaction with the environment. Ritual Alice stored the implicit trauma experiences and pain in her memory circuitry and threw childish tantrums in response to trauma triggers. Glinda took a back seat after I left the cult and Kidman cursed my creative endeavours. Ritual Alice attended university. Sascha endured the physical ardour. Angel guarded my Core.

I did not allow my parts to identify themselves or speak until long after I integrated my Core, and I refused to ever refer to myself as ‘we’ - because overindulgence in alters is unhealthy and inhibits integration. All alter attention and communication should be for gaining system trust, releasing trauma memories, and encouraging cooperation and integration. Which is why I recommend victims strictly address themselves as ‘I’ instead of ‘we.’ Too many therapists seem titillated by the notion of multiple personalities; they waste precious therapy time and money familiarising themselves with, and indulging in, every alter they can possibly find. The worst example of alter overindulgence occurred at Colin Ross’ conferences where organisers provided a preschool playroom, stuffed toys, and colouring-in activities to entertain child alters.

One victim's system may contain thousands of splits, and it would take many lifetimes to get to know every alter. Instead of mapping an entire alter system, and trying to speak with every alter, effective therapy focusses on identifying and processing the trauma incidents which that created the alters in the first place. A single torture session is used to create multiple alters within the victim. Therefore, if a victim processes the memories of a single trauma incident, they will integrate up to hundreds of related alters in one go. Therapy must be Trauma-Focussed, not alter-focussed, to integrate a system.

Effective therapy identifies the trauma that initially created the alters

REACHING THE CORE IS KEY

The greatest integration shortcut of all occurs when the victim remembers the trauma incident that split their Core. As I said, instant integration occurs when a victim's Core personality meets her splits. Victims often tell me they have no Core, that their therapist can't locate their Core, and they ask me, 'What is my Core?' Your Core is the you that existed before perpetrators touched you and messed with your brain. For some, this began in utero and so the victim has no memory of their personality being intact. The Core is your soul, spirit, or consciousness - the part of you that leaves your physical body when you die or astral travel. Consciousness exists apart from the physical body, which is why mainstream scientists are currently working on ways of transferring the soul or consciousness to other physical vessels, such as cloned or synthetic forms. Thereby the wealthy elite responsible for MK-ULTRA plan to cheat death and avoid judgement.

BILATERAL STIMULATION

During the most intense phase of my memory recovery process I swam a kilometre per day, six days a week. I found swimming crucial to integration for several reasons. Freestyle lap swimming is a bilateral action which stimulates the brain hemispheres to work together. I felt swimming digested the cognitive load I experienced during a therapy session. Swimming soothed the extreme autonomic nervous system arousal that occurred during therapy, and seemingly countered the dangerous impact therapy had on my heart. Mid-lap one day, I was struck by an inaudible sentence, 'You heart is regenerating.' The laps usually felt effortless and I physically sensed the integration.

An examination of left-brain Western plus bilateral Eastern conceptualisation helped me understand how and why swimming proved so essential to my integration and trauma recovery. The vagus nerve starts at the brain stem and connects to 'mini-brains' found in the body's major organs including the mesentery which wraps around the gut. The vagus nerve affects the heart, lungs, stomach, immune and endocrine systems. When stimulated, the vagus nerve activates the parasympathetic nervous system and calms the sympathetic system responsible for the 'fight-flight' response. The vagus nerve is stimulated by touch, movement or breath, such as deep diaphragmatic breathing, prayer, exercise, laughter, massage, and cold-water immersion. Swimming covers three of these.

The Chinese have long recognised the importance of the mesentery. They say the human body runs on Chi, which we know as electromagnetic energy, and the mesentery is the battery. This battery must be charged for the body to maintain energy. Caffeine is an artificial way Westerners charge the mesentery battery, while Chinese recommend deep diaphragmatic breathing as an appropriate mesentery stimulant. I found classical singing relaxing and therapeutic because my singing teacher employed the intercostal diaphragmatic breathing technique.

Typing was another bilateral activity that helped me to cognitively digest trauma between therapy sessions. I hand wrote letters to my first two therapists, and typed emails to my last. Being a bilateral activity, typing felt more integrating than handwriting. My emails began as a simple exchange of basic information about appointment times. As my situation became critical, I began using email as a journaling process. Even if my therapist did not immediately read my emails, knowing they were immediately received was key to pain relief. I tried journaling to myself, which proved an ineffective substitute.

HERBAL MEDICINES

Herbal medicines did what no drug ever could - settled my nervous system pain within one hour. You need live herbal tinctures made by an experienced herbalist, as these medicines are far more and potent and effective than dried herbs. The Australian drug authorities and medical doctors are eliminating herbalism in Australia. There are no more courses in pure herbalism, and Australia will not recognise overseas qualifications. I completed a short course in live herbal manufacturing which taught me more in one week than students learn in a four-year naturopathy degree.

Throw out your TV

EEG studies show that television converts the brain from Beta to Alpha plus near Delta wave activity associated with a mild trance-like state. TV reduces our ability to verbally communicate and to think critically. It suppresses our left brain and allows information to pass unedited into our right hemisphere. This is just more brainwashing and a reinforcement of MK-ULTRA programming. Therefore, it is important for the person trying to integrate from mind control to throw out their TV. No computer games either; read David Gillespie’s book Teen Brain (2019) about the detrimental impact of screens on the developing brain to understand why. In fact, read all of Gillespie’s amazing books. He was the first person to damn refined sugar and expose its connections to obesity, heart disease and mental health. It is helpful for victims to understand how fructose switched off the part of the brain that tells us we’re full, and that alcohol, the worst thing for neurological damage, is sugar and so has a similar effect.

DESTROYING THE MATRIX

Writing this book served as a double-edged sword. It continually triggered my memory for my abuse, which made me violently ill, but simultaneously allowed me to access and process and integrate more sections of compartmentalised neural circuitry.

While I foresaw the assassination of asset Isaac Kappy, I did not anticipate his murder occurring at the same time as the death of my pedophile perpetrator Bob Hawke. That was a triggering combination. I entered therapy the following week too depleted to relay the weeks’ events. I positioned myself on the couch and asked my therapist to combine EMDR with hypnosis.

‘Why am I doing that?’ he asked.

‘Because you devised the technique and I think it’s a good one.’

‘But why am I doing this today?’

‘Because my right hemisphere always knows what it’s doing, and it wants to do this.’

‘So, you’re going with your gut instinct?’

‘No. The mesentery has its own mini brain, but it is the right hemisphere that processes implicitly and tells me what to do without adding the reason why. I just wrote a book chapter all about it.’

‘How’s the book going?’

Nope. Was not going to discuss that either, as it was tied into a long week. ‘No words. Just do the therapy.’

He agreed, and soon I was dissociated enough to enter Mengele’s induction routine. I self-induced as usual, spiralled down the water channel. I surfaced in the Dagon ritual pool. Only, this time was different. Usually there were no characters. This time there were guards at the doors which opened automatically to reveal Dagon seated on his gold throne. I bowed on one knee to the entity, placing my arms overhead in the shape of a bishop’s hat. Suddenly, I barged through the left red ritual door and marched through the rows of caged blonde children, bellowing, ‘Someday I am going to save ALL of you!’ I opened the door to Mengele’s lab beneath the US Embassy in Canberra rushed toward the Jabba The Hut lookalike, shoved my fingers around his throat – and choked him.

I exited via the blue door in the corner and began running toward the escape hatch when suddenly I detoured to a program. I took a back door to the blue, soldier programming area where countless programs were stacked to the ceiling, represented by a myriad of ancient and modern military costumes from various countries. I took a long sword and began smashing everything in sight. When that proved too time consuming, I smashed at the walls and toppled the entire room in one go. Then I realised I was Angel, wielding a samurai sword.

Real pain struck my head. Not this time! I asserted, and visualised walking through my brain and slashing open blocked pathways to allow electric current flow through. The pain instantly disappeared. Next I was hit with genuine vertigo and nausea. Again, I pictured slashing open the closed neural circuitry. I saw the micro flesh, the multiple openings, and the flash of electric current as they opened. The vertigo disappeared immediately. Then I was assaulted with verbal thought loops. I tapped into where it was coming from – the left hemisphere – and slashed it too. I was replicating the visualisation technique that Mengele used to create the neural pathways and programs in the first place.

Finally, I climbed up Mengele’s blue soldier room and emerged through a vent onto the manicured lawn of the US Embassy.

‘When you’re ready,’ my therapist droned.

I described the carnage. ‘It’s like the final scene of The Matrix. I can destroy their programming because this is in my brain and I can do as I like. I am taking control.’

Dirty Doctors

People are bastard-coated bastards with bastard filling. – Scrubs (Ep. 407)

Fundamentally, your chosen therapist must not be a network operative. I have communicated with countless child abuse survivors including victims of ritual abuse and mind control. Their testimonies plus my own experience formed my conclusion that most therapists are either perpetrators or being handled by perpetrators. Dodging dirty doctors is a trial and error process.

It is important for vulnerable victims to not trust therapists just because they are high profile, lecture at seminars on trauma and dissociation, and write books on DID and MK-ULTRA. These are all CIA operatives. Think about it: the clean ones, like Corydon Hammond who presented the famous Greenbaum Speech, invariably get death threats and are quickly and permanently forced out of the industry.

I will now detail my personal experience of two Canadians therapists considered experts in ritual abuse, mind control and DID, to drive home my point: Trust no-one.

COLIN ROSS

George Bergen compiled a massive dossier of evidence against Colin Ross including copies of signed affidavits.[503] While I do not agree victims should follow Bergen's concluding recommendation to consult CIA doctor Richard Ofshe, his evidence is relevant to my experience of Colin Ross. Here is a summary of the dossier content:

From 1985 to 1991, Canadian psychiatrist Colin A. Ross worked at the St. Boniface General Hospital, University of Manitoba. He employed suggestive questioning, hypnosis, and age regression, and commonly prescribed overdoses of Halcion (triazolam) and sodium amytal injections. Ross also performed experimental drug testing on patients for large Drug Corporations.

Roma Elizabeth Hart was a patient of Colin Ross from 1986 to 1991. In a 1998 signed affidavit, Hart testified that all of Ross' MPD patients at St Boniface Hospital became suicidal, and that Ross encouraged his drug-induced patients to commit suicide. Hart named the 1991 death of Wanda Davenport as one of five wrongful deaths Ross caused at the hospital.

Colin Ross was dismissed from his position at St. Boniface General Hospital in 1991 for causing the wrongful deaths of five patients. This dismissal was covered up, permitting Ross to register in Texas. In July 1998, Texan authorities charged Colin A. Ross with fraud, gross negligence, fraudulent concealment, and conspiracy to commit fraud. Charges were also filed against Ross in the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench in 1994 and 1997. Numerous complaints against Colin Ross were submitted to the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Manitoba, Texas State Board of Medical Examiners, Royal College of Physicians of Canada, and Canadian Psychiatric Association.

I was aware of Colin Ross' background when I agreed to present at a 2016 Trauma and Dissociation conference at the Radisson hotel in Seattle, and I knew that Ross was speaking at the conference. I did not know that Colin Ross sponsored the event. His ownership of the conference explained why it amounted to a marketing opportunity for therapists. Speakers who paid to attend and be heard were rewarded with stalls inside the hotel from which they peddled cards, stickers, $45 books and fridge magnets to vulnerable DID victims. It also explained why the Seattle conference also served as an advertisement for Colin Ross' Institute where clients entered non-suicidal and left in a box.

It is normal for conference organisers to send speakers (especially international ones) a contract outlining what is required of the speaker and what is being provided to the speaker. This was promised but never delivered to me. Originally, I was told that my presentation was going to be professionally filmed. This never occurred either. I was also promised a plenary speaking session first thing Friday morning when the conference began. Plenary means speaking in the main, large room with no other competing sessions. Colin Ross' daughter Dana was given my spot instead. Victims and I had not heard of her.

The conference organisers hid me away in a tiny room at the end of a hall. The conference schedule was formatted such that it prevented people from finding me. Some attendees could not find me at all because my biography and presentation synopsis were missing from their folders. All folders were individually named, so in theory organisers could control who did and did not know I was speaking. Even when my information was in the folder, it was well buried.

Technical set-up of the conference rooms occurred on the Thursday. I was scheduled to speak early the following morning. Come Thursday evening, my room was not set up; it had no podium, no projector, no microphone, no computer, no cables, and no technical support. I could not deliver my presentation without basic equipment. I approached the conference organiser and asked why my room was not set up. She alleged she had specifically instructed the technician to do so, and to go phone him. Being Australian and having just arrived in the USA, I had no phone. I eventually found the technician who told me the conference organiser never instructed him to set up my room.

Meanwhile, the other speakers, aware of my plight, openly boasted of how glad they were that their rooms were set up for the next morning. Most of them accompanied Colin Ross to a posh seafood dinner at Seattle's famous fisherman's wharf. I was not invited. Besides, I was too busy trying to remedy the deficiencies of the conference organiser. I approached the senior Radisson hotel staff member assigned to the conference and requested a spare podium. The man contemptuously told me Radisson did not have another podium, pointed to a 50cm high coffee table, and spat, 'Use that!'

Thirty minutes remained before the Radisson locked their conference rooms for the evening. It was time to show the Yanks what Australians are famous for. I stole the essential equipment from another conference room belonging to the woman feeding her face with lobster after boasting the loudest about how pleased she was that her room was prepared. I demanded the conference organiser help me carry the equipment to my speaking room. Radisson staff locked the speaking rooms for the night. I retired to my room for a delivered burger and crap American TV.

The following morning, I quietly smiled to myself as the hotel foyer echoed a woman's hysterical cries: 'WHERE'S MY PODIUM?!' Oddly enough, Radisson staff immediately found that speaker a spare podium.

I delivered my talk to a keen audience which doubled in size once word got out about who and where I was. Following my two-hour presentation, a victim encountered her own therapist in the hall who exclaimed, 'I am so angry at Fiona's talk! I am so angry that no one has ever told me that information before!' Several victims voiced how angry they were for having made no progress following 20 years of therapy.

My second conference session was an opportunity for the audience to ask me questions. I commenced this with a scathing attack on the conference. 'How are all those books and stickers helping you?' I challenged them. 'How far along the healing path are you? Some of you have been in therapy twenty years and got nowhere! Why?'

After this, one therapist pulled me to the conference organiser in the foyer and practically shouted at her, 'Why wasn't Fiona in the main room?! She should have been a main speaker! She's amazing! What she said was amazing!'

Multiple attendees asked me to write the content of my presentation down, asked for my book, asked me to write a book, asked me when my book was being released. I had no book, I told them, nor any intention of writing one.

Another therapist approached me and said that her client, who was not suicidal, 'committed suicide' at Colin Ross' Institute. It should be impossible to commit suicide in such a facility. That is the point of a hospital for potentially suicidal DID clients.

'Do you trust Colin Ross?' I asked.

'I don't know…' she responded tearfully.

Only two fellow speakers introduced themselves to me over the entire four days. Most speakers glared or stared oddly at me and the victims who flocked to speak with me. My attendance had been used to market the conference and draw victims from all over, including Las Vegas, who came specifically to see me.

The true reason for inviting me to the USA came next: Alaska.

ALISON MILLER

A Tacoma Police social worker lured me to Alaska under the guise of assisting with a two-week intensive intervention with an alleged DID client. My assistant, Nicky, had been harping on about visiting Alaska, so the decision to go seemed an obvious way of pleasing her. So, I swapped my plans to visit my family in Canada, for Autumn in Alaska. Nicky and I travelled to Anchorage at our own expense.

Canadian psychologist Alison Miller was the DID expert supervisor in this case. Nicky and I were placed on a roster of volunteers who 'baby-sat' the client at night. We were collected from the airport in Anchorage by social worker Kimber Olson who drove us to a remote cottage in Eagle River Valley. Nicky and I were not briefed or given a chance to speak alone with Kimber, prior to being left alone with the client named Sarah. In fact, we never got to speak with Kimber about the client.

At the cottage, Kimber told Nicky and I (again, in front of the client) that Sarah was prone to self-harming by cutting. Kimber placed four rolls of cloth bandages on the table and told us what to do in the likely event Sarah cut herself. We were to bandage Sarah's wounds but not contact the hospital or the police because both departments contained members of the offending cult who ritually abused the client. The large collection of kitchen knives, and the hunting knife sitting in one of the cottage bedrooms also struck me as counterproductive. Kimber did not remove these in preparation for Sarah's stay, nor did she suggest they be removed. Nicky later removed and hid them of her own volition.

Nicky and I had no transport. The cottage had no cell phone reception. It did have a landline and internet access. Kimber said she would phone us with the internet password. She instructed me to provide the internet password to Sarah who worked in IT at a local University. Her being allowed computer access seemed to contradict the expressed goal of isolating the client from her alleged cult perpetrators. Kimber also permitted the client to go out with a friend (her former therapist) one evening, which also seemed counterproductive to severing external contact. Why, then, are we in a cabin in the middle of nowhere? I wondered. Yep, that is the point where I should have returned to Anchorage for some halibut and home-brewed root beer. But then I would not have the following awesome story, or dirt on Alison Miller.

The Eagle River cottage was situated in wild bear and moose territory where, I was later told, residents had been attacked while simply taking out their trash. Nicky and I were not warned of the potential risk associated with man-eating wildlife. I specifically asked whether it was safe for us to hike, whether there were bears, and whether I needed bear mace. I was told we were safe from bears and did not need mace. It was akin to my assuring visiting Alaskans it's safe to swim in the Aussie ocean at night.

So, the following day, Nicky and I went hiking on a nearby trail. The next day, I hiked for four hours to the top of a nearby mountain. . . alone. I noticed fresh berry-flavoured bear scat all over. Wide-eyed locals later told me I certainly was at risk of being attacked by a bear - or even a moose, and that the safest thing to do was make a lot of noise as you hike, to scare off the bears. I inadvertently did this.

Knowing I was trapped in a setup, I began dialoguing with God out aloud during my solo hike. I was on a remote mountain in the middle of Alaska with no-one to call me nuts. So, I went for it, voiced my anger aloud. 'Meet me at the top of that mountain!' I shouted at the sky. 'Come down and have it out with me, face to face!'

Every time I reached what I thought was the peak, my shoulders slumped at realising it was another optical illusion behind which the genuine peak teasingly sat. I repeatedly fell for the same deception. I pressed on, pointing at what must be the actual peak, and yelling at God like a lunatic, 'Meet me at the top of that mountain!'

Eventually, I reached the top. I was metres from the tip, and breathless, when something big, black and silent blocked out the blue sky. It buzzed directly over my head. Once it passed me, I heard the familiar hum of chopper blades.

My gut dropped. Oh no! A black helicopter – the type you only read about on conspiracy websites. The mechanical beast stopped nearby, turned sideways to me, and just hovered there, looking at me. They got me! I'm dead! I surveyed the scene for fresh ideas, knowing I was trapped. There was nowhere to hide. A dozen excuses for my death flashed through my mind - Stupid Aussie tourist fell off remote mountain during loan hike…

Suddenly, the took off toward Anchorage. I lifted my tablet and began filming its departure. Once it was out of sight, I looked around for somewhere to shelter. There was nothing except a small cleft in one side of the mountain top. I pressed myself against the cleft while I gathered myself.

The sound of chopper blades returned. I stretched my head around the corner to see a green army helicopter with a long thin gun on its nose. The craft travelled up the valley a little further, before turning around and returning to base. That's more normal, I sighed with relief, but filmed it anyhow. Then I started my decent. It was getting late and the Alaskan freeze would soon set in.

That evening, I watched in wonderment as my dissociated right brain had a little chat with the CIA asset we were babysitting. I smiled sweetly and warned Sarah: 'I'm confident my training more than equips me for whatever you think you have planned.'

Nicky and had already endured two sleepless night when the asset descended the stairs at 1am. She growled 'cunt' at me, turned off all the lights, and chanted: 'The shedding of blood for the atonement of sins.' Sarah entered the kitchen, pulled a large 40cm that she pre-planted in a drawer, and pointed this at Nicky who stood nearby. I approached, and Sarah began waved the knife back and forth between Nicky and me. Then I stepped between Nicky and the psycho. ‘Drop the knife!’ I demanded while mentally preparing to grab the nearby chair and smash it over her head.

Sarah froze. The knife fell from her raised hand. I switched on the light.

I spent the night chatting with Sarah in the loungeroom. I also emailed Kimber Olson and relayed what had just occurred.

The following morning, I phoned Kimber Olson. During our conversation, Kimber told me she had expected something like the knife incident to occur. She said Alison Miller had advised her not to spend the night with the client, and in her next breath she asked me to babysit Sarah alone in the cabin for one more night. Kimber acted surprised when I declined. I asked Kimber for Alison Miller’s phone number.

I phoned Alison who played down the knife incident, concluding the client would likely have used the knife on herself instead of us. I disagreed, as did the Seattle homicide detective I described the experience to, who pointed out the obvious clue - the knife was aimed at Nicky and I, not Sarah. Alison Miller also expected Nicky and I to babysit Sarah another night.

I emailed Kimber Olsen and told her Nicky and I were at risk and would leave with her as soon as possible. Kimber emailed me and said she would be collecting the client, and that Nicky and I may as well stay at the cottage another night. The set-up had become ridiculously obvious. Kimber repeatedly asked me whether I was going to inform the aggressive knife-wielding asset that we were leaving. I refused.

Despite the critical incident, Kimber delayed collecting Nicky and I until the following evening. This was disturbing because during the day, the client became increasingly agitated and aggressive toward us. Sarah berated me for speaking with Alison Miller about her. I responded, ‘Pulling a knife on us was a game changer.’

When Kimber Olson arrived, I asked to speak with her alone. She pulled a mocking face as though my request was strange, amusing even. During this conversation, Kimber said she had a bad gut feeling about staying overnight with the client. Kimber then informed us she would drop Nicky and I off at a hotel before taking the client back to her office for therapy. I did not want the client (or Kimber) knowing where we were staying, so I asked if we could instead use the internet at Kimber’s office block to locate a hotel. But Kimber dumped me and Nicky in the carpark outside her office block and made it clear we were not welcome inside to use her internet. It was dusk, below freezing, and we had no means of finding a hotel in Anchorage’s commercial district before sunset. We began walking.

The following day, I delivered my presentation to a group of therapists who were undergoing training in trauma and dissociation under Kimber Olson. The talk was well received.

‘How long have you been speaking at conferences?’ They asked me during question time.

‘This is my first time.’

‘Really? You wouldn’t know it. Tell people three years!’ they insisted.

I laughed.

Two experienced psychiatric workers spent the next few days showing us some well appreciated Alaskan hospitality. They fed us home-caught halibut and chartered a private boat to tour the glaciers. I wondered to the health professionals whether things were ‘done a little differently in Alaska.’

‘No,’ the horrified professionals informed me. Their colleague had severely breached Alaska’s ethical standards and protocols. The two women continually checked whether Kimber Olsen had contacted us yet. Nicky started showing signs of a trauma response, and the usual protocol was to debrief victims of a critical incident. Yet Kimber never even asked us asked us what happened, and never contacted us again. So, upon returning to Seattle, I arranged for the Tacoma Police Social Worker to take us to debrief with Alison Miller in nearby Canada. Miller agreed to this arrangement but cancelled at the last minute for unconvincing reasons. Alison Miller never communicated with us again.

When I returned home to Australia, I relayed my Alaskan adventure to former Special Forces soldier, Tim Roy. I did not say what I thought the black helicopter was. I simply relayed the details and then asked for Tim's opinion.

'Fiona,' Tim replied, 'that black helicopter was exactly what you thought it was.'

I knew the helicopter intended to pick me up on that mountain top. I knew, the moment its black belly passed over me. I knew it from its peculiar movements, the way it seemed to baulk and reconsider. What stopped it from picking me up? I puzzled - until it dawned on me: When the helicopter's occupants looked down at me, they did not see a lone figure atop that mountain. They saw someone with me. God had met me at the top of the mountain after all.

'Do you know Michael Salter,' the Alaskan therapists questioned me following my presentation.

'Never heard of him before the Seattle conference,' I responded.

The Tacoma Police social worker had shown me some texts between her and Salter that I found irritating. Fellow Australian Michael Salter presented on DID in Seattle and Alaska in 2015 and said the opposite to what I said: that the Australian government has never been involved in organised child abuse, ritual abuse or mind control, and that his studies concluded this type of abuse was non-existent.

'I will deal with Michael Salter when I return to Australia.'

Michael Salter describes himself as an 'expert' in 'complex trauma,' 'organised child abuse,' and 'complex forms of victimisation including organised abuse and technologically-facilitated abuse.' Salter wrote articles with titles like, 'Why does it take victims of child sex abuse so long to speak up?' and co-authored an article on DID with Warrick Middleton (who said ritual abuse is a 'metaphor for incest'). Michael Salter sits on the ISSTD (International Society for the Study of Trauma and Dissociation) Board of Directors, and he is an Associate Editor of Child Abuse Review (journal of the British Association for the Study and Prevention of Child Abuse and Neglect). He previously sat on the Blue Knot Foundation Board of Directors (the organisation Tim Roy says sabotaged his case against VIP perpetrators by refusing to hand police copies of his evidence.)

I phoned Michael Salter on 11 April 2018, and introduced myself, 'Hi Michael, this is Fiona Barnett. I'm writing a book and I called you to clarify something. I spoke on trauma and dissociation in America, and the therapists I spoke with in Seattle and Alaska said they heard you speak previously, and that you told them there was no government involvement in ritual abuse and mind control in Australia. Is that right?'

Salter: 'I think they're referring to 2015 when I spoke on organised and ritual abuse. I talked about my research with forty or so survivors who, when describing electro-shock and other methods, did not do so in connection to the Australian military. It's a different situation to the US where there have been credible, consistent reports. Colin Ross has obtained evidence under FOI. We always have a challenge when allegations are not documented, when we go public with some things we think we know but can't prove. The trauma industry has suffered from people going public and making public claims about people and organisations which they couldn't prove. There is a need for evidence more than survivor testimony.'

Me: 'You say there's no evidence of CIA mind control in Australia. What about MK-ULTRA Subproject 84 that was conducted at Sydney University in 1960 under the supervision of Martin Orne? Orne and Evans subsequently published an article about that research in a major journal. MK-ULTRA research was conducted at every major Australian university.'

Salter: 'A few subproject names thrown about. That's just hearsay. That proves nothing.'

Me: 'In their published articles, these people acknowledge that their research was financed by the Human Ecology Fund - which was a CIA cut-out for funding MK-ULTRA research, as recorded in the US Library of Congress. That's called a paper trail! I'm in contact with James Rothstein who was appointed to the first taskforce in the US to investigate organised pedophilia. He discovered a VIP pedophile ring that went all the way to the Whitehouse. He said Watergate solely concerned trying to obtain VIP pedophile records being held at Democratic headquarters. He said they discovered an identical pedophile ring in Australia that involved Australian prime ministers, and he is placing me in touch with Australians who worked on this same ring. He said that every time he got somewhere, arrested or charged a VIP, it was shut down under national security. He said every cop who took this above street level was shut down. The same thing happens in Australia. That's exactly what happened to Reina Michaelson when she tried to expose this in Victoria.'

Salter raised his voice, 'I had a lot to do with that case and that is not what happened.'

Me: 'I know all about that case too. Reina told me that she was placed under something she called a D-notice, and when I saw her in Sydney, she said she was under surveillance by ASIO.'

Salter: 'This is an area that puts people under a lot of pressure, causing them to become paranoid. Reina talked about electronic weapons and people following her...'

Me: 'You mentioned Colin Ross. I spoke at his conference, only I didn't know it was his conference because that was hidden. When I was there, a therapist approached me and told me her client suspiciously died in Colin Ross' clinic. Then a retired detective told me he researched Colin Ross and found out he had a dubious background including being fired from a hospital for ethical breaches and having a disproportionate number of patients die in his care. Then victims complained to me that Ross mocked them during his conference presentation.'

Salter: 'Colin Ross is a weird dude! He's just weird! A lot of paranoia often arises in this field. Everybody currently working in this field is accused of being a perpetrator. That's the first accusation made. I've even been accused. Avoid exaggeration. We must be careful what we take public, what we can't prove.'

Me: 'What constitutes evidence?'

Salter: 'What are we proving? We can use victim testimony to prove that people are using electrodes.'

Me: 'So, you say you interviewed forty victims and concluded solely from their witness testimony that ritual abuse and mind control exist. Yet you dismiss the testimonies of victims who witnessed government organised child trafficking. What's the difference? How can you believe one witness testimony but not another?'

Salter: 'It's a big jump from making general claims to saying agencies are involved. Stepping forward with the VIP story gets us nowhere without the evidence. One reason perpetrators get away with it is because the public don't know the basics. The basic process of education is needed because people are stuck in a conspiracy mindset. Ninety-nine percent of professionals are good people. Most of my students want to become police officers. Police need to be trained in how to interview DID victims.'

Me: 'That's not the problem.'

Salter: 'Yes, it is! Police need to recognise what to do when a victim starts switching mid-interview.'

Me: 'I attended police interviews after I had integrated. The cop who took my statements was clean. But I was cold called by a lawyer who told me the cop above the one who took my statements, the one in charge of my investigation, was involved in the child trafficking network. Sure enough, she stopped my case. A lack of training may be a contributing factor, and it may be a tactic employed to prevent victims being helped, but the main problem is getting police to take our statements in the first place. Victims like me never get anywhere in the first place.'

Salter: 'I interviewed fifty survivors of severe abuse including ritual abuse, and many of them made statements and some saw their perpetrators convicted.'

Me: Oh, fifty now? 'You must be dealing with a different population. During the past few years, I've met hundreds of victims of government child trafficking, and not one of them had any success with the police or courts. What typically happens with us is, we make a complaint, the cops raid our home at five am and drag us off to prison for something that was dealt with twenty years ago.'

Salter: 'Saying there is a criminal hierarchy, or that the CIA was here, and posting it all over websites and YouTube, is pointless. Proving anything from thirty years ago is almost impossible.'

Me: 'That reminds me of the Royal Commission who told me to my face that they had no intention of helping current victims, that they exist to help future victims. My response to that is - current victims are the future.'

Salter: 'There is no organised child trafficking network. It's like drugs, lots of people and small groups all over the place deal in drugs; it's the same with pedophiles. There is no organised criminal hierarchy trafficking children.'

Me: 'There is a hierarchy - because I witnessed it. So, you're saying victims shouldn't bother reporting historical crimes?'

Salter: 'I'm not advising anyone to do anything.'

Me: 'I put in a historical complaint to the health board against Antony Kidman. He was dead within a month of my notification. His security team told the press that he was immediately placed on suicide watch following my complaint. See, I was not the first to complain about him.'

Salter: 'That's great!'

Me: 'The Daruk boys' home is currently under investigation because of my efforts. I pursued that matter, publicised it and harassed the police until they had to investigate.'

Salter: 'That's great!'

Me: 'My winning tactic was to come from a position of experience where I knew that I was dealing with a criminal hierarchy. And I achieved that outcome through what I published on my websites and YouTube. You say victims of organised pedophilia should not make police statements and should not publish our witness testimonies online. So, what you are effectively saying is - victims like me should not have a voice. I went and made police witness statements knowing they would go nowhere, because it was healing. Ask any genuine victim and they will tell you the most important thing to them is justice. All victims have a right to justice.'

Salter: 'We have a different standard regarding the public domain and publishing what you are unable to prove. Like, saying that you have different brain structure, reduces your credibility.'

Me: 'Sorry?' I asked incredulously, 'Are you talking about the scientific research published in peer edited journals in which functional MRi scans show that both brain hemispheres light up when high IQ people perform cognitive tasks, as opposed to when someone with an average IQ performs the same tasks, only the left hemisphere is activated?'

Salter snidely repeated, 'Saying that you have different brain structure reduces your credibility.'

Me: 'Are you familiar with the work of Linda Silverman, with the research I studied in gifted education and psychology?'

Salter: 'When you say something that contradicts history, you lose credibility. When you say Whitlam and Kerr, who were arch enemies, were in a homosexual relationship, you lose credibility.'

Me: 'Firstly, a mainstream journalist wrote an article saying exactly that.'

Salter: 'A dodgy journalist.'

Me: 'Secondly, I witnessed them having sex at a pedophile orgy at Parliament House, along with many other men from opposing political parties. Their public façades have nothing to with how these politicians act behind closed doors. And, who appointed John Kerr to the position of Governor General in the first place? Gough Whitlam did, against the better judgement of his party. So, Whitlam and Kerr certainly were not enemies at that time, were they? I spoke with a journalist who wrote favourable articles about me. He said he once spoke to a couple of spooks who told him that all senior politicians are pedophiles because that is how they are controlled, and he asked me if that was my experience. Do you know David Donovan who edits the Independent Australia journal that I wrote articles for?'

Salter: 'I know of him.'

Me: 'There's a reason he believed my story. Do you know the film Muriel's Wedding?'

Salter: 'Yes.'

Me: 'That film is mostly based on a true story that occurred in my local area. The character in the movie called Diedre Chambers is based on a real-life woman who ran a local post office with her husband; they had twin boys. David Donovan met one of the twins when he came to pest-control his house. When he realised David was a journalist, he said he had a story for him. When this twin was young, local mayor Tom Hogan (film-maker P.J. Hogan's father) took him to pedophile parties attended by politicians at Terranora Lakes Country Club, and on an helicopter with Prime Minister Bob Hawke and Opposition Leader Andrew Peacock who sat and got drunk together like they were old mates… Michael, I just think that when you tell people at conferences that you interviewed forty or fifty victims, and because they didn't say anything about government involvement you conclude there's no evidence of government involvement - I think you're better off saying nothing at all, otherwise you are only discrediting victims like me.'

Pause.

Salter: ‘Sorry to cut this short, but I have to get some work done. And sorry things got a little heated at the end.’

Me: ‘That’s okay. This has been a very productive conversation. You have just shown me the weaknesses in my story that I must address. You have shown me the exact direction in which I need to take my book. Thank you for that, Michael.’

Salter: ‘Oh, err…okay. Goodbye.’

‘Bye.’

I phoned the USA to bitch about Mr Salter with David Shurter who concluded, ‘You’ve been triggered because he just spoke to you the way our perpetrators did.’

Then I bitched to James Shanahan who told me Salter was a gay lawyer, and that he was one of the ‘40 to 50’ victims Salter interviewed for his PhD. James concluded, ‘He’s used people like me to advance himself. The fact he’s arguing with you and criticising you tells you what side he’s on.’

I spent my last embers of anger phoning Dr Reina Michaelson who asked me whether Salter had mentioned that he worked for a NSW Labor Party politician prior to entering the child abuse industry.

No, Michael Salter had not told me he previously worked for the pedophile political party that I was sex trafficked to and by as a child, just before he sprung out of nowhere to steer the narrative and advise therapists concerning ‘complex trauma and organised sexual abuse’ with zero relevant mental health qualifications or clinical experience.

ABUSE SURVIVOR FIONA BARNETT: THE 'CANDY GIRL'

Fiona Barnett, Independent Australia, 13 October 2015.

In the first of a two-part update, pedophile ring survivor Fiona Barnett shares her experiences since testifying before the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Abuse, including involvement in a documentary, the discovery of key abusers and her ongoing fight to have authorities investigate her allegations.

I left my 2013 Royal Commission hearing with dashed hopes and a reignited need for trauma counselling. So, I applied for counselling through NSW Victim Services, who allocated a psychologist at Living Well Psychology and Counselling.

Following my initial consultation and the disclosure of my Royal Commission statement, the psychologist wrote in a report to Victim Services that police investigated me for murdering the relative who abused me as a child — my step-grandfather and Nazi war criminal Peter Holowczak. (This pedophile actually committed suicide in Sydney whilst I was residing in Brisbane.) The psychologist's bizarre allegation contradicted everything I said during our initial meeting, plus the content of the Royal Commission statement I had shared. My subsequent complaint resulted in the psychologist appearing before a professional conduct panel.

NSW Victim Services subsequently approved a replacement psychologist. Soon after commencing therapy with me, my new therapist was allegedly stalked by thugs who followed her home one night from her clinic to her remote property and circled her car. Saunders consequently provided a formal witness statement about the incident to Detective Terry Frost of the Tweed Heads police. The same men simultaneously stalked my two friends who also reported their experiences to police. The thugs then tailgated me to my daughter's primary school, but I cut their car off and photographed its number plate.

I was again stalked and tailgated on the day of perpetrator Antony Kidman's funeral (see pictures above right). Journalist Jonica Bray, accompanied by a photographer and makeup artists, visited my home to interview me for a potential Woman's Day magazine story. This team and my family witnessed, photographed and spoke with the two men who allegedly admitted they had been hired to 'keep an eye on' me.

Since my 2013 hearing, I have fought to make formal witness statements to police.

In May 2014, my husband accompanied me to Tweed Heads police station where I spent two days detailing multiple crimes of child sex trafficking, abduction, rape and murder. Detective Terry Frost omitted many crimes involving perpetrators known to have since died. He concluded that while he found my allegations 'left field,' there were numerous unsolved historical murders in the locations I identified. He said he would immediately send my statements to Sutherland Shire police.

Prior to making these statements, I had spent a year reliving my childhood abuse with my psychologist.

The incidents of crime were so numerous and the therapy process so gruelling, my physical health was severely impacted. To illustrate, the therapy triggered vertigo and heart problems. On one occasion, these symptoms struck me in the surf and I nearly drowned. Consequently, my therapist was reluctant to work with my memories. This slowed the process down, so that by the time the precious opportunity to make witness statements with Detective Terry Frost arose, I had not finished processing everything. So, I avoided addressing many crimes during my initial statement making, aware of my legal right to include them later under my allocated event number: 54671514.

My subsequent attempts to report the remaining crimes were thwarted. My emails and phone calls to police were stonewalled for a year. Further, in contravention of my legal rights as a victim of crime, NSW police did not inform me of the progress of the statements I had made.

On 6 March 2015, I wrote to the NSW Police Commissioner and requested a chance to complete my witness statements. The Sex Crimes Squad replied on the Commissioner's behalf, informing me that my initial statements were now with Sutherland Shire detectives.

Also, in March 2015, I contacted the Federal Police regarding the crimes I experienced in Canberra — including being prostituted under the name 'Candy Girl' to Parliament House and to an international political leader in the back of a military airplane at Fairbairn Airport. My communication was ignored until I appealed to the Federal Police Commissioner. An Operation Attest officer named Louise Hawke contacted me and requested I email her details of my abuse. I did this and attached numerous crime scene illustrations. The officer subsequently phoned me and said that, while she believed my account, the historical nature of my complaints made them too difficult to prosecute. Officer Hawke assured me my information had been placed on file for future reference and referred me to ACT Victim Services, who said I qualified for counselling services but not compensation, because the ACT crimes committed against me had occurred prior to their 1985 cut-off date.

Last July, Australia's 60 Minutes aired a story about a Westminster pedophile ring titled, Spies, Lords and Predators. I was abused by an Australian equivalent of that UK ring, yet there are notable differences. I was trafficked to international VIPs both within Australia and overseas. This ring involved elements of the Australian military. My perpetrators operated in close collaboration with the USA government and they employed sophisticated methods for keeping their operation hidden.

Following the airing of their UK story, 60 Minutes were inundated with phone calls from Australian pedophile ring victims. A leading child abuse advocacy centre nominated me to 60 Minutes who are now working on an Australian version of their UK ring story. 60 Minutes told me they had narrowed their list of Australian victims to 30 possible interviewees. So, somewhere out there sit 29 alleged fellow victims of the same Australian VIP pedophile ring that abused me. I urge those potential interviewees to contact me via IA. It would be nice to have my memories validated by another human, instead of being constantly bashed by ignorance and denial.

As requested, I sent 60 Minutes reporter Ross Coulthart the information I had so far supplied state and federal police. Whilst interviewing my friends and associates, Coulthart questioned the validity of my testimony. He described my memory of being assaulted by a USA politician in the back of a USA military plane at an Australian military airport as far-fetched. Just what do people think international child trafficking looks like? If it is documented that the USA military and CIA have been involved in drugs and arms trafficking, would child trafficking be a physical or moral impossibility for these same people?

Ross Coulthart also questioned my memory that a Governor-General raped me during a pedophile orgy at Parliament House, based on something that all journalists apparently knew — that this married man was a closet homosexual. Such a conclusion ignores the nature of perpetrators' perverted fetishes and the various reasons why VIPs assault children. Within the context of the crime ring I witnessed, homosexuality, heterosexuality, paedophilia, bestiality and necrophilia were not mutually exclusive. Perpetrators did not always engage in these activities out of personal desire or preference, but rather as a means of exerting power and humiliating their victims.

This year, an independent documentary team began researching my child abuse experiences. These producers quickly found ample evidence to support my allegations. They discovered the identity of the man my siblings and I were instructed to call 'Dr Mark.' Leonas Petrauskas was the adopted son of a Lithuanian opera star, and he played basketball for Lithuania. (My Nazi war criminal grandmother was Lithuanian and friends with Petrauskas.) Petrauskas owned and worked at the Engadine Medical Centre on the corner of Boronia Ave and Old Princess Highway. The documentary team obtained copies of Petrauskas' family photo albums, passports and Nazi papers. These documents show he was the Nazi doctor who matched the description of him I have been supplying to institutions for 25 years.

Dr Petrasukas' crimes were so numerous, evidence of them erupted wherever we looked — and even where we didn't.

During the documentary excursion, I approached a couple in the Engadine McDonalds' car park and asked them for directions. Within minutes, the woman told me she was another victim of Dr Petrauskas, who referred her for deep sleep treatment with Harry Bailey at the notorious Chelmsford private hospital, which has reported links to Dr Ewan Cameron's unethical electroshock experiments in Canada.

Dr Petrauskas attended Sydney University at the same time as another key perpetrator, Dr Antony Kidman. The documentary team located Antony Kidman's former North Sydney home at 16 William Edward St, Longueville. This matched the description I provided the NSW Psychology Board in my complaint against him. Via realestate.com, I recognised the lounge room and pool in which I was sexually assaulted by Kidman and his famous stage actor friend who is still alive. The assault occurred during a post-production party held at Kidman's house.

My researchers located and interviewed another perpetrator — a woman who assisted Dr Petrauskas while he performed an abortion on me. I witnessed this same woman lure, drug and murder a young male surfer at a remote Kurnell beach.

My documentary producer contacted the NSW Police media liaison officer and asked why police refused to take my remaining witness statements. The Detective who took my initial statements immediately contacted me and said he would not take my remaining statements until he had heard what Sutherland Police were doing regarding my initial statements. I argued that I had far more information to add to the content of my original statements.

The detective finally directed me to travel to Sydney to complete my witness statements there. Consequently, I approached a Sydney officer I trust and offered to attend Police Headquarters at my own expense. I am currently liaising with a Sutherland detective and have made tentative arrangements to meet her at Police Headquarters next month to finish my witness statements. I hope this occurs and that I can achieve some kind of closure to my child abuse history.

Upon finding the identity of Leonas Petrauskas, as well as another offending medical doctor who is still alive, I contacted the NSW Coroner and suggested he investigate every birth and death certificate these doctors ever signed. I said I had witnessed Dr Petrauskas fabricate medical documentation to cover for crimes including murders. The NSW Coroner said he could not conduct such an investigation without the direction of the NSW Police. So, I forwarded the NSW Coroner's response to the NSW Police Commissioner, asking him to direct the coroner to investigate my allegations. The Commissioner thanked me in writing for supplying the information and assured me it had been forwarded to the appropriate designation.

'What, the paper shredder?!' quipped my current Victim Services counsellor.

The corroborative evidence that my documentary makers continue to find in support of my allegations has been offered to the authorities. If the authorities are not interested in this evidence, perhaps the public is. My documentary, Candy Girl, is at the editing stage.

FIONA BARNETT: THE CANDY GIRL, THE ROYAL COMMISSION & THE NSW POLICE

Fiona Barnett, Independent Australia, 23 October 2015.

In the second part of her update, Fiona Barnett details the shocking mistreatment she has endured from certain NSW Police – and others – since testifying to the Child Abuse Royal Commission about her experiences as a victim of an international child sex trafficking ring.

The Child Abuse Royal Commission has invested government dollars in an initiative called 'Message to Australia':

> …an opportunity for the people who have bravely told their stories to the Royal Commission to send a short message to the Australian community about their experience and their hopes for creating a safer environment for children in the future.

Select victim messages will be published and stored in the public library — under 'BS.' If my message were selected for inclusion, it would read:

> Don't come forward as I have done! Don't place your trust in investigative bodies, police and therapists. It's not worth the risk to you and your family. If you insist on attending professional counselling, do so under a pseudonym and pay cash.

Here's why:

At my 2013 hearing, I made some reasonable requests: witness protection, a chance to provide my testimony to police and for police to investigate my allegations. Two years on, I am still waiting for these requests to be fulfilled. I have not heard from my Royal Commission case manager since March 2014 when I provided her with additional information. Instead, I have experienced an increase in police indifference and harassment.

Certain NSW Police dismissed my witness testimony against a VIP pedophile ring as unworthy of collection and investigation. However, they simultaneously used the witness statements I provided them as grounds for suspending my pistol licence. On 24 December 2014, its Firearms Registry gave me two days to surrender my licence or face possible criminal charges. Their deadline counted Christmas and Boxing Day as working days. It appears that Tweed Heads Police sent my witness statements to the state Firearms Registry (located in nearby Murwillumbah) instead of to Sutherland Shire detectives. When I confronted the detective with whom I made my statements about this action, he exclaimed: 'I didn't do that!' I told Detective Terry Frost I knew he was innocent.

During a recent conversation with the Sutherland detective inspector in charge of my case, I was informed that she only recently requested my statements from Tweed Heads Police and that she has not yet read them. I heard from the Firearms Registry months before NSW Police told me whether my witness statements were in the hands of Sydney detectives, or if my allegations were being investigated. Bettina Walker, manager of the NSW Police Firearms Registry, informed me that she had served 20 years as a police officer and: 'I know from experience the content of your statements is true.'

She said that I must undergo a psychiatric evaluation, based on my statement content, to determine whether I was a risk to myself or the public because of the crimes perpetrated against me in my childhood. This response from the NSW Police reminded me of AHPRA's similar treatment of my child abuse history. Members of the Murwillumbah Pistol Club said they had not previously seen police target someone's registration as they had mine. They concluded it was retaliation for my whistleblowing against an international child trafficking ring.

Certain NSW Police further contributed to my harassment, by ignoring my requests for their assistance. During Halloween 2014, I arrived home to find my child's dog baited and lying in a pool of blood. Days following the baiting, my next-door neighbour approached my property in a rage and started smashing at our locked front gate. He screamed at me: 'I should have killed that dog! I'm gonna kill that dog!' He motioned to jump our fence.

A friend (an ex-police officer) was visiting my home at the time. She instinctively intervened and managed the neighbour's violence. It took her five minutes to make him leave my property. She called the police who attended and provided an event number: 56705529. The police promised to at least caution the neighbour - but did not.

I am convinced the neighbour would have assaulted me, because he previously assaulted my brother without provocation. Shortly after moving from Wollongong (a major centre of my childhood abuse), the neighbour approached my brother, who was entering his car to attend work. The neighbour ambushed him from behind, grabbed him by the throat, and pinned him to his car. The neighbour, who my brother had not previously met, grinned and dared my brother: 'Go on! Hit me!'

By Easter 2015, harassment of my family reached unprecedented intensity. Our problem neighbour targeted us via his umpteenth vexatious complaint to local authorities — this time regarding a fence we legally erected years ago. Then another one of my high-profile perpetrators died, triggering another adverse reaction. Soon after, I suffered a mild head injury in a bizarre car accident. Not long later, our family therapist caved under the unique pressures of working with an incomparable case of 'complex trauma.' Losing our family therapist at such a critical moment, the timing appeared orchestrated. Just after our therapist emailed her sudden decision, our problem neighbour intentionally coated our property in asthma-inducing fibreglass debris for the third time this year.

Immediately after that, local police targeted our young daughter. Police attended our family home after 8pm on a Friday. They claimed a pink iPhone 4 had been reported missing three hours earlier and that the Find my iPhone app had determined it was located inside our home. The senior investigating officer dogmatically asserted that the phone app constituted infallible technology and was accurate to within two metres. She immediately concluded our 10-year-old daughter had stolen the phone, dismissing any testimony, evidence or suggestion our daughter might be innocent.

The officer was defensive, aggressive, sarcastic and evasive. She could not provide us with an event number. She threatened to visit our home and interview our daughter to "jog her memory" concerning the phone's whereabouts. She communicated to us that her questioning would frighten our child into confessing she stole the phone.

I told this officer she did not have permission to interview my child and that she would have to obtain a warrant. I went without sleep for two days while I placed my daughter in hiding and lodged a number of complaints to relevant authorities, including to the NSW Police Commissioner. This was not the first time I had been forced to hide my children.

The offending officer effectively accused my child of committing a crime while in the care of her school. Consequently, the school became heavily involved. The school's principal phoned police and told them it was impossible for our child to have come into contact with the missing phone. The senior investigating officer hung up on the principal who subsequently labelled her, '... a disgrace to the police force.'

My complaints resulted in a formal investigation – which is ongoing – an apology of sorts and a Police showbag being presented to my bewildered 10-year-old. Every investigating officer who attended our home said they had not witnessed the screen shot evidence. I have yet to be shown the alleged screen shot. I do not believe the evidence exists.

When I challenged the offending officer, by asking whether it was possible for someone to fabricate the screenshot, she agreed it 'could be a possibility' but that in 20 years of policing she could not see why that would occur. After ten years of intense harassment from a variety of course, including the polices, I fully appreciate why someone would seek to fabricate evidence against my family.

Such as when police ambushed three family homes and held guns to my husband, I believe the iPhone incident was fabricated as a means of re-traumatising my family and silencing my witness testimony. Police demonstrated far more enthusiasm for investigating a missing pink iPhone 4, than the countless incidents of child abduction, rape and murder I witnessed as a child victim of an international sex trafficking ring.

In September 2015, despite having been warned three times by the Tweed Shire Council not to, the offending neighbour again deliberately coated my home in fibre glass debris. A lawyer subsequently advised me to attend the local Court and apply for an AVO. I followed this instruction.

Tweed Heads Court staff asked me whether my children would be included on the AVO, to which I replied: 'Absolutely.' The Court then told me that only the police could take out the AVO. I said the police refused to do this. The Court instructed me to immediately march next door and ask the Tweed Heads police to take out the AVO on behalf of my family. I followed this instruction also.

A senior Tweed Heads police officer told me there were insufficient recent incidents for police to take out an AVO, that what the neighbour did in October 2014 constituted sufficient grounds, that he could not understand why officers did not do so in 2014, and that I would have to wait for the neighbour to build up a 'dossier' of offences and commit a serious act of violence against me or my family before police would act in our defence.

The officer provided me with yet another Event Number to add to my dossier: 61680488. He suggested that the neighbour continued to commit crimes against my family because I was ‘reactive.’ His theory for criminal motivation is inconsistent with the neighbour’s surprise physical attack on my brother who had never previously met the offender and so no reaction could have preceded that assault.

In short, the NSW Police have instructed me to wait for a violent man to successfully seriously injure me or my children in another surprise, unprovoked assault.

Forget Al Qaeda. Our family lives with the tangible threat of being intermittently terrorised by certain police and random citizens. People, including police and therapists, have offered glib remedies to our predicament: Just move house. Just act normal and polite when police turn up. Just ignore the neighbour. If you know you’re going to be attacked, just go on holiday.

We’ve tried all of that — and it doesn’t work. Such advice demonstrates ignorance of how elite crime rings operate. There is no avoiding an infinitely resourced network that has infiltrated every level of the Australian political and judicial system, as well as all the major establishment institutions. There is no reasoning with its members, whose confidence and arrogance stem from knowing they are protected.

The Australian public often say of child abuse victims: Why didn’t they speak up? Why didn’t they go to the police? If pedophile rings are as widespread as victims claim, why can’t the public see any evidence of it? Perhaps, after reading this article, people will better understand why.

I have endured decades of the types of incidents I describe here, including pet killings, attacks on my family and bizarre mistreatment from health professionals. I have experienced random, unprovoked attacks from complete strangers, an undesirable element within the police force and violent neighbours who suddenly migrate from significant childhood abuse locations. To the uninformed, these events appear to be mere coincidences or the result of something I must have done wrong. But to those with knowledge and experience, this is a recognisable pattern — the modus operandi of a powerful, well-funded child trafficking ring with a vested interest in silencing witnesses like me.

Therefore, when you see victims publicly testifying before the Royal Commission, or you encounter a masturbative collection of warm fuzzies boasting the title ‘Messages to Australia,’ spare a thought for the voiceless mass of victims like me, whose testimonies were indeed reported but will never be publicly disclosed or addressed — thereby preserving the myth of the existence of such abuse.

On Monday 2 November 2015, I took a 6am flight from Gold Coast airport to Sydney. I was scheduled to complete two days of police witness statements with two Sutherland detectives at Surrey Hills police station, beginning that day. During the flight, I sat in front of ABC 4 Corners television presenter Kerry O’Brien who served as PM Gough Whitlam’s press secretary. The day before this flight, Kerry O’Brien launched his biography about his good friend of 40 years, Paul Keating. My press conference, which focussed on Paul Keating and Gough Whitlam being pedophiles, was held the Thursday before Kerry O’Brien’s weekend book launch. So, my press conference cast a shadow over the book launch of the journalist seated behind me for the next hour. (And people say there is no God.)

Nicky Davis, Australia's SNAP representative, was currently negotiating with ABC 4 Corners who expressed interest in interviewing me on television. They subsequently expressed greater interest in interviewing another victim of Bob Hawke who had come forward, the daughter of Bob Hawke's architect Kevin Borland (who had family photos featuring Bob plus two sisters who were willing to testify that she immediately disclosed Bob Hawke's assault to them).

I turned to the guest seated behind me and smiled, 'Hi, Kerry. I'm due to appear on your show.'

'Oh, really? Which story is that?'

'The VIP pedo ring. I'm the one who delivered the press conference last Thursday.'

Kerry O'Brien gasped in horror and dropped his gaze into the magazine on his lap.

'I'm on my way to Sydney to make two days of police witness statements.'

He stared in horror at his reading material, nodding out of synch with my words.

'Don't worry,' I assured him, 'The police will probably want to gag me from further media exposure anyhow.'

Kerry O'Brien announced his retirement from ABC Four Corners four days later.

After landing in Sydney, I spent the day providing witness statements in the company of Australia's SNAP representative, Nicky Davis, plus Sydney's top court support worker. The first day ended on the most traumatic part of the two days. For the first time in my life I described the crime scene where former Prime Minister Paul Keating raped and murdered a young blonde boy on a remote Kurnell beach, and doctor Leonas Petrauskas made me dig up the body. I began to sob. It took a moment for the three women to notice.

'Fiona are you okay?' they chimed.

No, I was not okay. I was contemplating the incident in depth for the first time in my life, simply because no one had ever asked me to detail it before. No therapist. No cop. No-one. No-one had ever cared enough to simply ask me what I saw.

Soon after, I floated out of the police station in a cloud of dissociation and headed toward Central train station. Nicky's voice was a distant echo as she insisted on accompanying me to Marrickville, an inner Sydney suburb where I was to meet Dr Reina Michaelson. I had booked accommodation at the Travelodge Hotel opposite Hyde Park in the city, but I sensed danger and cancelled at the last minute. I asked Reina to find me alternative accommodation and tell no one, including me. That way, I figured, if I did not know where I was staying, neither did anyone else. But ASIO already knew. The government obviously didn't want Reina and I speaking privately and comparing information, because ASIO began stalking Reina again from the moment we spoke. Reina even confronted an agent staking out her house in a white van. Reina had planned for us to meet at a café just outside Marrickville train station. So, I was surprised when she met me on the platform. We hugged. Then Reina's face went from smile to serious. 'Fiona, they're here for you.'

My gut dropped. 'Who's here?' knowing full well who she meant.

'There are two men stalking me. They're waiting for you outside the station.'

Nicky, Reina and I remained on the platform as we discussed our options. My training had already kicked in. Just then, a man brushed past us, growling menacingly.

'That's one of them!' Reina exclaimed.

I sized him up from behind. Military haircut, clean pressed blue work shorts, clean work boots, high viz yellow bib, off-grid communication device in his right hand. They were ASIO-T4 protective security thugs – and he was the ringleader.

Must protect Nicky and Reina, I thought. I noticed the smart phone in my hand and announced: 'I'm getting a photo.' I ran after the stalker and took several photos of him from behind. Then I got as close as possible to his back, positioned my phone, and yelled: 'Hey!' He turned around and I snapped a full-frontal shot. His face was clean shaven, his work clothes clean and crisp. It was 5pm and this guy had certainly not been at work all day. I spun around with the agility of an acrobat and took off toward Nicky and Reina.

'He's coming!' the girls exclaimed. We quickly exited the train station, but the stranger caught up with us just outside. His hands were tightly clenched, and his veins popped out of his outstretched neck as he struggled to contain his rage. I braced myself for a physical assault. I guarded my cell phone so he couldn't snatch it from me. His demeanour was reminiscent of the Holsworthy military thugs from my youth.

'Why did you take my photo!' he yelled at me. 'I was just returning home from work!'

I took a step forward and thrust my finger at his ugly face: 'You have been stalking her! (I pointed at Reina) and now you're stalking me! I'm calling the police!'

He flinched. 'No, I'm calling the police!'

We exited the platform with Nicky at rear. The thug walked a foot behind Nicky as he called police and alleged three women were harassing him. Nicky swung around and yelled for the person on the other end of the line to hear, 'If we are harassing you – then stop following us!'

Reina led us to a café around the corner from Marrickville train station. We sat at a table. 'There will be a fourth one standing across the road there,' I pointed across the road, 'observing the operation from a distance.'

'Yes, there was!' Reina and Nicky chimed. 'We saw him.'

A police car pulled up at the train station entrance which was out of our view. A young female officer began speaking with two of the ASIO agents. Nicky and Reina expressed their concern that the stalkers were trying for 'false arrest' against me. I noticed additional police cars circling us like sharks. 'Those guys only need one police mate,' I warned, 'and I'm stuffed.' I had asked the Sutherland detectives for their cell phone numbers in case something like this occurred, but they declined. I phoned Sutherland police station and asked for the detective who took my statement. The desk officer had no idea of my case and I had no time to explain it to him. 'Ma'am, stay there and we'll send an officer to you!'

No, I thought, there are plenty police officers here already.

Reina peeked around the corner again, to gauge what was happening.

'I'm out of here,' I told Nicky.

'No! You can't go!'

'I know what I'm doing. I must go now.'

'No, no! You can't go!'

'You're not listening. It's time for me to go.'

'Okay,' she resigned. 'Meet us at the Travel Lodge hotel.'

'Okay,' I lied.

In Nicky's words, she turned her head for a moment, looked back – I had disappeared into thin air.

I fled down a small backstreet at a brusque pace, but not so fast as to arouse suspicion. I turned right into the first tiny lane, to lose sight of the cop cars circling the main street. It was a dead end. At the far end of this lane, I pressed my body hard up against a slither of protruding brick wall and swapped my pink shirt for beige. I caught my breath and thanked God I had been swimming daily for the past two years.

I spied two shopkeepers chatting from their back porches. They were obviously wondering what I was doing. I offered, ‘Have you watched the news lately where they mentioned three prime ministers were pedophiles?’

‘I heard about that,’ responded one woman.

‘Well, that’s me. I’m the witness. I’m in Sydney making police statements and now I’m being chased by bad men.’

How could I explain? ‘Err, not really. That’s not the best thing right now. Some police are helping the pedophiles.’

Enough time had passed for me to move. I surveyed my options: scale a 10-foot brick wall at the dead end of the road or return the way I came. I’m too old for this Jason Bourne shit! I moaned. I’m 46, not 26.

The women read my mind. ‘You can go through that gate,’ one pointed to a spot behind me, ‘through their back yard, up their front veranda and out their front gate.’

‘Thanks,’ I waved and ran off. I traversed the suburban streets until I found a safe place to hide, from where I could monitor the passing traffic. My phone rang. It was my detective. I explained I was in a state of shock, trauma and dissociation, and I had to flee because I didn’t know whether the cops who turned up at the train station were good or bad. I asked her what my legal rights were concerning photographing a stranger on a station platform. She said she did not know but advised me to send the photos to multiple locations and delete them from my phone.

‘I’ve already done that,’ I said.

The detective tried to convince me to contact Nicky and Reina and reunite with them, otherwise there would be police looking for me out of concern for my safety.

‘Look,’ I explained, ‘unless you can convince me I’m not going to have some bullshit charge slapped against me by these pedo stalkers – I’m on the first flight out of here!’

‘No, don’t do that. We want you back tomorrow to finish the statements.’

‘From my perspective, I know it only takes one bad cop to cooperate with those stalkers. I need you to phone Marrickville police and sort this out. Then phone me back.’

I called my friend who lived in a nearby suburb.

‘What’s happening?’ she asked.

‘I’m in trouble. They’re after me. I’m hiding in the Marrickville backstreets.’

‘I’m at work. I’m forty-five minutes away. Can you get to my place?’

I hung up my mobile which immediately rang. It was my detective. She assured me I was not in trouble and that everything had been sorted with Marrickville police. She had contacted the female officer who responded to the stalkers’ call. ‘The men said they were perplexed that you took a photo, and that they were just innocently returning home from work.’

‘No. That’s not what they were doing. That’s not what two credible witnesses saw.’

‘The officer did suspect there was another side to the story. I’ve asked for her to send me her report.’

I emerged from my hiding place and walked down the street. I spied a man closing his business for the day and approached him, ‘Can you please call me a taxi from your phone? I don’t want to do it from mine.’ I explained my situation and that I was on the run from some unsavoury men.

He explained that there was a taxi depot nearby.

‘Can you please walk me to it?’

He agreed.

‘If you carry my bag for me,’ I held it out for him, ‘we will look like a couple.’

The stranger nodded and slung my black duffle bag over his shoulder. We walked several blocks to a taxi repair depot where my new friend instructed them to get me a taxi. Within 30 minutes, I was safe in the home of a prominent Sydney barrister.

That evening, I watched as ABC Media Watch presenter Paul Barry personally attacked me for daring to speak at a press conference about my child abuse, instead of critiquing the media’s coverage of my press conference as he was supposed to.

Reina Michaelson later phoned me and commented, ‘You were amazing. Everything you did was perfect.’

‘When will this end,’ I sighed.

‘Fiona, I think this is a life sentence.’

The NSW Police promised to visit my home and take an estimated five more days of witness statements. This never occurred. The NSW Police never contacted me again. The detective who took my statements did raid the Holowczak’s home with police dogs and did walk the streets interviewing neighbours who supported my account – but the police never told me this; I heard it from the residents. Later, I was contacted by a Sydney lawyer who basically told me the Sutherland detective in charge of my case, who grew up in Engadine, was a member of the child trafficking network she was supposedly investigating.

Reina was right: I serve a life sentence for crimes committed against me. Antony Kidman was right: I achieved nothing without the Luciferians’ support. The Luciferian network’s two-pronged attack - harassment and sabotage - is designed to make victims like me give up hope. It is designed to induce the state Kidman promoted: Learned Helplessness, ‘the condition in which a person suffers from a sense of powerlessness arising from a traumatic event or persistent failure to succeed.’

Source of Hope Within

Always be prepared to give an answer to everyone who asks you to give the reason for the hope that you have. (1 Peter 3:15)

Bond University destroyed my career in October 2010. For two years leading up to that moment, I juggled study with debilitating stroke symptoms, rehabilitation, excessive scrutiny, sabotage, and my own children's special needs. Then suddenly my life was still. Suddenly I noticed I was deeply exhausted. Suddenly I had the time and headspace to sleep. I slept heavily most days. When not asleep, I watched Christian satellite television, listened to the Bible, or prayed. I prayed continually for three specific things: vindication, compensation, and reinstatement.

Three weeks into my hiatus, I fell into a deep sleep in front of the television. An hour later, I suddenly awoke. I was wide awake. I went from the deepest sleep, to being as awake as possible. My eyes remained shut as I heard a TV evangelist announce:

'GOD HAS HEARD YOUR PRAYERS!'

I immediately fell back into a deep slumber. Sometime later, I awoke again. My eyes stayed closed as I listened:

'DO NOT FRET ABOUT YOUR SCHOLASTIC CONCERNS.'

I fell deeply asleep again. Then I was suddenly alert, my still eyes closed.

'YOU WILL BE JUSTIFIED!'

I slept again, and again woke up to the pastor's loud voice:

'YOU WILL BE RECOMPENSED!'

Dead asleep. Then wide awake:

'YOU WILL BE REINSTATED!'

I fell asleep again. I awoke in time to hear the pastor's final words: 'I had not intended to give this sermon. I had something else planned. I don't know why I gave this sermon. Perhaps there is someone out there who needed to hear it.'

Jon ignored me when I tried to tell him that God spoke to me through the television set. So, I relayed the strange experience to my psychologist friend Luciana who laughed hard at my exhibiting classic signs of the very thing Bond tried framing me with.

The following Sunday, I awoke at 6am and could not fall back to sleep. I then did something I never usually did, I went into our lounge room, turned on the television and flicked through the Christian satellite channels. Jon then did something he never typically does. He emerged from the bedroom and joined me. We caught the end of a story about a university student who took a moral stand against something she believed in. The student was consequently victimised by university staff. What started as something small snowballed until the university was eventually investigated by a powerful external body. In response, the student said, many of the offending lecturers chose to resign instead of implementing the recommended changes. The remaining university lecturers approached the student and admitted she had been in the right all along.

Jon's mouth dropped open and he glanced at me like one of those rotating fairground clown heads that devour ping-pong balls.

'See,' I smiled, 'I told you the television was talking to me.'

I phoned Luciana and handed the phone to Jon who confirmed, 'Yes, Luciana, the television talked to me too.'

'Fiona,' Luciana marvelled, 'You're like a clairvoyant or something. People think you're weird because you say all these things without any evidence for it, and it makes you sound paranoid and crazy. But then, months later - it all comes true!'

Anything Except the Biblical Jesus Christ

In today's Western society it is acceptable to embrace all kinds of weird spiritual beliefs. It is fine to be a Zen Buddhist and believe in reincarnation, or to consult an Indian guru for advice on mantra. It is cool to embrace the Mormon belief that they will populate their own polygamist planet, or to experience Shamanic visions and communicate with animal spirits, or to dance naked in the forest and chant to Mother Earth. It is acceptable for people to gather in the mountains and wait for visitations from alien UFOs. It is normal to consult mediums and spirits to find out how your dead loved ones are faring in the afterlife. It is acceptable to speak of the ethereal concept of a 'Christ consciousness.' It is even okay to be a Satanist and attend conferences and ritual orgies. In fact, all these beliefs and practises are deemed 'culturally acceptable' by mental health practitioners. It is hip to be anything these days – except one thing: it is not okay to be a Bible believing Christian. If I say I communicate with my God, or if I experience strange events in the context of my Christian beliefs, then that apparently makes me crazy. I am labelled a crazy right-wing fundamentalist because the people doing the labelling are Luciferians who hate God and who strive to achieve the opposite of everything the Bible says.

My Secret Source of Strength

I was asked on social media: To what do you attribute your ability to not only survive the unspeakable but thrive? You seem to be thriving to me. You are powerful.

Firstly, I do not always thrive. My supporters simply do not get to witness my private meltdowns. I too was once fragile and frightened, and at times I still feel threatened and anxious; hence I still suffer with Complex PTSD. But I get what people mean. I seem to thrive relative to the condition most victims of extreme abuse are seemingly in. Many victims are curled up in foetal positions in the corner of some psychiatric ward. Or they have committed suicide already. But those are the visible victims. People do not realise that through mind control the filthy rich elite have created an invisible population of survivors who appear to function within society. These victims walk around oblivious to the content of their implicit memory systems. Their core issues manifest as numbness, or mental health issues for which they take prescription medicine, or else they drink, sex, or work to distract themselves from the unspeakable reality. Mental health issues only overcome those in conflict with their implicit involvement in clandestine cult and network activities.

And yes, I was born with innate abilities that helped me survive. The qualities that John Gittinger and his vile associates selected me for are the very same ones I employed to fight their programming. Their training is what I used to defend myself against their agents. I turned their skills on them and bit them on the arse like an angry dog. But I am only what God made me, and what Gittinger tampered with. God created me an introvert like every other member of my large family. Gittinger changed me to an extrovert. If Gittinger had not changed me to an extrovert, I would not have been able to speak publicly and interact with victims the way I have. It is as the Bible says:

> But as for you, you thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save many people alive.

My survival is testament to the existence and authority of Jesus Christ. My belief in the Biblical God and His only son Jesus Christ is the fundamental reason I managed to recover my memories without cracking or dying. That is my big secret. That is my source of hope in the face of adversity. That is where I found the courage and strength to defy my abusers and dare to heal. Deep down I know that Jesus Christ is Lord, that this world is under the temporary occupancy and rule of Lucifer and his vile minions, and that there is a real, tangible afterlife as described in the Bible. Yes, I am a crap Christian. My abusers specifically targeted my childhood belief in God and made it near impossible to relax, pray, concentrate on reading the Bible, and trust in an all-powerful, all-knowing, ever-present Creator.

My survival is testament to the existence and authority of Jesus Christ

It has been difficult to reconcile why this same God allowed one innocent child to experience so much pain and terror. I sometimes ask, why did God let one little girl experience more hell on earth than ten thousand lives combined? What is the point to all this? Why does God let bad things happen to innocent people? Why am I still here? It is not enough to just survive, with my head barely above the flood waters. I want a break. I want peace. When will God avenge me? When will he silence and destroy my enemies? Where is my vindication, compensation and reinstatement? Where is my Job-like ending? Job's life was a picnic compared to mine. His calamity struck all at once during his adulthood, and he had a stable childhood development to fall back on. I had no such base. These are the questions and arguments I share with God as I stomp around in frustration, anger and anxiety.

Why Do Bad Things Happen to Innocent People?

I was in my early 20s when I grasped the story and meaning of Job. Job was a wealthy, righteous and socially respected man. God and Satan had a wager at Job's expense. God instigated Satan's focus on Job by asking him whether he had considered Job and how upright he was. Satan responded by accusing God of wrapping Job up in cotton wool, and he challenged God by betting, if God took everything from Job, the man would curse God. So, God gave Satan permission to rob Job of his possessions, then his kids, then his health. Even worse, Job's wife began nagging him. Then Job's mates accused Job of having done something wrong to attract such calamity. In all this, Job still did not blame God.

For many Bible pages, Job debated with his three friends. He challenged God to appear so that he can have it out with Him in person, like I did atop that Alaskan mountain. Finally, God did appear before Job and his three friends. At this, Job dropped to the ground in terror. For many pages, God asked Job many questions about the natural world. God asked Job whether he is able to feed all the wild animals, control the weather, or physically wrestle wild beasts. Job crapped himself in awe and admitted he knew nothing about such things. Finally, God told Job: 'Listen, there is more going on in this world than you can imagine. So, until you know how to run the physical world, don't tell me how to run the spiritual world.' In the end, Job was restored, in a sense. He had a second family of kids who were the most handsome in the land, greater wealth, and was publicly vindicated before his mates.

Justice is Coming

People discredit the existence of the Biblical God by saying a loving God would never throw people in Hell. They also question why a caring God would let such horror happen to innocent children like me. Here is my understanding of such matters. Firstly, God gave humans free will to do as they choose. The things some people chose to do, the Bible says, are so evil that they never entered God's mind as being possible:

> And they built the high places of Baal, which are in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; which I commanded them not, neither came it into my mind, that they should do this abomination, to cause Judah to sin.

For a person to be judged and sentenced to prison, they must first commit the crime. God allows perpetrators to rape, torture, and kill children because if they did not physically act on their potential and desire for evil, they could not subsequently be judged and eternally punished by God, and so they would qualify for Heaven. I don't want to spend eternity with Luciferian pedophile scum like Kidman.

God showed Ezekiel a vision of the priests secretly performing cult rituals inside the Temple, and asked:

> Is it nothing to the people of Judah that they commit these detestable sins, leading the whole nation into violence, thumbing their noses at me, provoking my anger? Therefore, I will respond in fury. I will neither pity nor spare them. And though they cry for mercy, I will not listen.

> God then instructed an angel to: Walk through the streets of Jerusalem and place a mark upon the foreheads of all who weep and sigh because of the abominations being committed in their city.

> God then instructed five more angels to: Follow him through the city and kill everyone whose forehead is not marked. Show no mercy; have no pity! Kill them all – old and young, girls and women and little children. But do not touch anyone with the mark. Begin here at the Temple. So, they began by killing the 70 leaders…

> God said: The sins of the people of Israel and Judah are very, very great. The entire land is full of murder; the city is filled with injustice. They are saying, 'The LORD doesn't see it! The LORD has abandoned the land!' …I will fully repay them for all they have done.

God hates the satanic ritual murder of babies. Human sacrifice is the 'abomination that causes desolation' which will occur in the Third temple. Luciferian ritual and sacrifice are the root cause of social decline. The Old Testament is simply a history of God's chosen people oscillating between worshipping the Biblical God and worshipping Lucifer. When they served God, the Jews prospered. When they practised Satanism and sacrificed their babies to Moloch, their society fell apart.

So, it is today. The 350,000-strong Belgian march against their government's child trafficking operation proves that people power can't fix this. Only the direct intervention of God can clean up the mess Western society is in for throwing out the Ten Commandments, school prayer, and Christian morals, in exchange for witchcraft and pornography, drugs and divorce. That is why another Passover is coming – to end this evil age. Instead of painting lamb's blood over their door lintels, an invisible mark is placed in the foreheads of those who believe in the Lamb of God. Those spiritually marked by God will be spared from the coming holocaust in which the Bible predicts two thirds of Jewish people will die.

> I saw another angel ascending from the rising of the sun, having the seal of the living God, and he called with a loud voice to the four angels who had been given power to damage earth and sea, saying, 'Do not damage the earth or the sea or the trees, until we have marked the servants of our God with a seal in their foreheads.'

God will exact justice. He will issue the death penalty. His order of vengeance will mimic that recorded in Ezekiel. It will start at the Temple, with allowing the Luciferians to perpetrate another holocaust against the apostate Christian churches and Jewish Synagogues, before turning His sword of justice against the Luciferians themselves.

What can we do to help?

People often asked me on social media, 'What can I do to help the plight of victims?' I am only one voice, they think. How can I possibly make an impact on such a vast operation? As the above Ezekiel vision shows – the most important thing is to care. If you care, that will influence your every action and at least prevent you from contributing to the problem. God marked and spared those who felt anguish over what the Luciferian pedophiles have done to mankind.

We have only two sides to choose from: good or evil, no shades of grey. This is increasingly evident as the Luciferian pedophiles make their move for global control. I have tried to relay in this book how this has come to be, and how their system of control works. Hopefully, this book helps to make sense of everything that does not make sense.

Jesus Christ instructed His followers to be witnesses for the truth. A witness takes the stand and tells the court what they personally experienced. Christians were not asked to play judge, jury, prosecutor, or defence attorney. We are not here to argue and prove. We are here to testify to what we believe and why, to explain the reason for our sense of hope when people ask.

A pastor asked me whether I was going to get someone reputable to write a forward in this book and so vouch for my credibility – and by extension, my sanity. I responded, 'Who do you suggest will raise their hand to have an ASIO target painted on their head? I have a psychiatrist who was the Royal Commission's first choice of expert witness to publicly testify regarding the impact of child abuse on adults. But she would be stripped of her registration if she endorsed this book. And who am I trying to convince anyhow? If people aren't convinced of my story after reading Relevance of Intelligence which contains complex, previously unpublished information - nothing will convince them. If people don't want to believe me, then my book is not for them. They are not my target audience. In fact, I don't want them to read my book.

'My target audience are the victims who recognise my testimony because they themselves lived it. My target audience are victims who don't dare respond to me on social media for fear of being detected. My audience is the person who writes to tell me: "You are the reason I get up in the morning," or "I believe in God because of you." Do you think I care what the public say about me? I am very experienced at being hated: I've been defamed on national TV by the ABC, I was slandered to the Psychology Board, I was continually vilified on social media. I just soldiered on through their incessant attacks, which is the reason I got so far with my story - I did not crumble at their insults. So, as if I care now what people, who don't want to know the truth, think of my book.'

'Your story is hard to swallow,' he concluded.

'Then they are going to have a hard time swallowing what the Bible says is coming next. My book is just the appetiser for the main course described in Revelation. The Bible says men's hearts will fail them for fear of what's coming. What do you think could cause people to drop dead in fear like that? If people can't handle my book, how will they handle it when what I witnessed under Pine Gap manifests and enters their own homes? My job is to just tell people what I experienced. Their choice how they receive it. Duty of care fulfilled.'

I left the most unbelievable things out of this book. I have tasted the spiritual and seen things that I can't begin to share here, things which prevent me from denying the existence and authority of God. My supernatural experiences of God's authority and power are relative to my experiences of the most vile and evil darkness. That is a fair balance.

I understand that God's nature is softer and gentler than I thought. I know that He only bothers disciplining and changing the character of those He cares about. I know He never pushes us beyond what we can endure but squishes us right up against that line. I know that somehow God weaves everything together so that in the end, it will all make sense. I know that God can take what people intended to harm and destroy me and turn it into the best thing that could have happened. Yet intellectually knowing and emotionally feeling are two different things. Life hurts. Life is pain.

Happiness stems from a word meaning 'luck.' Happiness is a transient state of being which depends on current external circumstances. Joy, however, transcends our physical surrounds, and is a result of belief and faith in God. I might not be happy with my worldly situation - extremely unhappy. I'm not that joyful either. But I do have a sense of hope. They can rob me of my social reputation and standing, destroy my career, kill my every interest, ruin my finances, break my marriage, threaten my kids, poison my pets, turn my family against me, take my friends, decimate my physical health, and publicly mock me in the media. The one thing they can never destroy is my belief in Jesus Christ.

True 'transhumanism' and eternal life are attained by simply believing in Jesus Christ, believing that He is who the Bible says He is. Remember the thief hanging next to Jesus during the crucifixion? All he said was, 'Jesus, remember me when you come into your Kingdom.' Jesus replied, 'Sure thing.' All the thief did to gain what these Luciferians have been struggling to invent themselves was believe and ask. No Kundalini serpent crap, no legalism, no exchange of money, no dressing and speaking the right way, no secret doctrine, no ten steps to this or eight steps to that, no magic, alchemy or technology. Just belief and request.

I believe God can restore me if he chooses. I believe He will indeed vindicate, compensate, and reinstate me. But exactly how He will do that, I have no idea. It will likely not occur in this life. And in the great scheme of things it does not matter. What matters is that Heaven and the Lake of Fire are real, tangible places – just as real as what we physically perceive right now. Have you ever sat too close to a campfire so that it became uncomfortable? Have you ever experienced a traumatic accident? Have you ever felt the pain of losing a loved one? Take every horrible thing that could happen to a human being and multiple it - and continue increasing it. The result does not begin to touch on what awaits our enemies. Justice does exist. God's justice will ultimately prevail.

Belief in God’s omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence is my secret survival tactic. That is my source of hope within.

2020: What the Future Holds

For before these days there was no hire for man, nor any hire for beast; neither was there any peace to him that went out or came in because of the affliction:
for I set all men everyone against his neighbour.
(Zech 8:10)

Coming to a town near you…

DESTROYED BY FIRE
"Listen! Hear the cry of Babylon, the sound of great destruction from the land of the Babylonians.
For the Lord is destroying Babylon.
He will silence her loud voice.
Waves of enemies pound against her;
the noise of battle rings through the city.
Destroying armies come against Babylon.
Her mighty men are captured, and their weapons break in their hands.
For the Lord is a God who gives just punishment;
He always repays in full.
I will make her officials and wise men drunk, along with her captains, officers, and warriors.
They will fall asleep and never wake up again!"
says the King, whose name is the Lord of Heaven's Armies.
This is what the Lord of Heaven's Armies says:
"The thick walls of Babylon will be levelled to the ground, and her massive gates will be burned.
The builders from many lands have worked in vain,
for their work will be destroyed by fire!"

APATHY KILLS

For 50 years, I've watched my friends, family and peers stay perpetually drunk and stoned; worship grubby musicians whose 'music' grated on my nervous system; shag whoever and use abortion as birth control; marry just so they could play princess for a day – twice; dump their newborns into Soviet-style day care institutions for 'socialisation' and later wonder why their kids bit people; toss their marriages aside like fast food wrapping when things got a little tough; commit the same mistakes with a new batch of lives while leaving the first family feeling abandoned and suicidal; resort to plastic surgery to stay presentable for one last fling before they die; and ultimately blame a 'non-existent' God when everything went to shit.

And now, the entire world has gone to shit. And I will tell you who is responsible for our current situation:

- Those who thought they were good people because they didn't overtly harm others. What they didn't realise was, their selfish actions contributed to the destruction of society.
- Those who felt more passionate about basketball and soccer rather than justice.
- Those who put more time, energy and money into campaigning for the rights of the endangered bilby instead of aborted babies. [504]
- Those who preached against the evils of eating meat instead of supporting victims of child abuse.
- Those who taught evolutionary theory to science students, and then embraced the idea that we were created by aliens – while mocking the concept of a Biblical Creator.
- Those who 'explored their sexuality' (aka, became sluts), turned sex into their religion and replaced church with sex clubs (that surely transformed into pedophile kill venues after the 'straight' folks left for the night).
- Those 'millennial' assholes I studied with, for whom selfishness is so normal and justified, it's neurologically impossible for them to comprehend the concept of altruism.
- Those who mistook church for a social club and tolerated the infiltration of Freemasons and Satanists.
- Those morons who considered that Marxist mind-controlled imp Greta Thunberg a hero, when her social media pages were actually run by her father and a UN activist.
- Those hypocrites who condemned society for using plastic bags while knowingly peddling their kids to pedophiles for sex.
- Those who marched through major Australian cities to protest the election of some foreign country's leader but wouldn't bother rallying against child rape by Australian politicians.

I have spent my entire life resisting the underlying Nazi-Communist agenda. I watched in horror and confusion as Marxist-Lenin doctrine ruined my primary, secondary and tertiary education. Soviet psychologist Lev Vygotsky was resurrected to stalk me in every course I studied, from gifted education to psychology, to law. The emphasis was on everybody being the same, even if that meant denying the special needs of high IQ kids. Everybody got the same result, no matter how hard they tried. Zero value was placed on creativity, individuality, and being right. There was no right (except in math and science) because 'right' depended on your frame of reference, your interpretation of reality. There was no one reality – oh, except in Science, where eugenicist evolutionary theory was the only right, and believing in a Biblical God was so wrong. I was the only person who ever took a stand in social settings like the classroom, or work, or church. No one ever stood with me. It felt like those dreaded 'group' projects at school or university where I ended up doing the work of five people. And you know what? I'm tired of peoples' apathy – and so is God.

A TRUE PROPHET

A decade ago, Virginian John 'Jack' Johnson predicted exactly what is hitting America (and Australia) right now: unemployment, food shortages, inflation, riots, plus what is coming next. He wrote on his site (United States Prophecy):

> We are going into a total economic crash and a great depression the likes that have never, ever come upon the earth. This is God's justice! For every evil thing that befalls man, 90% of the time it is self-inflicted. We did not learn our lesson from World War II and the Nazi's Third Reich, so now the Fourth Reich is coming into power right before our eyes. The Fourth beast, which is World Communism*, has now come into play. This all could have been avoided had the church stood up against sorcery, witchcraft and communism! Thanks to the Clinton administration you now have over 800 FEMA Concentration camps for the Fourth Reich to imprison you; Which one will you be going to? This does not even touch the tip of the iceberg for what this nation has done.*

Jack saw a vision of America being invaded by Communist China and Russia and bombed with nuclear warheads:

> During the same time as the vision about the state of Florida in July of 1995, God gave me a vision of a massive army coming down on America. He said, "John, I am going to allow the enemies of the United States to judge America. When America's enemies come, they will have no mercy on the men, women and children." I saw troop movement and they appeared to be Communist Chinese and Russian troops coming into the United States. As they came in, America was no match. I saw churches and synagogues were being levelled by heavy artillery. As the churches were being blown up, I saw Jews and Christians being herded up and shot like cattle in front of their churches and homes. I saw the troops killing children and infants with their bayonets. I saw the American people tormented beyond imagination. The troops were void of emotions. Their objective is to take the nation and take it hands down. All able-bodied working people will be forced into slave labour. Some will be taken to other countries and some left here. The soldier's main objective was to kill all Jews and Christians. As I am seeing all this horror I asked, "Lord, what is happening?" He said, "Because of the wickedness of the United States of America I am allowing her enemies to invade her lands."

Judgement will begin with the church 'social clubs' thanks to the 'goat farmers' - the pretend pastors who put on a rock concert every week instead of preaching and teaching about intercessory prayer and spiritual warfare. These goat herders round their flocks up for the coming slaughter. The churches and synagogues will be wiped out because that is what Americans chose. America has chosen Nazi-Communism over Biblical Christianity. Jack had a vision of the fate of these churches. God told him:

> "This is all entertainment and spectacle. They do not care about me or my teachings, it is all entertainment. Ninety-nine percent of the worshiping that you see with this rock and roll band and with the golden calf is sin in my eyes!"
> After they hyped the people up with their worship, I noticed that not one song pertained to the cleansing blood of Christ Jesus for the remission of sin and for healing and deliverance. The worship was for entertainment and they deleted every song that pertained to the cleansing blood of Jesus Christ. The reason is because they are in gross sin and the thought of the blood of Jesus makes them cringe. Without hearing of the blood of Jesus they would not be made to think of their sin…
>
> The Pastor got up and read a few announcements and told how sweet everything is and how well everything is going. He spoke about the building funds and all that the church was doing...
> [God] said "Let me explain something to you. The goat farmers never preach on gross sin or wickedness. They never preach or talk about eternal damnation. They preach prosperity gospel and never talk about going into the Garden of Gethsemane to be tested and broken..."
> As I looked through the congregation, they were all clapping and cheering. They were all very wealthy and were making some kind of confession of Jesus, but deep down inside they did not know Him...
> The goat farmer pastor told the people/goats that God was going to bless everybody and told them to make sure they give their weekly tithe. He said to give ten percent of their weekly income and God would bless them tenfold.
> What amazed me was that the goat farmers are riding around in 60 and 70 thousand-dollar cars, living in $700,000 to one million-dollar homes, plus all the perks and per diems that go with it....
> I looked and beheld the prophets of the church, and they were prophesying about the great by and by and how great everything was and how God was going to bless them, and how God was going to take care of them and do all these great things, and that they were all going to have great wealth and prosperity...
>
> The goat farmer Pastor then gave a lukewarm, watered down message to the congregation... He never mentioned repentance of gross sin, sexual morality, witchcraft, sorcery, idolatry, pride, hatred, bitterness, envy, strife, lust, fornication, adultery...
> In the days to come, Russian T-9 tanks are going to level every church in the United States and this will be God's justice because the church of the West has become so > satanically and demonically corrupt that God's red-hot anger is burning at them and they are too stupid to realize it.

> After this, I went outside and saw the sheep hanging on the gallows blocks. I approached the sheep and started talking to them and I asked, "Why have you been strung up by your hind quarters? Why are you hanging upside down here?" One sheep said, "I tried to warn the Pastor that the Satanists infiltrated the church and have set up shop here. I was told it was a bunch of nonsense and he told me not to talk such foolishness again and to get out and don't come back to this church speaking that type of nonsense."
> I talked to another sheep and he said, "I tried to warn the congregation to repent of their sins and humble themselves and bow down like a bent reed and repent of their idolatries and witchcraft. I was thrown out and told to shut up and that I was a heretic".
> I spoke to another sheep that is a prophet and asked, "Why are you strung up here?" He said, "Because I kept telling the pastor that the full and complete day of darkness is coming upon the world. I told the pastor that he needed to call the whole congregation to repentance and to be broken and contrite before the Lord because the great day of darkness is coming upon the earth. He told me to shut up that they didn't want any doomsday prophets in their church."
> I went down the line talking to the strung-up sheep and heard the horror stories of how they were abused and kicked out and how some of the sheep asked for humanitarian aid and groceries. The shepherds, these goat farmers, said "We don't have enough money so we can't help you." Yet it is amazing that they can drive around in a 60,000-dollar car and live in a million-dollar home with all the perks and per diems and couldn't take $150 to $200 out of his pocket to give to one of his congregational member's so they could get some groceries.
> God's red-hot anger is burning at these shepherds and the leaders of HIS flock. Little do they realize that the scripture will soon be fulfilled, for on that day God will separate the sheep from the goats. (Mat 25:32-33)

Thankfully, a remnant of genuine Christians will escape this fate. Jack added (during a 2009 interview):

> But, the sons and daughters of God are going to have a peace because God has been preparing for these past ten years for the things that are going to come. And we're gonna be like a lighthouse… and the people are gonna see the light and they're gonna come to those who have the light, and those that are earmarked for salvation, those are the ones, the stragglers who will be coming in. But as far as the rest of the nation and what's gonna come next year and down the line, it will be like Revelation 12:18, Babylon is fallen, fallen. It says it twice: fallen, fallen is Babylon the great. And as the nation is falling, the sons and daughters of God are gonna rise up with the light, they're gonna take the kingdom… God's gonna carry us through. He carried Noah through it, he carried Lot out of it.

Other Christians have seen similar visions of America being bombed by Russia and China, including David Wilkerson and Dimitri Duduman (the Christian pastor who was tortured in Communist Romania). Like Jack Johnston, Duduman also saw a vision of a man who provided a similar message of hope for God's elect:

> "I am the protector of America. America's sin has reached God. He will allow this destruction, for He can no longer stand such wickedness. God, however, still has people that worship Him with a clean heart as they do His work. He has prepared a heavenly army to save these people."
> As I looked, a great army, well-armed and dressed in white, appeared before me.
> "Do you see that?" the man asked. "This army will go to battle to save My chosen ones. Then, the difference between the Godly and the ungodly will be evident."

Bible prophecy is playing out before our eyes. The first, white horseman of the apocalypse is given a crown ('corona' means 'crown'), and he rides forth to conquer the earth. Using the threat of a global 'pandemic' the Luciferian elite conquered the world within two weeks without firing a single shot (hence the first horseman wears white).

The second horseman wears red (bloodshed) and takes peace from the earth. This could signal war between countries, or war between neighbours, or war between family members. More Australians have died from domestic violence during this lockdown rather than Covid19, thanks to a lethal combination of families locked inside together for months, home schooling sugar-filled ADHD kids, and alcohol (coz that's so essential). And once the food supply chain is destroyed (thanks to weather manipulated floods, drought, intentionally lit bushfires / wildfires, shutdown of meat production, and banning of seed sales, etc), neighbours will turn on each other to source food for their starving families.

I expect a nuclear exchange featuring Iran is on the rise. But these are all wars and rumours of wars. The final war of Armageddon occurs at the end of the final seven years, and it is one I anticipate featuring an Independence Day like scenario.

What is true and what is a lie? No one can tell anymore - which is the objective. I sent a funny meme to several of my friends. It featured a realistic movie shot a giant spacecraft sitting over a major city, with the caption: '2020, what else could go wrong.' All three friends asked if the picture was real!

My NYC friend told me that Luciferian Freemason and son of my pedophile perpetrator Franklin Graham's Samaritan's Purse Central Park hospital was as empty as the nearby Sinai Hospital. Friends in Texas tell me their hospitals are empty, nurses have been sent home on full pay, and that doctors have been instructed to declare all deaths due to Covid19. Yet I also heard directly from mainland China contacts that there were indeed many flu-pandemic deaths there. But then I heard Covid19 was being used as an excuse for China to round up and execute dissidents. Perhaps that explains the footage I saw: piles of burning bodies, welded burning apartment blocks, people being shot in the streets, food supplies being dumped, and 'sick' folk having their necks snapped while being dragged from their homes? In any case, the Illuminati Li family are surely doing the Royal Rothschilds' bidding.

Most disturbingly, I watched a lengthy video in which a NYC nurse showed video evidence of how healthy patients presenting at the major Covid19 hospital she worked at were being systematically slaughtered by being intubated. Intubation led to a 100 percent death rate, except for one junkie who proved impervious to the sedation drugs and pulled his own tube out. The victims are predominantly poor, black, Hispanic and Asian folk, which suggests an Aryan eugenicist agenda.

In Australia and the UK, the government sent DO NOT RESCUSCITATE forms for the Disabled and elderly folk to sign.

COVID19 PREDICTIONS

An alleged 'David E. Goldberg' died after revealing: the US power grid will be shut down for three days, during which time 15 million dissidents will be rounded up under the guise of a flu epidemic. Citizens are identified as ‘dissidents’ by how much the supported the posts of fake CIA-Military social media agents. I can’t verify this claim, but the following story was published prior to the 2020 Covid19 ‘pandemic.’

> Murdered for speaking out: Last Words of David Goldberg warning of mass murder of Americans
> Veterans Today, 1 September 2019.
> If Goldberg had a real White House source, and we believe he did, then the horrific things he warns of in his tedious but excusable monotone, things VT has confirmations of, explains what really began at 9/11 and why Israel has trained so many of our police, why they control all social media and press, why they control the DHS and why our own military is now an occupation army that, we learned yesterday, just created 200,000 fake people to gather the data Goldberg warns of.
> Goldberg says that his White House sources say that Trump is working with Zionists to round up millions of Americans after a staged power blackout. All rounded up by DHS/ICE, all typically white and suburban, will be murdered.
> Goldberg says that new alternative media organizations, particularly the ones exposing Israel and Zionism, those with the best work, highest standards, are run by Israel to tag activists for assassination…
> Goldberg, before he was murdered, says Israel plans to murder 15 million Americans using disease, accidents and eventually, as America becomes more Trumpish, simply outright murder.
> Stage one is a new strain of influenza being developed at the Lugar Lab in Tbilisi.

ANGLO-SAXON MISSION

The aforementioned coming war with Iran echoes an interview Project Camelot published back in 2010. Bill Ryan interviewed a whistle-blower who said that in 2005 he witnessed a group of City of London Freemasons discuss the Anglo-Saxon Mission - the Illuminati plan where 'China catches a cold' and Iran is provoked to make first strike against the USA. Here is an excerpt from that interview:

In late 2005, I attended what I thought was a normal 3-monthly City security and financial planning meeting, since the usual crowd were emailed listed for attendance. The meeting turned out to be something entirely different. To my surprise (shock) this was very much a Masonic level meeting instead. No notes taken – word of mouth only.

At the meeting, mention was made that the Timeline for war against Iran was being delayed to a point where other contingencies had to be put in place. Contingencies were then mentioned, in quite a matter of fact fashion. First was the Israeli reluctance to strike and provoke Iran into armed action and that Israel promised that action would soon take place in order to provoke the required Iranian military response. (Israel soon after attacked Iranian backed Hezbollah bases in the Lebanon) That was my first surprise.

The second was mention of Japanese reluctance to create havoc within the fledging Chinese financial sectors.[505] China was growing too quickly with the Chinese military the being main beneficiary. The third surprise was open talk about the use of biological weapons – when they would be used since timing appeared to be crucial.

Then there was more talk centred on how Iran must be engaged militarily in order to provoke the desired military response from China. The talk continued about how long conventional weapons should be used, knowing they would be hopeless against a Chinese military onslaught in the region. It soon transpired that they were not making decisions. They were discussing something that had already been planned and so they were simply sharing that information between themselves. It also became clear that the central issue of the meeting was when the 'balloon' would go up.

Further issues dealt with finances, the moving of resources and protection of assets and the central control of these resources: the bringing in outlying assets. I recall the chain/sequence of events, which ran something like this:

They needed either the Iranians or the Chinese to be guilty of first use nuclear weapons in order to justify the next stage. (My information shows that the Iranians do indeed have a tactical nuclear capability) The next stage would be a measured regional nuclear response, enough to cause an immediate ceasefire. This ceasefire would create the time needed to put in place unified totalitarian western governments. Thereafter, or concurrent, biological weapons would be used against the Chinese population.

This would then set of another chain of events that would collapse the whole Chinese political and social infrastructure. This was mentioned as: Disease, followed by wide-spread food shortages, followed by mass starvation. Somehow, this would > then cause the Chinese military to attack eastern Russia. The biological agents were described as being flu like and would spread like wildfire. It shocks and sickens me to describe these events. It shocks me even more to know that plausible events are being manipulated to cause the extinction of a whole part of the human race.

[505] Was Tesla technology consequently employed to cause the 2011 earthquakes that devastated Fukushima's nuclear power plants?

> The evidence was clear. There does indeed exist a timeline for future conflict that this country, the UK, was using this as some sort of world government business plan and many millions would die as a result. The plan is openly described in these circles as the Anglo-Saxon Mission.

The 2019 anti-China protests in Hong Kong reek of CIA Gladio MO. In early 2020, Iran (funded by China), had a brief military exchange with the USA which ended with two earthquakes that destroyed Iran's two major nuclear power plants (what a Tesla-reeking coincidence). Then suddenly, China and Iran were struck with a flu-like epidemic which killed Iran's military leaders. China subsequently blamed the USA for releasing a bioweapon against them. That Wuhan hosted the 2019 world military games in October 2019, just prior to the outbreak, lends credibility to China's accusation. But then North Italy got hit hard, which makes little sense until we consider that area contains Europe's largest population of Chinese folk.

Is there a pandemic? Is it a hoax? Is it true in certain places? Is it a bioweapon designed to target specific non-Aryan ethnicities? Are the elderly and disabled being targeted for extermination like in Nazi Europe?

There is no consistency. Nothing makes sense - which is precisely the point.

At the end of George Orwell's classic 1984, the protagonist is tortured and during interrogation he is repeatedly asked which countries are at war. Each time the victim provides a different answer, the torturer says he is wrong. Finally, Winston breaks down and responds: ‘I DON’T KNOW!’

That is the correct answer. We are not to question the Luciferian pedophiles in charge of this rising Fourth Reich. We are to placidly embrace their global Nazi-Communist totalitarian New World Order. We are to reach a point where, like a tortured MK-ULTRA child victim, we appeal to our perpetrators for relief from our pain and confusion and accept whatever solution they offer. That solution will be the very thing I wrote about in my 2019 book: the ultimate vaccination injected INTO our right hand or INTO our forehead, that changes our DNA, switches off the death gene, switches off our 'fundamental' ability to believe in God, and turns God's creation into something non-human...something Beast-like.

Revelation 12:13 says:

> And he caused all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and slave, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads: And that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name. Here is wisdom. Let him that has understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is 666.

The Greek word for the number '6' is stigma, which means 'a mark, dot, puncture', or 'a mark from a pointed instrument, often as a sign of ownership: mark, brand, tattoo.' Strong's Concordance defines stigma as:

> from a primary stizo (to 'stick', ie, prick); a mark incised or punched (for recognition of ownership), i.e. (figuratively) scar of service - mark.

This definition is similar to that of charagma, the Greek word for 'mark.' Strong's Concordance defines charagma as:

> a scratch or etching, i.e. stamp (as a badge of servitude), or scupltured figure (statue):--graven, mark.

Strong's also notes that charagma is directly related to two other Greek words: (1) charax which means 'to sharpen to a point' and also describes a 'stake'; plus (2) charakter which means:

> a graver (the tool or the person), i.e. (by implication) engraving ('character'), the figure stamped, i.e. an exact copy or (figuratively) representation): express image.

Outside of the Bible, the earliest use of the word Charagma denoted the piercing bite of a serpent's fang.

I expect the Mark of the Beast is some kind of DNA altering vaccination that contains serpent (i.e., 'Nephilim,' aka 'alien,' aka 'fallen angel') DNA, plus animal DNA, and turns humans into an exact copy of the Nephilim-related Beasts who can't die. Does this explain where the Bible says those who take the Mark will seek death but not find it? It would explain how humans have been prepped for the Mark of the Beast, by being gradually injected with vaccinations containing foreign DNA, animal and aborted foetus materials.

In the Book of Revelation, St John could well have described seeing a hypodermic needles, or a wad of needles, piercing the human skin and injecting poison in the form of a Covid19 vaccine.

LUCIFERASE

Left-brained, high-functioning autistic Bill Gates is a self-proclaimed ‘vaccination expert’ who lacks relevant virology or medical qualifications. His family physician said Bill Gates never vaccinated his own kids. Yet Bill Gates campaigns for a global Covid19 quantum microneedle vaccination, a digital ID Immunity Passport, and an implantable device (patented No. 060606) for buying and selling cryptocurrency.

The Human Implantable Quantum Dot Microneedle Vaccination Delivery System that Gates funded, depends on a biochemical called near infrared bioluminescence enzyme luciferase. So, the enzyme that illuminates the quantum dot vaccination and makes it readable via a mobile device application after injection, is called LUCIFERASE. Someone calculated, removing the word ‘human’ from the phrase, Human Implantable Quantum Dot Microneedle Vaccination Delivery System, reduces the numerical value of the phrase to 666.

The Bible is clear: if you accept the Mark of the Beast, you will spend eternity burning in the Lake of Fire alongside the Luciferian pedophile scum running this shit show. It's your choice. The choice will be clear.

IF YOU ARE AT A LOSS TO UNDERSTAND WHAT'S CURRENTLY HAPPENING IN THE WORLD, especially in the USA, you won't do better than reading Fiona Barnett's Lockdown Edition of Eyes Wide Open. It's a miracle of God's grace that Fiona has survived sexual degradation and other extreme forms of physical abuse by perpetrators, many of whom she identifies by name.

With personal perseverance and the help of counsellors, therapists, a supportive husband, and two beautiful daughters who have inherited Fiona's exceptionally high IQ and abilities, she has also been "more than a conqueror" in overcoming years of CIA mind-control programming. But despite how far she has come, she still suffers from vivid memories and flashbacks of some of the most horrific events experienced.

BRIEFING ON SOVIET SCALAR
ELECTROMAGNETIC WEAPONS

FER DE LANCE

Lieutenant Colonel Thomas E. Bearden (U.S. Army, Retired) PhD, is the author of numerous books, papers, briefings, and presentations dealing with anomalous phenomena, scalar electromagnetics, free energy devices, Soviet Tesla weapons, and Soviet scalar electromagnetic weather warfare.

Lt. Col. Bearden was previously a senior scientist and department manager with the Alabama division of a major aerospace company where he directed the company's design and production of expert systems (artificial intelligence) applications for the U.S. Army command control systems. He has more than 29 years experience in air defense systems, tactics, and operations; technical intelligence; nuclear weapons employment; computerized wargames; anti-radiation missile countermeasures; and military systems requirements.

Bearden obtained a Master of Science degree in nuclear engineering from the Georgia Institute of Technology and a Bachelor of Science degree in Mathematics from Northeast Louisiana University. He is a graduate of the U.S. Army Command and General Staff College.

When Fer De Lance was originally written, Tom was a member of Mensa, Society for the Investigation of the Unexplained, International Tesla Society, American Association for the Advancement of Science, Association of American Physics Teachers, the Air Force Association, the Association of the U.S. Army, the American Nuclear Society, and the American Defense Preparedness Association. He is currently the Director of the Association of Distinguished American Scientists (ADAS), Fellow Emeritus of the Alpha Foundation's Institute for Advanced Study, and is CEO of CTEC, Inc.

In private life, Tom has two sons and two daughters, and lives in Huntsville, Alabama with his wife, Doris.

Note: sometimes formatting of the text may be a little fuzzy. It's all because the OCR process didn't go as smoothly as I expected. Also there may be some errors inside text so be vigilant. In any case share this book, send emails to people about knowledge contained in it. Since this book talks about the most terrifying weapons present today the information in it is even more of value. But knowing an old saying »the knife cuts both ways« one can also use the same knowledge in order to heal ourselves since it seems that our body already does it using the physics described inside. Hopefully the latter will prove to be the most useful way to use this old but forgotten / supressed knowledge.

The contents include the 2002 update and the older 1986 briefing with slides.

The Russians have sustained the largest weapons development program ever launched by any nation, and they have kept it effectively hidden from prying Western eyes. I have called this program "Fer-de-Lance," after the deadly South American pit viper of that name.

The dreaded fer-de-lance is a snake of great agility and lethal effect. It often ambushes its hapless prey, striking unexpectedly and without warning. Its first sudden strike is usually lethal to its victim, which promptly expires in writhing agony. Since the Soviet development of scalar EM weapons has been designed for the same purpose, the name seems appropriate.

[2] The present name of the old KGB is the Federal Security Services. The leopard's spots remain the same, regardless of its new name—at least for a die-hard old communist faction of it. Presently the helm of Russia has been turned over to a new Premier who has an extensive KGB background. However, Putin has chosen to differ from the traditional KGB outlook and seems intent on becoming America's trusted cheap oil partner and supplier, in a bid to help his economy and pump much-needed funds into it. His friendship with George Bush may be one of the turning points of this new century He at least has achieved sufficient control over much of the KGB to get on with trying to solve his economic problems and break the old "die-hard communist" mold a bit

2002 OVERVIEW AND BACKGROUND

For some time, Russia and several other nations have possessed highly advanced "extended-electromagnetics" (energetics) weapons of a very novel kind, using a dramatically extended electrodynamics theory {1}. To comprehend these weapons requires a combination of non-Abelian electrodynamics in at least the 0(3) gauge symmetry {2}, general relativity, Bohm's interpretation of quantum mechanics {3}, and the use of time-domain (scalar) energy, fields, and potentials to directly enter distant 3-spatial points without propagating energy through 3-space. It also requires correcting many of the serious errors in classical electrodynamics. Probably the most elegant and applicable extant model to deal with these phenomena and weapons is Sachs' {4} unification of general relativity and extended electrodynamics, particularly as implemented in O(3) electrodynamics. O(3) allows direct engineering by modified EM means.

Most of these energetics weapons are more advanced than what has previously been known to the U.S. military, intelligence, and scientific communities, although parts of the communities are finally making real progress in understanding such "revolutionary" areas. For example, every major weapons lab on earth seems to have discovered longitudinal EM waves and longitudinal EM wave weapons—the scalar interferometry we have been discussing for so long {5}. A major contributing factor holding back U.S. catch-up is that the flawed foundations of Maxwell's 1865 theory {6} have not been changed by the Western scientific community.

Historically, the scientific community exerts resistance to substantial innovation. Often 40 to 50 years are required to do what can be done with a concerted effort in four years. The Manhattan Project in WW II is a notable example of where the scientific community made a maximum effort and did a difficult job in four years. Also, "skunk works" efforts continue to be utilized for very rapid development when something really advanced is to be done and done quickly.

With the U.S. substantially behind in these "new" strategic superweapons, a new Manhattan Project would appear to be advisable and warranted. There are at least some indications that such may actually be going on at last. We hope the indications are true.

A sobering development that occurred early this year (2002) was China's deployment of both quantum potential (QP) weapons {7} and negative energy electromagnetic pulse (EMP) weapons (a type which we originally called the MindSnapper to disguise its true nature) {8,9}. The QP weapons are the dominant weapons on Earth today, followed closely by negative energy EMP weapons in second place. We have not been able to ascertain exactly how many nations have the negative energy EMP weapons, but it is at least five at the time of this writing.

The U.S. is still well behind in the use of special "engines" (special curvatures of spacetime and their dynamics, but achieved with higher group symmetry electrodynamics) for directly engineering the mind itself, and for producing nonmaterial robot systems made totally of such engines—"causal system robots" which we will mention later. Several of the Western nations do accomplish work in the mind control area, but use a sort of "brute force" method oriented on frequency and frequency changes, etc. where the true active mode is the unsuspected transformations of the U(1) electrodynamics to a higher group symmetry unified field theory electrodynamics, accomplished by the human body tissues and structures themselves.

Western scientists have not realized that all EM energy in 3-space actually comes from the time domain to each point in 3-space and returns from that 3-space point back to the time domain.[3] Hence "propagation" of 3-space EM energy is actually the propagation of a "circulation" of EM energy between the time domain and 3-space, involving each 3-space point presently said to be "occupied" by the energy. Unfortunately, Western science is still unaware that no observable exists in time, a priori, since by definition it has no extension in the time dimension at all {10}. Instead, an observable continually recurs as a frozen 3-space snapshot of an ongoing dynamic 4-space interaction, due to the continual repetition of the observation process which is the application of a d/dt operator to the ongoing 4-interaction. Hence, we "see" physical reality (3-space reality) similarly to the way we view a "motion picture" series of successive frozen frames. The major result of this flaw (mistaking a 3-space observable as a 4-spatial cause) in Western science is that Western science still extensively substitutes effect for cause—e.g., in the notion of a separate 3-force acting on a separate 3-mass. No such situation exists in nature, and nothing "moves" or "changes" in 3-space alone. For an entity to exist in time, it requires at least 4-space because a time length is required. Nonetheless, the West is making progress. If some of its scientific dogma can be overcome, the younger scientists will break free and readily do the job required for the defense of this nation.

Mad Scramble of Soviet Science After the End of WWII

During WW II the West produced a great technical breakthrough and obtained the atom bomb as a decisive new weapon. While speeding up his own atomic weapons program[4] as a result, Stalin also ordered his own Academy of Sciences to quickly derive the next great new technical breakthrough, and he held the top scientific leaders themselves personally accountable to him, to see that it was done at all speed (Figure 1).

The Communists starved millions of Russian Kulaks to collectivize Soviet farming

"The destiny of communism has been frustrated by the U S development of the atomic bomb That is not the last great technical breakthrough The next one WILL be Soviet! You will provide me with that great new technical breakthrough at all speed, or I will have your heads Do I make myself dear, comrades?"

Simply put, Stalin placed the heads of the Soviet scientific leaders on the chopping block, since he was an absolute dictator and often killed or imprisoned those who opposed his instructions. To survive, the leaders of the Soviet Academy had to demand the utmost of their subordinates, because they themselves had to report their progress or lack of it to a dictator who would and did take swift action if they did not produce results. Thus, Stalin simply bypassed the usual scientific posturing and protracted delay so typical of our Western scientific bureaucracies.[5] If the Directors of the Russian scientific community dragged their feet and did not push his desired program to the limit, their heads would roll—and some did.

[4] At the Potsdam conference, after Truman informed him the U.S. had just exploded a great new explosive weapon, Stalin secretly called the head of his nuclear weapons program and ordered him to accelerate the Soviet nuclear weapons program.

[5] As a simple example, the U.S. National Academy of Sciences, National Research Council, National Academy of Engineering, and the National Science Foundation—and all the electrical engineering departments at all the universities in the U.S.—have not yet recognized that all EM circuits and systems are in fact powered by EM energy extracted directly from the seething local vacuum by the source charges and dipoles in the circuit or system, and particularly by the broken symmetry of the source dipole in the generator or other primary power source. They also have not yet solved the more than a century-old source charge problem, but continue to support engineering models assuming that the charge freely creates real EM energy out of nothing at all, in total violation of the conservation of energy law, and pours that created energy out, freely and continuously, to establish its associated fields and potentials and their energy reaching across the universe. The agencies thus unwittingly advocate perpetual motion machines on a scale unparalleled in history. They continue to support an electrical engineering model and a classical

As a result of Stalin's forceful intervention, the entire Soviet scientific community was galvanized into a most intensive review of all of physics. The scientists desperately sought to quickly uncover potential breakthrough areas that could be developed into the great leap forward that Stalin demanded. They had to have progress, and they had to have it rapidly.

One Institute Had 2,000 PhDs and a Full Support Staff

Large review institutions were quickly set up, staffed with the best Soviet scientists and support translators and teams. One such search institute involved some 2,000 Ph.Ds along with their support staffs. Soviet ships brought in shiploads of copies of all the scientific journals of the West—from the beginning—, and they were reviewed paper-by-paper, page-by-page. Anything novel and implying new scientific possibilities, or anything that had not been adequately followed up, was laid aside in a "select" pile for further review and decision by the best Soviet theoreticians available {11}.

One gets a new physics by discovering shortcomings and flaws in the old one. This intensive Russian search almost immediately uncovered the deep flaws in classical electrodynamics—flaws that have been propagated throughout most other branches of science. Classical electrodynamics (and electrical engineering) is particularly beset by hoary flawed foundations problems, dating from at least 1865. As an example, the equations did and still do assume a material ether, and they have since the beginning! Not a single equation was changed when the electrodynamics model which do not even model the active vacuum and its exchange with every charge, much less a broken symmetry in that exchange. So none of those agencies even knows what powers an electrical circuit, 45 years after the proof of broken symmetry was accomplished by Wu and her colleagues in 1957, and the Nobel Prize was then quickly awarded to Lee and Yang the very same year (1957) for predicting that broken symmetry revolution. In the modern view a charge is a dipolarity, when its vacuum interaction is considered. As a dipolarity, every charge exhibits the proven asymmetry of opposite charges, in its interaction with the active vacuum. The charge thus extracts and outpours real observable EM energy from the vacuum, freely and continuously, and it exhibits COP = oo. Those agencies—along with nearly all the rest of the U.S. scientific community—still naively assume that a COP>1.0 EM system (i) is impossible, (ii) is against the laws of nature, and (iii) is a forbidden perpetual motion machine. In nearly half a century since the discovery of the broken symmetry of opposite charges, those agencies have yet to apply that finding to electrical engineering and engineering curricula. Frankly, since they have dragged their collective feet for nearly a half century on extracting EM energy from the vacuum, what is needed is a Stalin to put his iron boot firmly to their posteriors and call their attention to it in language they cannot ignore. The pollution of the planet for energy purposes and the imminent oil and energy wars that will ravish the earth are directly due (i) to this inexplicable dogma upheld by the scientific community and (ii) to the community's continued falsehoods equating EM COP>1.0 to perpetual motion machines. The continuing failure to incorporate the active vactnun exchange—and its broken symmetry—into electrical engineering and classical electromagetics also poses an unacceptable threat to the continued survival of this nation.

Michelson-Morley experiments in the 1880s destroyed the material ether itself. The classical EM model also assumes a flat local spacetime (falsified by general relativity since 1915) and an inert vacuum (falsified in particle physics for several decades). It still assumes the same EM field in mass-free space as exists in mass—a non sequitur of major impact. Just to make the Maxwell-Heaviside equations easier to solve and avoid numerical methods, the totally arbitrary Lorentz symmetrical regauging[6] discards all EM systems far from equilibrium with their active vacuum environment. In fact, there is no "active vacuum environment" in the model, much less a broken symmetry in that exchange. Yet that very broken symmetry is exhibited by every charge and dipole {12}, and thus by every EM circuit and system. That asymmetry is involved in the continuously increasing giant negentropy poured out by every charge in the universe, thereby generating all EM fields and potentials and their energy, eventually reaching even across the universe, and with perfect macroscopic order and time duration as long as one wishes. Indeed, all electrodynamics is in total violation of the second law of thermodynamics, to any macroscopic size level and time duration desired.[7]

The terribly flawed electrodynamics model was completely overhauled by the Russian scientists very quickly, and the work was accomplished by some of the best nonlinear scientists in the world. Already present at the time were many things available to assist in dramatically extending {13} the hoary 1865 Maxwellian electrodynamics {6}. Gauge field theory was available since the turn of the 20th century, and the top theoreticians could readily see that something more than Abelian electrodynamics was firmly required in particle physics. The Yang-Mills {14} theory met that need in 1954 by originating non-Abelian gauge theory.

Situation in the Early 1950s

By 1950, Stalin's scientists had the beginnings of what they dubbed "energetics" {15,16}, which we would dub an "engineerable unified field theory" {17,18,19}. Longitudinal EM waves were primary {20,5} in that more fundamental approach. By the mid 1950s, one can pick out of the open literature {21} increasing incidences of prototype Russian energetics weapon testing around the world. In 1960, Khrushchev {22} spoke obliquely of these "fantastic new weapons" that were "just within the portfolio of the Soviet scientists," so to speak. Commercial aircraft sightings (Figure 2) and the reports of their captains and crews are also a particularly significant source of sightings of Russian energetics weapons tests, as are sightings by ships' crews (Figure 3) and ground observers (Figure 4).

[6] Actually a version of this symmetrical regauging was first performed by Ludwig Valentin Lorenz, "Ueberr die Identitat der Schwingungen des Lichts mit den elektrischen Stromen," Ann. Phys. Chem., Vol. 131, 1867, p. 243-263—only two years after Maxwell published his seminal theory in 1865. The paper is also published in English, as Ludwig Valentin Lorenz, "On the identity of the vibrations of light with electrical currents," Phil. Mag., Ser. 4, Vol. 34, 1867, p. 287-301. Unfortunately not much attention was paid to Lorenz's effort, since he independently derived electrodynamics. Decades later, when H. A. Lorentz also published symmetrical regauging of the Maxwell-Heaviside equations, he was given credit for it with no further mention of Lorenz. A proper historical summary of this has been given by J. D. Jackson and L. B. Okun, "Historical roots of gauge invariance," Rev. Mod. Phys., Vol. 73, July 2001, p. 663-680. This is an excellent coverage of the history of who actually did what and when, and who got credit for it.

[7] This dramatically extends the size regions (microscopic through colloidal) and the time durations (momentary to two seconds) where the second law is known and proven not to necessarily apply.

1963 Deployment and Immediate Use of Scalar Interferometers

The first huge scalar potential interferometers {23,24} of strategic range and power (Figure 5) were deployed by the Soviets in 1963, and one was used to kill the U.S.S. Thresher nuclear attack submarine (Figure 6), leaving clearly recognizable signatures {25}.

Since 1963, the Russians have had the equivalent of more than seven additional Manhattan Projects (using the Russian 5-year program instead of the 4-year Manhattan Project), back-to-back, in development of energetics weaponry. The energetics weapons have never been given to the regular Russian forces. Instead, all research, production, siting, manning, and employment are by the KGB and still under ruthless KGB control by die-hard communist factions {26}.

An Example of Russian Technology Astonishing Western Scientists

Some years ago, coordinating with a Western but non-US aerospace firm, I furnished the firm with the names and addresses of some Russian scientists in Moscow, since it was clear from their internet site that the scientists were on the fringes of the KGB energetics weapons program. An excellent European engineer fluent in Russian was sent in, several times. Several unusual things were demonstrated to him, including (i) transmitting enormous energy down a very thin wire, and (ii) cold molding, or turning metal into a liquid at room temperature, pouring it into a mold, and then letting it sit and harden. All without heating.

The engineer also closely questioned the Russian scientists about Russian . energetics weaponry, a subject the scientists were most reluctant to discuss. Finally they admitted the energetics weapons existed, and they actually obtained a meeting between the engineer and the KGB General who had directed the Soviet energetics weapon program for more than 20 years. In the meeting, the General coldly admitted the weapons, stated that "Of course you are not going to be allowed to see those!" and confirmed that somehow the Russians obtained everything the present author writes, as soon as he writes it {27}.

The engineer then brought the Russian scientists to his aerospace firm in that Western nation, where the scientists demonstrated cold molding to assembled scientists and some U.S. personnel. I forwarded a written explanation to the Western scientists of how the cold molding was performed technically. Later, on calling the engineer again, I discovered that the foreign authorities of that country had suddenly classified everything over there, and the engineer could no longer even talk to me without filing a Foreign Intelligence Contact Report. My own part in all this was completely open-source, pro bono, and I had already written of it openly and publicly.

Softening of Metal at a Distance Was One Effect Used Against the Challenger

At any rate, earlier I had openly advanced (and printed) the same mechanism, since it was the metal softening mechanism used by the KGB to kill the U.S. Challenger spacecraft in 1986. Publicly I had been resoundingly called a lunatic for advancing such a "preposterous" thesis. Nonetheless, metal softening by a distant LWI (longitudinal wave interferometer) was definitely utilized as part of the kill of the Challenger, as a close colleague here in the U.S. proved experimentally, detecting and demonstrating that metal-softening Russian signal prior to the kill of the Challenger. He amplified the signal and demonstrated on the bench its nearly instant softening of nails, rendering the nails momentarily as limp as wet noodles (Figure 7). Nails from the same box, not exposed to the signal, remained hard and could be hammered into a board. Not so the nails from the box that were exposed to the amplified Soviet signal! Those nails folded up like a wet noodle when tapped with a hammer, and could not be driven into a board.

Working unpaid with the foreign scientists, we had in fact obtained the "smoking gun" proving that this cold molding capability rigorously existed in the KGB inventory. Further, it had existed so long that the KGB had essentially declassified it so that the civilian Russian scientists seeking employment funds from the West could utilize it.

Energetics: Three Branches and a Strategic Deception Plan

The energetics weapons use exotic polarizations of EM waves, quantum potentials, and the "infolded" LW electrodynamics (both scalar and longitudinal photons) inside and comprising every "ordinary" transverse EM field and wave. The KGB energetic weapons are categorized (Figure 8) according to what they are targeted against:

(1) against inert matter, fields, and potentials etc., that branch of weapons is called by the same name, energetics weapons.

(2) Against living tissue, bodies, cells, biofields, biopotentials, etc., they are known as bioenergetic weapons. Disease-induction electrodynamics such as used to irradiate the U.S. Embassy in Moscow are examples of bioenergetic weapons.

(3) Against the mind, thought, memory, behavior, and the mind-body coupling mechanism, they are known as psychoenergetic weapons. Particularly in the latter mode, these weapons also use time-polarized (scalar) EM waves and time-polarized (scalar) photons as well {28}.

The KGB also implemented an elaborate and continuing deception plan, as is standard military practice for any great strategic attack plan. The KGB deception plan has been highly successful {29} in keeping the United States convinced that these weapons do not exist, and convinced that the standard strategic nuclear weapons possessed by the West are "leading" and "superior."

Strategic Attacks Scheduled and Why We Were Not Destroyed

Indeed, the West's nuclear weapons are inferior to Russian energetics weapons, particularly to the quantum potential weapons (Figure 9) deployed at the end of 1989 and to the newer "causal system" weapons deployed since the first of 1999, where functional robot systems (Figure 10) are made of nonmaterial spacetime curvatures and their dynamics only! In the event of a full strategic Russian energetics strike, an opening strike with quantum potential weapons {30} will dud all nuclear weapons on earth, all nuclear power systems, and all nuclear propulsion systems in about 10 minutes. This takes care of most of the U.S. strategic armament, within the first 10 minutes. The publicized strategic weapons of this nation have in my opinion been almost defenseless now for at least a full decade {31,32}, but I also believe that situation may be rapidly changing for the better.

A friendly little foreign nation does have such weapons including QP weapons that operate in multiply connected spacetime (MCS). That little nation has been responsible for our continued survival and has continued to deter the planned KGB strategic energetics strikes upon the West. There are indications (though still not certain) that at least one—and possibly two—other friendly Western nation also possesses such weapons.

Twice in 1997 alone we were within days of the scheduled total strategic destruction of the U.S. by die-hard KGB energetic weapons, with all-out strategic attacks actually scheduled in each case. The first attack was scheduled in latter February but was quickly countered. The attack was immediately rescheduled for May 1. The U.S. intelligence and scientific communities were apparently unaware of what was happening, and still do not believe it. However, as this author previously informed appropriate government agencies a few days prior to the attack scheduled for May 1, 1997, U.S. intelligence agencies certainly intercepted my urgent personal fax directly to the prime minister of the friendly little nation, urgently requesting that the "sane" command and control of the countering MCS/QP weapons be changed to "insane" control and spelling out the compelling reason why it was necessary.

In the insane weapons control mode, the computer periodically (say, every two hours) initiates launch sequence for the weapon, automatically. If any operating personnel remain alive on site, there is a designated short period in the sequence where the onsite personnel can countermand the order and abort the launch. If the order is not countermanded, the launch is not aborted and the "doomsday" weapon automatically fires. In that case, KGB military power and most of Russia would disappear from the face of the earth.

This was necessary to nullify the impending strikes of MindSnapper negative energy EMP weapons {33} on those critical friendly QP weapon sites to instantly kill all personnel on site. Strike by the MindSnapper instantly kills every living thing in the area, and a protracted contamination remains whereby the struck areas emit longitudinal EM waves. If one attempts to insert new crews to resume operation of the weapons, the crewmen sicken and then die in the entry attempt. First, increasingly severe interference between mind and body control occurs. Then the individuals waver, lose consciousness, go into seizures, and their minds gradually de-couple from their bodies and they die. Fortunately, alter my fax message the C3 system was changed to the insane mode, and the Russians were notified, just in the nick of time {34}. To prevent their own destruction by the certain insane counterstrike, the KGB aborted the looming strategic strikes.

Ironically, at about the very time that the KGB strategic armada was standing down, Secretary of Defense Cohen {35} was making the following statement in Georgia:

> "Others are engaging even in an eco-type of terrorism whereby they can alter the climate, set off earthquakes, volcanoes remotely through the use of electromagnetic waves...So there are plenty of ingenious minds out there that are at work finding ways in which they can wreak terror upon other nations...It's real, and that's the reason why we have to intensify our efforts."

Almost certainly Secretary Cohen had no knowledge that, so to speak, a great Sword of Damocles hanging over his head was being removed by a friendly little foreign nation at that very moment, as he uttered those words apparently referring to the older longitudinal EM wave interferometer weapons. I suspect that Dr. Cohen is to this day still unaware of the incidents that were ongoing at the time of his poignant statement.

Attempts to Alert the Nation

We alerted the President and the National Security Council as early as 1984 (Figure 54). In 1998 we also furnished selected Senators, Congresspersons, and certain high-level U.S. government agencies with color copies of a 200-page briefing and expose {36} of—among other things—these weapons, their testing, and their clandestine use against the U.S. since 1963. Because of the nearly 50 years of demonstrated induction of diseases {37, 38} (Figure 11) in personnel in the U.S. Embassy in Moscow (e.g., responsible for the deaths of three U.S. Ambassadors), we also included part of the briefing on the Priore work {39} (Figure 12) showing the remarkable cellular changes (time-reversal of diseased states back to a previous earlier healthy condition) that can be and had been experimentally induced by energetics under rigorous scientific controls.

Former U.S. Embassy in Moscow.

BACKGROUND

- Began in latter 1950s
- Discovered on VP Nixon's trip
- Initially thought to be nuclear radiation (Discovered w/Geiger counter?)
- High level target -- U.S. Ambassador
- Guarantees personal attention of:
  - U.S. Ambassador to USSR
  - U.S. President
  - NSA, CIA, DIA, NSC, etc.
  - Top consulting scientists
  - Leading U.S. scientific institutions
- Two U.S. Ambassadors died, another sickened
- Anomalous health changes in personnel, only in zero-field (zero potential gradient) areas!
- Four U.S. Presidents requested Soviets cease
  - Cut from 18 watts/sq cm to 2 Then again increased
- No one could understand what was going on
- Aluminum screens were placed over windows
- Moscow was declared a hazardous duty zone

The Responses

The responses—or more exactly the near total lack thereof—by various U.S. government agencies were enlightening. E.g., the National Institutes of Health (NIH) never let the package out of its Policy (i.e., political spin control) section. It did not check a single scientific reference on a proven method documented in the hard French scientific literature for reversing terminal cancer, infectious diseases, etc. Not a single scientist called me to discuss such a proven, revolutionary effect. Instead, the NIH Policy section simply shipped the package over to the DOD as "their problem, not ours." That was because the package also explained how the Gulf War Disease was induced, including how semen can cause infection of the wife, and how the structured body biopotential of the sickened veteran can induce similar structuring of the biopotentials of his children by proximity, thus inducing various aspects of the disease.

Effective Survival Treatment of Mass Casualties Could Be Developed

Meanwhile, we had uncovered a way to dramatically speed up the Priore healing process, and use only normal transverse EM radiations for ready adaptation of existing equipment, while still forcing the same time-reversal of diseased and damaged cells back to normal. Just much faster. This meant that very small, suitcase-sized treatment units (Figure 13) could now be developed in a reasonable time—e.g., in two to three years, given a high priority, intense effort, adequate funding, and a carefully chosen scientific team.

So, we proposed a crash development by DOD of a small, suitcase-size portable device for quick, mass treatment of mass U.S. casualties following terrorist attacks on our cities using weapons of mass destruction. Eventually an innocuous reply (forced by my congressman) simply stated "it was not supported by the literature." In the package, of course, I had specifically cited the numerous scientific papers in the French scientific literature reporting and proving the experimental results. I had also worked 14 years to decipher the mechanism actually performing the revolutionary healing accomplished in rigorous animal testing by the Priore team. Eleven years after suppression of the Priore effort, the University of Bordeaux, which had been pressured into rejecting Priore's doctoral thesis, did approve and publish a doctoral thesis by Perisse on the work {40}.

The National Science Foundation (NSF) did not reply at all. Yet at the time the official strategic threat to the United States listed WMD attack on our cities and great population centers as the greatest threat of all (Figure 14). Today, as everyone knows we are in a war after the terrorist attack on the twin towers in New York and on the Pentagon on September 11, 2001. The U.S. government clearly recognizes that it is not a matter of if additional attacks on the U.S. cities and populace will occur, but when. The terrorists are also known to have already infiltrated weapons of mass destruction such as biological warfare weapons (anthrax, smallpox, bubonic plague, etc.) Nonetheless, apparently the NSF simply did not believe a novel but rigorously demonstrated-in-the-1960s unorthodox process that could potentially save most of those millions of Americans who otherwise will surely die—and who are going to die in the first major WMD strike on our population centers.

The entire scientific method is based on assigning priority to experimental truth rather than dogmatic belief. If experiments refute the theory, the theory must be changed and the experimental results accepted. Else one is not following scientific method. Apparently the National Science Foundation does not follow scientific method, nor does it seem interested in doing so. Neither do the National Institutes of Health. The decisive results of some 2,000 rigorous animal experiments reported in the refereed scientific literature in leading French journals, by multiple established French scientists, were simply ignored because the results are contrary to present dogma. Meanwhile, four years have been lost. During that four years, the portable units could have already been developed, mass produced, and made available to treat and save millions of coming U.S. civilian casualties. Apparently the lives of those Americans are not as important as maintaining the present medical dogma. When those millions do die—and they will—we shall most certainly remind those agencies of the caliber of their dedication to scientific method and of their service to their fellow Americans. In my personal view, ignoring a chance to save so many Americans is treason of a very special kind.

The Official Silence Was Deafening

Not a single scientist in any of those and other organizations seems to have taken the package seriously. Not one called me to discuss it, or apparently studied the references, etc. No one asked for a personal briefing. No one was interested in the actual photo of the strike of a Russian EM missile from a scalar interferometer, offset from a U.S. night shuttle launch (Figure 15) from Cape Canaveral in latter November 1985, or the photo of the actual registration point ball of light high in the air (Figure 16) over that same shuttle launch {41}. The same weapon then killed the Arrow DC-8 at Gander, Newfoundland about two weeks later (Figure 17). An eyewitness (or more than one) actually observed the streak of light from the sky that struck the Arrow DC-8 in the right fuselage ahead of the engines {42,43}, after the thrust of the engines were reduced during take-off by use of a negative energy (cooling) interferometer. A similar ball of light associated with the kill of a Titan missile fired from Vandenberg AFB in early 1986 {44} and printed in Aviation Week & Space Technology magazine, was also apparently of no concern.

These remarks are intended to show the lack of understanding that has existed in our governmental, scientific, and intelligence communities of what energetics is and of the great energetics superweapons that have been developed. With the present rapidly growing interest in longitudinal EM waves, however, we suspect that such lack of understanding is now no longer the case. We certainly hope that is true, and we are much encouraged that at least one—and possibly two—friendly Western nations now possess quantum potential weapons.

The Long Dry Spell in Correcting Electrodynamics May Be Slowly Ending

In over 20 years of unrelenting effort, until 1999 we were unable to get any significant Western scientists of real "horsepower" (e.g., in non-Abelian electrodynamics, foundations errors in electrodynamics, advanced gauge field theory, general relativity, etc.) to meticulously examine conventional U(1) electrodynamics and its glaring errors, and to look at weapons implications of higher group symmetry electrodynamics.

Beginning about three years ago, however, a noted scientist, Dr. Myron Evans {45,2}, along with other theoretical scientists of the Alpha Institute's Institute of Advanced Study (AIAS), have been extending electrodynamics by developing the 0(3) electrodynamics. They also have deeply examined the Whittaker work of 1903 and 1904 on which the early part of the Russian energetics weapons are based {24}.

The AIAS analyses, and subsequent papers by Dr. Evans and Alex Labounsky as well as by the entire AIAS group, have clearly established the primary importance of time-like precursors of EM fields, operating in massfree spacetime where fields E and B cannot exist. These time-like precursors create all the rest of the conventional electrodynamic entities {46}. This is a dramatic extension to electrodynamics and physics across the board. More than 100 papers have been produced to date, with more than thirty published in journals such as Foundations of Physics, and many of the others are either accepted or still in the referee process with various journals. Some 60 of the papers were published as a single special edition of the Journal of New Energy (JNE) in latter 1999, and a second edition of Modern Nonlinear Optics, Wiley, 2001 has been published with many important papers.

However, the problem is that the scientific community, which is strongly committed to "business as usual", has funded none of this work. The conventional lead agencies of the community are still in the "ostrich position", with their heads buried very firmly in the sand with respect to the terrible damage they continue to enforce on this nation by their continued perpetuation of an old, long-archaic, inadequate electrodynamics and electrical engineering.

Engineerable Unified Field Theory Is Now Clearly Appearing

The rapidly emerging AIAS extension of electrodynamics has "met in the middle" with Sachs' {4} revolutionary generalization of general relativity and electrodynamics. For the first time, an engineerable unified field theory—employing 0(3) electrodynamic means—is now being produced. The AIAS work in 0(3) electrodynamics was shown to be an important subset of Sachs' approach. It also now provides the full, rigorous theoretical foundation and model for the Priore mechanisms and results.

We also comment most strongly that the important SU(2)xSU(2) electrodynamics as developed by Barrett (47) leads to essentially the same conclusions, since Barrett's electrodynamics is homomorphic with 0(3) electrodynamics. Barrett, of course, is one of the pioneers of ultrawideband radar—another scientific area that was fiercely opposed and suppressed by the orthodox U.S. establishment for some time. Ironically, today those very scientists who were so dogmatic in their vociferous condemnation of UWB radar, have assumed the mantle of "experts in the UWB field", sometimes even taking credit for having "advanced it" in the first place.

Examples of Some Major Non Sequiturs in Conventional Electrodynamics

In every textbook and millions of technical papers in the West, electrodynamicists routinely calculate the "magnitude of the scalar potential". Actually, not a single one—including Maxwell—calculated or calculates the magnitude of the potential itself. Instead, they universally calculate the reaction cross section of the potential at a point occupied by an assumed intercepting/collecting unit point static charge {48}. At best that is a representation of the intensity of the field at each point. The reaction cross section of the potential with a fixed unit point static charge is indeed a scalar value. The "scalar" potential itself, on the other hand, is not its own reaction cross-section at each point of itself, and it is not a scalar entity at all! Instead, it is a harmonic bundle of bidirectional EM longitudinal phase conjugate wavepairs, as shown by E. T. Whittaker in 1903 {49}. It is and always has been a multi-vectorial, multiwave entity. By slightly reinterpreting Whittaker's work to agree with quantum field theory, the scalar potential is also a circulation of EM energy from the time domain to 3-space and back to the time domain, at every point in space that is occupied by the potential.

Further, the "field" notion is utilized in two self-contradictory manners. On the one hand, it is assumed in the massless reaches of space, and on the other hand it is assumed in mass, which is the only case in which a force field is properly defined.[8] The so-called "electromagnetic field" existing in empty space is not an EM force field at all, but a curvature or curvatures of spacetime with assorted ilynamics. Spacetime is after all active, and being active means curvatures and ilynamics. As rigorously shown by the AIAS theoreticians, what exists in spacetime—before the force-fields appear on reacting charged mass—are time-like and longitudinal scalar potentials and fluxes. These "pre-EM field" entities in fact interact with mass to produce all the force fields (the electromagnetic fields). Mass is a component of force; simply by F == *d*p/dt, which is expanded into F = d(mv)/dt, which is ma + v*(dm/dt).* Note that both terms have mass as a component. Hence there is no force or forcefield when mass is absent. Present mechanics is seriously wrong (and has been wrong for hundreds of years) in assuming a separate massless force acting upon a separate mass.

[8] Since Maxwell and the original pioneers believed in a material ether filling all space, to them there was not a single point anywhere in the universe that was devoid of mass. Hence to them there was only one kind of field: the kind that exists in mass.

Jackson, one of the ablest classical electrodynamicists of our day, adroitly states how electrodynamicists skirt that issue. Quoting, p. 249 of his Classical Electrodynamics, second edition: "Most classical electrodynamicists continue to adhere to the notion that the EM force field exists as such in the vacuum, but do admit that physically measurable quantities such as force somehow involve the product of charge and field."

Our comment is that one does not get an observable until after the interaction of a cause with a previous effect, to provide a change (a new effect). The 4-cause itself—in this case the field that actually exists in the vacuum—is never observed nor is it observable. Its effect (force with an affected observable mass as a component of it) is observed. The field in space and the field in matter thus do not even have the same fundamental units, but differ by a factor of m. In electrodynamics the m is avoided by "defining" the field as force per unit coulomb of "charge" (without saying or accounting "charged mass").

Wide Confusion of Cause and Effect

Present electrodynamics (and even the hoary old mechanics, as pointed out) has thoroughly confused the causal (4-space) side of the observation process with the effects (3-space) side—observation yields 3-spatial entities, not 4-spatial. Indeed, as is well known, time is not observable, even in theory. That is really because observation is a d/dt process applied by the 3-space intermediary (e.g., mass) being acted upon by the causal (4-space) entity in spacetime, to produce a change in that intermediary (3-spatial) that results (is observed). A priori, the output of the observation process does not even exist in time, since its fundamental units are LLL and not LLLT. The observation process is thus d/dt(LLLT) => LLL.

Further, electrodynamics omits the fact that, not only does the causal entity act upon the intermediary to produce the effect (changes to the intermediary), but those changes (effects) also act back (in reverse) through the intermediary to produce changes in the causal entity itself. This mutual interaction between cause and effect (but never stressed in exactly that manner) is well known in GR, where the curvature of spacetime acts upon mass-energy to change it, and the resulting change in mass-energy also acts back upon spacetime to curve it. The omission of the latter "back reaction" in EM theory by Maxwell resulted in omitting half the energy, half the wave, and half the causal entity in spacetime, as well as half the effect. The missing half of the effect appears as the Newtonian third law reaction, which in electrodynamics is just mystically "assumed" to be an effect without a cause.

The vast importance of restoring this missing "back action of effect upon cause" is because it can be deliberately utilized to directly engineer the causal (4-space) state itself, producing nonmaterial "engines" and unobservable functioning robot systems comprised entirely of curvatures of spacetime and their dynamics. Such "causal system robots" (CSRs) can be designed and engineered to then perform almost any desired action upon normal mass systems they encounter. The robots also can easily penetrate vast depths of mass, which is mostly empty space filled with potentials, fields and waves—all of which are just bundles of longitudinal EM waves and their dynamics. "Mass" is actually a vast superhighway through which such CSRs can easily move at the speed of light {50}.

CSRs: Engineering the Unobserved Causal Side To Create Functional Systems

Understanding early on the mutual interaction between cause and effect that existed in their energetics, the Russians were able to engineer this totally new kind of system: the causal system robot or CSR (Figure 10). With sufficient theoretical development, one can "work backwards" by adroitly re-engineering the effect to obtain a desired causal system (spacetime curvature set along with its impressed dynamics; (Figure 18) corresponding to some physical system and its changes one desires to engender. One thereby directly creates a deterministic set of spacetime curvatures and impressed dynamics, which we call an "engine" (Figure 18). This ST curvature engine system can then function as a completely separate system {51} (Figure 10). One can communicate with it via longitudinal EM waves, control it, etc. By building in scalar interferometry functions, the CSR can be given "weapons" capabilities, etc.

- All levels of energy structures and all levels of time structures mold spacetime geometry.
- The "pattern" is called a template for a vacuum engine (spacetime curvature engine).
- Spatial and temporal structurings of the engine act upon mass at all levels.
- This produces a template of forces, for precise translations and stresses within the mass at all levels. The forces exist in both time and 3-space.

STRUCTURING OF ACTIVE SPACETIME CURVATURES
DYNAMIC MASS

Figure 18 The principle of general relativity extended to include the concept of the vacuum engine.

In theory such a CSR can be assembled to perform any desired function or complex of functions upon matter, fields, potentials, etc. that is desired. In short, one can build real, functioning "infolded" (subspace) robot weapon systems using this "backward engineering of spacetime itself process. The huge underground facilities (hundreds) that the Russians continued to build after the collapse of the Soviet economy and the fall of the Soviet Union, apparently contained the full CSR development and control facilities as well as the operational systems employed for this totally new kind of weapon system.

A great engineering of the future lies in engineering CSRs, which already constitute a great leap forward past the material nanobot technology being pursued in the West.

Making the First CSR is Extremely Difficult; Making a Million Copies Is Easy

The development of a specific CSR with a specific set of functions is akin to developing a highly complex software system of major proportions (several tens of millions of lines of code). The job is extremely difficult, and tortuous "debugging" is required for a lengthy period. Once a single CSR is completed and debugged, however, the production of thousands or even many millions of copies is then a trivial task.

The CSR may be visualized as a sort of vast complex of longitudinal EM waves (recall, we are speaking of ST curvatures, not the conventional EM waves thought to operate on a flat spacetime. All EM waves operate in a curved spacetime a priori, as clearly shown by Sachs). It turns out that all matter is mostly empty space, filled with potentials and fields. Space itself, considering its energetics, may be taken as a giant scalar potential. All those potentials and fields and waves are in fact nothing but sets of longitudinal EM waves and dynamics. In short, they are vast superhighways for the travel of CSRs and the propagation of longitudinal EM waves.

A CSR can be embedded within any kind of EM potential, wave, or field. So to replicate one, one embeds it in a magnetic signal and records that signal on a diskette or other media. Then one makes millions of copies of the diskette, for perhaps 10 cents or less each. Or do it en masse, by first completing a CD-ROM with a hundred or two hundred CSRs embedded in its signals (Figure 19). Then simply reproduce the CD-ROM. Every reproduction has another hundred or two exact duplicates of those CSRs, made for almost no cost at all. With communications built into the CSRs, the command and control facilities take charge of them, give them individual numbers or designations, and a robot armada emerges with most unusual capabilities indeed.

The puzzling underground facilities in Russia (which our fellows apparently never deciphered and which remained a mystery) apparently contained the scientific teams, the research and development facilities, the production facilities, and the command and control facilities for the new vast CSR weapon complex. It was to see its first great employment at the end of 1999.

In 1999 The KGB Deployed Massive Numbers of CSRs for a Strategic Attack

In latter 1999 the KGB began massively deploying these CSRs of various types throughout the Western world, particularly including the United States. They simply sent the CSRs back "inside" the potentials and fields and waves being emitted from radio stations, TV stations, power lines, satellites, communications systems, inside matter, etc. These CSRs were deployed and infiltrated in major command posts and installations throughout the U.S. and its allies. True to form, the KGB even "stimulated" some major computer systems in critical U.S. government facilities by having the robots "surface" some effects on the Computers, right through the firewall programs (whose EM signals and operations indeed provided nice superhighways for the robots). Our fellows detected the interference as a "sophisticated computer hacking attack" (puzzlingly from the Russian Academy of Science), and then the robots "submerged" again after deliberately performing actions to produce obvious changes and guarantee the U.S. detection of those changes. The purpose of this "stimulus and probe" was to see if the U.S. was aware of CSRs and CSR technology. We clearly showed we were not, and we still are not aware of them. Further, the entire government apparatus—including all our vaunted national laboratories—knows absolutely nothing at all about CSRs, and none of the laboratories believe it. That is the same posture they've been in with respect to energetics weapons for a half-century. Apparently they will be in that same posture for another half century, left to their own devices.

However, I was not allowed to remain a casual onlooker for this new CSR armada! The KGB also planned to use me as a stimulus to ping the government yet another way, and then assess the government's response.

Here in Huntsville, suddenly I was personally struck by such a CSR right from my computer monitor, with the attack riding through the light from the monitor to my eyes and retinas and right into the brain and nervous system (Figure 20). This was the type of CSR that can lurk in any potential or field inside a computer, and then strike and kill the operator looking at the screen. The CSR took over control of the machine, split the screen so that only one-inch horizontal strips were luminous—one at the top and the other at the bottom of the screen with the middle dark. These two separated horizontal strips allowed scalar interferometry via the inner LWs comprising the light from the two strips. The LWI signals crossed in my vision center, where suddenly ordinary EM signals and waves were produced by the scalar interferometry occurring there.

Stimulating apparently the only analyst capable of recognizing a CSR attack and connecting it with the scheduled giant strategic CSR attack.

KGB General commanding the energetics weapon previously confirmed that what this analyst writes on his computer is received as soon as he writes it. Apparently accomplished by Tempest techniques or directly by energetics.

I saw rapid blinding flashes like a hundred flashbulbs exploding at once right in my face. However, the signals representing those "flashes" were being created right there in my vision center. An external camera would have recorded only the weirdly separated screen display. It would not have shown the brilliant flashes of light I was seeing, unless it was set up stereoscopically. The strike was deliberately sustained for only about 10 seconds so as to be severe but nonlethal; about 30 seconds would be totally lethal. Violent fibrillation of the heart also resulted explosively, and I was instantly hypnogogic and seriously weakened by sudden hypoxia from near total lack of blood pumping (because of the fibrillation). The purpose was apparently to strike the only analyst in the U.S. who would recognize what the nature of the attack was, stimulate him, watch him try to notify the government, and then observe the government's reaction. It look four days to recover from the strike. But I knew immediately what had made the strike, and that I had been hit with a CSR weaponized by having a built-in scalar interferometry capability. It was also a very sophisticated CSR, as it showed by assuming complete "intelligent" control of my computer's functions.

When I finally recovered, I did notify the government and warn them of CSRs, exactly as anticipated by the KGB. As might be expected, the government's total disbelief and lack of reaction clearly showed they knew nothing of CSRs. They simply did not believe such weapons existed or even could exist. Sadly, once again one faced the "not invented here" syndrome. General relativity and its provision for spacetime curvatures and their associated dynamics (engines) operating back upon mass are apparently just supposed to remain a theoretical curiosity. Why, obviously no scientist in his right mind would think of weaponizing such!

A more correct answer is, "Like hell they wouldn't!" American scientists would not think of it, but Russian scientists with their national chess-playing psychology will immediately seize upon any opportunity—even many moves ahead in the game—and develop it and utilize it. They understand and use the boa constrictor. We only understand and use the immediate rattlesnake.

How the Asymmetrically Deployed Strategic Attack Was Stopped in Its Tracks

However, we also alerted the "little nation" that has advanced EM weapons technology, which—since early 1997—has been saving the U.S. by forcing the abortion of impending KGB energetics weapons attacks.

When I warned them in 1997 about the MindSnapper weapons and mind-control weapons used against Captains Button and Svoboda, unknown to me at the time they later reacted and suddenly destroyed those facilities in Russia (apparently with violent scalar interferometry strikes). So that mind-control type of attack being readied for 1999 was thwarted for a few years by these strikes sometime prior to mid-1998.

But to return to the CSRs. In the latter quarter of 1999, the Russians were developing and deploying throughout the West numerous kinds of CSRs. So the period at the end of 1999/first few days of 2000 attack was already scheduled for a massively programmed CSR attack. It was designed to cripple the entire nation, and perhaps even collapse it economically, yet all would be blamed on Y2K! Our scientific ignorance guaranteed that we would blame it on something mundane that our scientists could understand: Y2K problems in all the old software programs running so much of our automated systems, communications, and centralized functioning, accounting, banking, etc. In short, the KGB planned to give us a bicentennial gift: a Y2K nightmare far beyond our wildest fears.

After my recovery from the CSR strike in the latter quarter of 1999, I again urgently alerted the friendly nation of the development of CSRs and their widespread deployment—and informed them of the personal attack on me and specifically why it was made nonfatal. Of course I also alerted our own government. We were scheduled for a real Y2K problem that would curl one's hair, so to speak, with everything imaginable failing—and probably all blamed on Y2K.

Admirably, beginning just at the end of 1999, the friendly nation simply began methodically and massively cleaning out all the CSRs, and they disposed of them in very short order! Such CSR systems[9] may easily be located and destroyed by strategic longitudinal EM wave weapons {52}, when and if one has the longitudinal EM wave technology sufficiently developed. So Y2K came and went with only a few relatively minor incidents from the normal Y2k problems expected.[10]

However, unknown to our scientists and intelligence community, a great war of a very special kind—the Earth's first strategic subspace war—had just been silently fought and won, right there inside our power systems, command and control systems, major weapon systems, electrical power systems, electrical control systems of our nuclear submarines and strategic bombers and missiles, even inside the electronics of our nuclear warheads, etc. And not a bobble showed on the surface, anywhere. This was the first real "subspace" war, where weapons made of pure spacetime curvatures and dynamics were involved as the main offensive battle systems. LWI destruction of numerous CSRs inside potentials and fields in various electronic equipment throughout the nation, created little or no overt signs at all.

This time we won, thanks to the "good guys" and not to our own scientific community. Next time we may not be so fortunate.

The Mostly-Ignored Time-Energy Interaction

For some inexplicable reason, physicists in the West have omitted one-half the actual photon interaction.[11] If one allows the spatial energy component of the photon to interact, then one must also account for the simultaneous interaction of the time-component of the photon. A mass m absorbing a photon (ΔE)(Δt) becomes masstime (m+dm)t, not mass m. Mass m and masstime mt are as different as are force F and impulse Ft. No scientist in his right mind would ignore the t in Ft and consider just the force F. Yet that exact kind of giant faux pas has been done for many decades now in the photon interaction. And it is still ubiquitously done in physics. Mass does not emit photons; masstime does. Again, physicists confuse effect and cause.

[9] These early CSRs apparently had no "stealth" capabilities built-in, so they were easily detected and destroyed, rather like shooting fish in a rain barrel.

[10] Even so, a normally disastrous Y2K problem was narrowly averted, in the nick of time, by a concerted national software reprogramming effort massively mounted and costing billions of dollars. Otherwise, the expected "ordinary" Y2K problem would have been very bad indeed.

As the Russian energetics weapon scientists know full well, time is actually spatial energy compressed enormously, by at least the factor c^2. Hence time has at least the equivalent energy density of mass. The greatest amount of "energy" existing in a photon—particularly in lower frequency photons—is in that "time" part that is arbitrarily ignored and discarded. An ELF photon has enormously more total energy—by many orders of magnitude—than does a gamma ray photon.

Energy and time components in the photon are canonical. Low frequency photons are reduced in the magnitude of their spatial energy component and thereby maximized in their time components. For the ordinary (decompressed) energy equivalency of the time component, one must multiply the time in seconds by c^2. Halving the frequency, e.g., doubles the time component, whose spatial equivalent energy is now $(2t)\times(c^2)$. With respect to the original photon, the new total energy (achieved by halving the frequency) is given by $[(\Delta E)/2] \times [(2\Delta t) \times c^2] = [(\Delta E)(\Delta t)\times c^2]$. So halving the photon's frequency increases its total energy by a factor of c^2, which is approximately by a factor of 9×10^{16}. Hence photons actually carry enormously greater total energy (most is locked up as time) at low frequency than at high frequency. Indeed, the highest energy photon interactions in the universe are at low frequency, if and when a transduction of the available time-energy into spatial energy occurs.

This has been completely missed in the West, but not by the Russian energetics weapons scientists. They have been engineering that formidable new high energy but low frequency physics—a physics far more energetic than that used in our most energetic colliding beams in "conventional high energy physics".

The cold fusion processes[12] stumbled onto by Western scientists are using the

[11] I.e., except for accounting for the overall "action" (angular momentum) and such things as minimum action theorems, etc. Treating the photon's increment of time specifically as a formidably compressed piece of spatial EM energy does not appear in Western physics. It has long been utilized in the KGB's secret energetics weapon science.

time-energy component of photon interactions, to generate enormous localized EM energy directly upon the interior quarks and gluons of nucleons {53}. We worked out a speculative explanation of the active time-energy transduction mechanisms that fits all the experimental phenomena, including the eerie instrument anomalies occurring in rigorous electrolyte experiments at China Lake for some years. That is included in my new book, Energy from the Vacuum: Concepts and Principles, Cheniere Press, Santa Barbara, CA, 2002, available from www.cheniere.org.

Of course consistency alone does not prove it conclusively; consistency is a necessary but not sufficient condition for proof. But at least the proposed explanation is consistent, and nothing else seems to be, at this time. In one chapter in my referenced new book we do cover the cold fusion mechanism and give specific new nuclear reactions producing the excess deuterium, tritium, and alpha particles in so many successful cold fusion experiments worldwide.

My "time-reversal zone" approach is stringent, because the recent work by Denis Evans et al. {54} has clearly shown that reactions can and do run in reverse—totally in violation of the second law of thermodynamics—at micron (colloidal) level in size and for up to two seconds in duration (and sometimes even a little longer). So experimental demonstration that the "time reversal zones" I assumed can and do indeed occur has now been accomplished by Evans et al. This provides strong experimental and theoretical support for the basic assumption (of the formation and momentary existence of localized time reversal zones that subsequently decay) we used to derive the fundamental cold fusion mechanism including some of the specific reaction equations for excess deuterium, tritium, and alpha particles now demonstrated in hundreds of successful experiments.

In a reversed zone the law of attraction and repulsion of charges is reversed, so that like charges attract—sometimes so closely that each enters the strong force region of the other, forming a quasi-nucleus (Figure 21). As the time-reversal zone subsequently decays back to a time-forward zone, the reduced strong force is restored much faster than the Coulomb force is reduced and then reversed back to normal. So during this readjustment decay process, the quasi-nucleus will simply change to an isomer and a known nucleus by quark-flipping to change an H+ ion to a neutron. Note that the "reversal zone" momentarily changes the Coulomb barrier—always the only thing that has really prevented chemical fusion and transmutation at low spatial energy—to a Coulomb attractor. Hence cold fusion—as now backed up by more than 600 successful experiments worldwide, by multiple laboratories and researchers in multiple nations—is an established fact and a herald for a vast new science based on deliberate and intentional reversal of the Coulomb barrier and use of time-energy.

With its usual perspicacity, the organized U.S. scientific community has flubbed it—and flubbed it badly—with respect to cold fusion. Its contribution has largely been a tirade of ad hominem attacks, slander, and libel of a viciousness seldom seen in the annals of science. Once again, the community is far more devoted to defending its cherished dogma (and its own rice bowls from the conventional Big Nuclear Science that cold fusion thoroughly upsets), than it is in applying scientific method which calls for believing the experiments and changing the dogmatic theory.

Development of Threats and Scheduled Attacks Aborted

KGB energetics weapons have long constituted our single most pressing yet largely unrecognized national security problem. That problem has also increased with the growing development and deployment of such weapons by other nations such as China. Some 10 nations, for example, now have scalar interferometry weapons, and even the Japanese Yakuza has them and also has their own secret facilities for producing them in Japan, including small portable units developed for use in assassination and terrorist type warfare within a targeted nation—the United States of America.

Unknown to our government, we narrowly escaped destruction twice in the first half of 1997 from scheduled all-out strategic KGB energetics weapons attacks. Only the actions of a friendly small country countered the attacks and caused the KGB to abort on each occasion.

When the second scheduled Russian strategic attack was aborted just prior to May 1, 1997, a new KGB counter-counter for the friendly counter used by the little nation in latter April 1997 was already rapidly being deployed. The new Russian counter-counter—seizure and control of the mind of an operator at a distance, and complete control of his actions while he performs sophisticated technical tasks—was tested in two separate incidents {55}, first on Captain Button (Figure 22, Figure 23) and then on Captain Svoboda about two months later (Figure 24), each flying an A-10 Warthog aircraft over the U.S.

The highly successful test against Captain Button (Figure 22, Figure 23) is particularly significant, as we have explained. Captain Button was controlled while performing highly technical operations, for more than a full hour, and one hour was apparently the acceptance test specification. Captain Svoboda (Figure 24) simply had her mental perception of up and down instantly reversed while climbing her A-10 warthog from low level ordnance delivery on target. Erroneously perceiving she was diving, she immediately "corrected" sharply to "climb", thereby diving headlong into the ground and perishing in the resulting explosion of her aircraft.

Svoboda's kill demonstrated a tactical destruction usage, whereas Button's test demonstrated a strategic hostile usage of the adversary's defending weapons crew to take action against the adversary's defending strategic weapons system. A new KGB strategic energetics attack against the United States—using the mind control (psychoenergetics) weaponry to take over the operators of the little nation's QP weapon sites and stand the sites back down for maintenance—was rescheduled apparently for latter 1997 to mid-1998 or so. It appears that the extensive preparations for that attack were totally destroyed clandestinely and very suddenly by the friendly little nation some time after we warned them, as we mentioned above.

However, still another Russian counter—the development of "weaponized engines" (functioning causal system robot weapons, "infolded electromagnetic" in form) consisting of organized and functioning systems of spacetime curvatures operating in and traveling through EM fields, potentials, waves, and signals—came on line (Figure 10, Figure 18). The KGB simply altered the attack plan for a Millennium Strike and completed the forward deployment of these eerie new CSR systems by introducing millions of them directly throughout U.S. facilities, command centers, weapon systems, power grids, ships, aircraft, submarines, missiles, nuclear warheads, computers, communications systems, etc.

We estimate that several million such systems were introduced in that manner, and readied for the Millennium Strike. The United States and its allies were and are almost totally unprepared for this dramatically new kind of strategic warfare that has been developed and deployed against us. No such weapons have previously existed in history. Consequently our national survival and the survival of our allies was once again at stake—and right on schedule during the critical period from mid-1999 through mid-2000 that we had predicted back in 1997.

The die-hard elements of the KGB indeed had a new millennium gift for us, but it was not at all the kind of gift we would appreciate. The KGB is not a monolith! This plot apparently did not include Putin, and it did not include the rest of the KGB, particularly that element reporting to Putin.

Live Destructive Tests Over and Near the U.S. Have Continued

Without elaboration, we believe that the Learjet crash incident and the EA-990 crash incident may have been very sophisticated tests of these new robotic causal EM systems. We also believe that the long years of Russian construction of over a thousand mysterious underground facilities, even though the Russian economy was collapsed and the citizens and soldiers were destitute, is significant. Those facilities apparently contain the set of command and control systems for this vast new strategic weapon system.

The facilities also include the "factories" where the CSRs are made, because the factories are unlike any other factories ever conceived. They do not build "physical" systems, but something more like "software." Only now the "software program" itself is an independent robotic system, with a full set of weapon systems functions, and capable of independent navigation and functioning anywhere, while remaining under KGB command and control via longitudinal EM wave communications infolded inside the potentials of earth, ocean, and space. The facilities also contain the operational forces, headquarters, and communication and control systems that maintain, deploy, and employ (fight) these CSR systems, and direct the battle.

The purpose of the 1998 document we sent to DoD—which did not include the causal robot system armadas later deployed throughout everything in the West—was to inform selected members of the Senate and Congress of the energetics threat situation and summarize it for them. Accordingly, we presented the background of the development and testing of the KGB energetics weapons since WW II, in some detail, for selected Legislators and their staffs. We also included some specifics on the failure of the U.S. scientific community to keep American science and technology abreast of that of our adversaries.

The Scientific Basis For Energetics Weapons Is Established

As pointed out above, the scientific basis for our early use of Soviet scalar EM interferometry is now rigorously established by work accomplished by the Alpha Foundation's Institute of Advanced Study. It is also rather "old hat" now that all major weapons labs have discovered longitudinal EM waves and are actively working on and with them. The Director of the AIAS, Dr. Myron Evans, is an eminent scientist and theoretician with over 600 papers in the hard science literature. He and his colleagues also have had zero funding for their work on the higher group symmetry electrodynamics necessary to understand such things as energetics. A combination of non-Abelian electrodynamics, advanced gauge field theory, and the impact of E. T. Whittaker's work shortly after the turn of the century has shown that scalar interferometry is real, and that weapons based on scalar interferometry can be a potent threat on the battlefield. The time-like (time-energy) basis for electrodynamics is now clearly established.

With this important new work, we are now only some 40 years behind the Russian weapons scientists! But we are beginning to close the gap—and hopefully that will be done very rapidly.

In 1999 after being personally attacked by a CSR, I again contacted the office of the leader of the friendly small nation and again furnished all the information we possess on the new CSR systems programmed by the KGB as a countering method against the small nation's QP weapons. The outcome was that the little nation destroyed the CSRs in time, as we stated above. We were lucky that (i) the KGB did attack me with one of the weapons, deliberately to "get my strong and immediate attention", and (ii) deliberately did not kill me with the strike. Otherwise, there would have been no warning to the little nation, and the U.S. and its allies would have experienced a "Y2K" problem worse than their wildest fears, possibly collapsing the economy of the United States and much of the developed world.

Our Situation Here In the U.S. Is Precarious

Meanwhile, our own scientific community apparently does little or nothing in these areas, except to castigate, slander and libel anyone daring to suggest that such "out of the box" weapons areas even exist. E.g., there does not appear to be a single U.S. scientist who knows how to create a time-polarized EM wave.[13] There do not seem to be any concerted programs to deal with t-polarized photons and t-polarized EM waves. Our scientists still firmly believe that one has to propagate spatial EM field energy through space to affect a target electromagnetically, when that was obsoleted by Russian "subspace EM longitudinal wave propagation" weapon systems deployed as early as 1963, and was completely obsoleted by deployment of quantum potential weapons in 1989.

Yet a close colleague of the present author has single-handedly developed and demonstrated prototype superluminal communication systems using the infolded (longitudinal EM wave) electrodynamics, and these systems would have been heading onto the market in latter 2001 except for the sudden bankrupting of the major backing company. There has not been any funding forthcoming for his revolutionary work, but only clumsy attempts to take it from him. It is my fear that the further clumsy takeover attempts will be successful, and this desperately needed technology will never see the light of day in defense of our nation. As a single example without further discussion, his work revolutionizes the present notions used in the rapid development of quantum communication and quantum computing, because it revolutionizes the very notion of the Q-bit, completely removing the statistics of the quantum state and making it engineerable. This of course is completely counter to present QM notions, but is consistent with the Bohm hidden variable approach to quantum mechanics.

Meanwhile, our own weapon scientists apparently still do not recognize the possibility of a superluminal longitudinal EM wave communication system, and appear to have no motivation or intention to develop such. This is in a way quite sad; quantum tunneling at more than four times the speed of light, of a clearly recognizable Mozart symphony, has already been demonstrated in a section of a waveguide {56}. Whatever one wishes to call it and however one wishes to do it, superluminal communication of intelligible signals has been clearly demonstrated in the laboratory. For the "infolded" longitudinal EM waves, all the "normal" or "envelope" EM waves, potentials, and fields are just great superwaveguides for such longitudinal EM wave "tunneling through subspace" at superluminal speeds.

[13] Keeping one's sense of humor, apparently there has also not been a U.S. scientist who even recognized and knew what actually powered an electrical circuit, until our solution to the source charge problem and publication of it in 1998. Eerily, even after the technical basis for a solution had been proven in particle physics in 1957, no one seemed to have applied the broken symmetry of opposite charges to the common dipole and to a dipolarity such as a scalar potential and a charge (with its associated virtual charges of opposite sign, in the modern view). Everyone accepted that the fields and potentials and their energy are established by their associated source charges, but no one had stated that the source charge receives its input energy from its asymmetry in its seething energy exchange with the active vacuum.

The Dominant Weapons Are Quantum Potential Weapons

Full-bore deployment of Russian quantum potential weapons occurred by the end of 1989, the first lab prototype weapon having been tested in April 1986 against the U.S. air attack on Libya (Figure 25). Beside Russia, two other nations—Brazil and the "little friendly nation"—also had developed quantum potential {57} weapons. The United States did not develop them, or at least apparently not just yet.

Burlier this year (2002), China also deployed QP weapons, and we now find that an*other friendly* nation has them as well. That brings the total to five, as of this writing. Two of those are friendly, and a third is astraddle of the fence, so to speak. The other two are Russia (the KGB) and China.

At this point China could go either way, so it represents a future enigma. China has control of the Panama Canal, and has inserted more than 200,000 Chinese into Panama—which is on the way to gradually becoming a Chinese territory, as soon as the Chinese in Panama outnumber the native Panamanians. In addition, under the Clinton administration China gained access through two U.S. ports (with little checking, so anything can easily be inserted). China also has additional ports in the Western hemisphere. China is almost certain to eventually attack and seize Taiwan, which puts her on a collision course with the U.S., since the U.S. has an agreement to defend Taiwan. She has also declared the South China Sea—through which passes some 60% of the oil bound for Japan, and much oil for other nations also—to be Chinese territorial waters. China also has developed bioenergetics weapons, having long ago induced cancer into most of the GRU Russian representatives then serving in China. She almost certainly has or is rapidly working to develop psychoenergetics weapons as well.

So far as I am aware, there still exists not a single funded U.S. scientific program to directly correct the glaring errors in our own classical electrodynamics—such as those problems deplored by Nobelist Feynman and Wheeler {58,59,60}. Both knew that the force field concept in space was erroneous. As they put it, only the "potential" for the force field exists in space, in case some charged mass is available there for interaction. But the field itself is created by the interaction and is the effect of it. It does not exist before the interaction occurs. Yet all our texts continue to teach the disinformation of the "field in space." And our science community continues to fiercely defend such dogma, attacking and sometimes destroying the careers of those brave scientists who do try to change it.

One notes that time is multiply-connected, since in theory the same instant exists at every point in the universe. Or said another way, in any instant in time, every point in the universe simultaneously exists.

Operating in the time-domain as a causal system, and then turning out of one point there into any point in 3-space desired, is a means of producing "action at a distance" that obsoletes our old concept of transmitting the energy directly through space {61}.

Presently the U.S. scientific community has little predisposition toward energy turning into the time-domain, operating in the time-domain, then turning out of the time-domain into any desired point in 3-space, anywhere in the universe.[14] Every 3-space point in the universe simultaneously exists in (is superposed in) each point in time, as those points in time occur. In one sense, time can be considered to be the total multiple connectedness of space! We suspect that it may even be possible to interpret "instantaneous" communication—as by a quantum potential—in that "in here-out there" instantaneous fashion via "tunneling through the multiple connection of the time channel".

Finally, mass—being an observable and 3-spatial—does not exist in time. Mass continually turns into masstime (by photon absorption), then masstime turns back into mass (by photon emission). Masstime exists in time, but mass does not. U.S. scientists also seem unaware that the so-called "rate of flow of a mass through time" is generated by the sum total of all photon interactions (both virtual and observable) with that mass. The ubiquitous interaction of a mass with photons also causes that mass to continually recur, and thus to seemingly "continuously exist." It is continually observed, but it does not continuously exist! Since the photon interaction is engineerable, then it follows that a specific muss can be time-reversed back to an earlier state {62}.

[14] If one models the time domain in three dimensions instead of one, e.g., then in theory it becomes possible to "flip" a 3-dimensional mass object into the time 3-domain at a single "moment," then rotate from that "time 3-point" back into 3-space at a new 3-space location anywhere in the universe. Hence the "beam 'em up Scotty!" of the old Star Trek (and the more modern beaming version) may hold more of a promise than just for science fiction entertainment.

Cellular Time Reversal: Revolutionary Healing by a Team of French Scientists

Priore and eminent French scientists {39,40} unwittingly used the mechanism for time-reversing a mass and every part of it, to time-reverse diseased and damaged cells, including tumor cells, physically changing them back to their previous healthy physical state and condition in vivo. This included all parts of the cell, including its genetics. The Priore team demonstrated revolutionary cures of terminal tumors, infectious diseases, atheriosclerosis, and restored depressed immune systems.

The immune system (Figure 26) heals nothing, not even its own damaged cells. The human cellular regenerative system {63} is responsible for all healing in the body—and it utilizes time reversal of the damaged cells as the active healing mechanism. The regenerative system (Figures 27, 28, 29) pumps the damaged cells with longitudinal EM waves (and therefore with time-polarized EM waves, which always accompany longitudinal EM waves), inducing the cells and all their parts to add the phase conjugates, thereby forming time-polarized EM waves and pumping in the time-domain rather than the 3-space domain. This dramatically extends nonlinear optics to the time domain, and mass pumped in that fashion is time-reversed (propagated back along its own time-track, to a previous physical condition.

Kaznacheyev has shown that essentially any cellular disease or disorder can be electromagnetically induced in cells at a distance (Figure 30). Together with Becker's work, this shows that the cells can be altered either detrimentally (disease induction) or beneficially (disease elimination) by purely electromagnetic means. It would seem that diseases such as AIDS, e.g., could be rather dramatically cured by use of whole-body longitudinal EM wave radiation (with its simultaneously time-polarized EM wave radiation), as was done for other diseases by the Priore team and properly reported in the French scientific literature. We have also uncovered a process and method for causing the body to directly produce the time-polarized EM wave pumping, reducing the irradiation to perhaps 30 seconds of pumping instead of two or three hours {64}.

Becker's Study of the Cellular Regeneration System

In all our medical science, the only true healing procedures being utilized appear to be the use of Becker et al.'s tiny EM stimulation across otherwise intractable bone fractures {65} (Figure 31), to dedifferentiate (time-reverse) red blood cells, then redifferentiate (time-forward) them again twice to form osteoblasts, which are deposited in the fracture site to make new bone growth. All the other medical procedures seem to be interventions, not healing. After the intervention—which of course may be urgently necessary—it is then up to the body to heal itself (restore its cellular and tissue damage and functioning). So we have little healing science today, and in fact our medical establishment hardly funds any healing studies at all. EM radiation is usually considered as something that simply heats tissue. Our present medical science is deeply engrossed in studying the immune system. Again, the immune system heals nothing, not even its own damaged cells.

After the immune system "kills the bad guys" and saves the day, the battlefield is littered with residue and many cells of the body are damaged. The immune system sends in large scavenger cells that clean up the residue. And that's it for the immune system. Comparing it to an army's operation in the field, the immune system is the combat troops, not the medical services.

Restoration (healing) of the damaged cells back to normal is accomplished by the cellular regeneration system (Figure 29). This system is little known and little studied, but mostly studied by Becker (Figures 27, 28). It is a system that functions electrodynamically, but uses time-domain pumping to time-reverse the cells and their every part (including their genetics) back to an earlier state. In biology, the effect is called dedifferentiation, but without any knowledge of the actual EM mechanism.

So, within its capabilities, the cellular regenerative system in the body already uses longitudinally polarized EM waves, time-polarized EM waves (TPWs), and optical pumping by LWs and TPWs. Here we point out that neither the longitudinal photon nor the scalar (time-polarized) photon is individually observable; however, the combination of the two is observed as the instantaneous scalar potential {66}. With a little correction to properly make the phase conjugate replica wave a time-polarized EM wave, Whittaker's fundamental bidirectional EM longitudinal wave decomposition of the scalar potential (Figure 32) is consistent. Immediately the direct involvement of both the scalar photon and the longitudinal photon—and both the scalar EM wave and the longitudinal EM wave—are seen in Becker's bone-healing work using a scalar potential (Figure 31).

The Structure Is:

A harmonic set of longitudinal wavepairs. In each wavepair the two waves superpose spatially, but travel in opposite directions. The two are phase conjugates and time-reversed replicas of each other. Thus they comprise a coupled longitudinal wave and antiwave. The photons must be coupled into photon/antiphoton pairs (gravitons) by a strong application of the distortion correction theorem of nonlinear optics. Each wave in the biwave pair is a galloping wave. Each wavepair is a standing electrogravitational wave.

Note: Think of the oscillations as velocity modulations. The time-density carried by the waves is oscillating.

Priore unwittingly stumbled onto the actual mechanism used by all biological systems in "healing" (cellular regeneration), and also recognized how to amplify it (Figure 12). But no one understood its exact nature, including Priore and the scientists who worked with him at the time, and the conventional community still does not understand it. The Russian scientists not only understood it early on, but weaponized it as well. So did the Chinese.

Need to Correct and Extend Classical Electrodynamics

The organized scientific community's protracted defense of a seriously flawed classical electrodynamics is long standing. The conventional, comfortable ways of "doing business as usual, leisurely" now threatens the survival of the nation itself. We need to quickly admit and correct long-standing EM errors—such as calculating a reaction cross-section of an entity and calling it the magnitude of the entity itself! Our electrical texts continue to make that fundamental mistake, and they have done it now for 100 years or more. We need to quickly change the classical EM model to include the active vacuum and its interaction, and we need to change all textbooks to clearly state that all EM energy in the universe comes from the active vacuum, via the asymmetry of the source charges in their fierce energy exchange with it.

We also need to point out that all primary electromagnetic entities—the charge, the field, the potential, and every joule of EM energy in the universe—totally violates the second law of thermodynamics. The charge produces continuously increasing negentropy, the field and the potential are formed at expanding light speed across the universe and are perfectly ordered (thereby totally violating the statistical mechanics basis of the second law), and every joule of EM energy is either field energy or potential energy, and hence violates the same statistical basis of the second law.

The Situation Is Serious

Admittedly these are strong statements highly critical of our scientific establishment's track record. But our national survival continues to be increasingly at stake, the situation is serious, and we must not continue to bury our collective heads in the sand like ostriches. We simply cannot continue to idly sit by and pontificate while other groups and nations methodically maneuver technically to cut our collective throats with advanced weapons we cannot defend against, once they find a way to "get by" the little nation that has been countering them for some years. Our own beloved nation may have less than 10 years {67} and perhaps less than three years to survive, unless the organized scientific community is galvanized to focus its very best scientific efforts in the energetics area.

So far, in truly innovative approaches to new methods for electrical energy, the U.S. scientific community is about as energetic as a sand terrapin sleeping in the tropical sun. There is no discernible move to recognize the seriousness of the problem, or to do anything effective about it. In 45 years, the asymmetry of the dipole (and the charge in its modern view as a dipolarity of special kind) has not made it across the university campus from the particle physics department to the electrical engineering department. In fact, the implication of broken symmetry to electrical engineering and classical electrodynamics seems to still be completely unnoticed by the National Academy of Sciences, the National Science Foundation, our universities, and our great national laboratories. In the scientific community, other than work on vaccines etc., it is largely "business as usual."

A New Manhattan Project Is Warranted

Our need in the energetics weapons area is extreme, as are our needs in the medical area for quick, cheap, easy, and effective portable treatment of the coming mass casualties and our coming dramatic needs in energy. We do have superb scientists with the horsepower necessary to do something about it. The astounding, independent work of Sachs, the AIAS, and a few other scientists—which we stress has been unfunded—already clearly proves that. But unless we change the organized scientific community's normal rather snail-like pace—by a strong measure such as a Presidential Decision Directive and a declaration of a Nalional Emergency—the U.S. scientific community will overshoot the point of no return now approaching.

We need a new Manhattan-type project. We need it very quickly. If we do not change and focus our present scientific procedure, then—all too shortly—little that the scientific and intelligence communities are doing will be of value. We shall all be very, very dead or else in a new Dark Ages where most of the world economy has collapsed and freedom has largely disappeared from the face of the Earth.

2002 ENERGETICS WEAPONS THREAT TO THE U.S.

T. E. Bearden 2000
Updated Oct. 1,2002

The U.S. Narrowly Escaped Energetics Destruction Twice in 1997

On two occasions in 1997 (latter February and on May Day), we were scheduled In be strategically attacked without warning and completely destroyed. Eerily, in public statements the leader of the Aum Shinrikyo sect (Figure 33) had foreshadowed the dates for the planned attacks, since his group was also involved—in fact, shooting down the TWA-800 (Figure 34) as advanced practice and stimulation of the U.S. to see if it knew what was afoot. Those two planned strategic strikes in 1997 were avoided only in the nick of time by actions of a friendly little foreign country, which was the only nation on earth at the time that could counter the KGB quantum potential (QP) weapons. I am sure that proper U.S. agencies intercepted my urgent personal faxes to the Defense Attache in Washington, DC and directly to the Prime Minister of the nation involved. Actions by that nation did succeed in averting our destruction in the nick of time.

- Formed in 1987. Over 60,000 members. More than $1 billion in gold and cash.
- Taught that U.S. would strike Japan with devastating blow in latter 1997
  - Japan should make preemptive strike first
  - AUM would get mass destruction weapons
  - Was developing BW weapons (anthrax, botulism, "Q" fever, etc.)
  - Developed own chemical weapons
- Sarin attack on Japanese subways
- Formed alliance with Japanese Yakuza
- AUM/Yakuza leased operational use of strategic Soviet energetics weapons in latter 1989
- Trained crews, planned to strike U.S. a terrible "pre-emptive" blow in 1997 by assisting KGB
- Using deception, killed targets such as TWA-800

Only five nations or national groups have quantum potential (QP) weapons, though one or more additional nations are almost certainly working on them and may even have them. First of the five is the KGB in Russia (the weapons are not in the regular Russian forces, and never have been). Second is the friendly little foreign country to whom we presently owe our continued survival. The third is Brazil (which has had a small and successful QP weapon program for some time). China deployed QP weapons in early 2002, and I recently found that at least one other friendly nation has them as well. I'm not too impressed with that other friendly nation, since they played no role in saving our bacon in 1997. It appears they did not actually know the coming attacks were imminent. They certainly do not have Causal System Robot weapons, nor do they believe such weapons even exist.

Initiation of the Brazilian Energetics Weapon Program

Brazil implemented an energetics weapons program after it employed the repatriated Dr. Hellman, a German scientist taken to Russia after WW II along with the German radar team. Years after being taken to Russia, Hellman was repatriated and made his way back to Germany. In a news interview Hellman reported that he had worked directly on the development of Soviet secret EM weapons which could suddenly free/.e large areas of the ocean surface. That of course is a scalar interferometry weapon, producing negative (converging) EM energy rather than positive (diverging) EM energy in their distant interference zones.

Also, when the U.S. made David Bohm persona non grata in the McCarthy witch-hunts, Bohm was later employed in lecturing and teaching in Brazil for some time. At the time our own scientists continued to pontificate as to whether they liked or could tolerate Bohm's quantum potential and his hidden variable interpretation of quantum mechanics {3}. Meanwhile, the KGB weapon scientists and the Brazilian Hellman project seized upon Bohm's hidden variable theory with alacrity as soon as he published his seminal paper. Those two weapon groups were already familiar with the internal longitudinal EM wave structuring of potentials, fields, and waves (Whittaker 1903), and immediately saw the fantastic weapons implications of a deliberately structured quantum potential, containing a specific "engine" as desired. Most of our scientists still are unaware of it to this day, and are unaware of its formidable weapon implications when combined with Whittaker's 1904 superpotential paper, his 1903 potential decomposition, and quantum field theory. Most of our scientists still adhere to the Bohr interpretation of QM, which excludes the normal, everyday, observable, ordered universe we all inhabit and observe.[15]

The Bohm quantum potential is, after all, a scalar potential, and at least in theory it has a Whittaker biwave decomposition {68}. Even in the Coulomb gauge, the scalar potential has infinite velocity, as pointed out by Jackson.[16]

Several tests of the "cold explosion" Russian weapons referred to by Hellman have since been openly made. One major test seen by at least five jetliner crews was the anomalous rapidly rising cloud and subsequent extremely huge light globe (ABM energy shield) effects off the Kurils in April 1984 (Figure 35). Two excellent scientific articles on the physical phenomena observed in that incident are published in the prestigious journal Science {69}. We had explained the cold explosion phenomena and the ABM energy shield effects some years before that incident. Even ordinary superpotential theory {70} and longitudinal EM wave interferometry at a distance can substantiate the capability. We also positively confirmed by private sources that the scalar interferometry, the MindSnapper (negative energy EMP), and the cold explosion weaponry are real.

[15] This exclusion is euphemistically known as the "missing chaos" problem in quantum mechanics, and it is resolved in Bohm's hidden variable approach.

Related Phenomena

In 1969 in Toronto, Canada, Sid Hurwich demonstrated a device capable of "freezing" a pistol lying on a table so that the gun could physically not be moved and the trigger could not be pulled {71}. For this exhibition of strong electrogravitation, general relativistic fields initiated by the EM force field (including the usually unaccounted Heaviside nondiverged component that Lorentz arbitrarily discarded) as the agent of spacetime curvature were used {72}. The strength of the effect was attested by the fact that the hands of the observers' watches all showed "no passage of time" during the half hour they were in the room with Hurwich's device operating.[17]

Rapid development of that strong electrogravitational technology and concomitant energetics then proceeded in another nation. Weapons of such nature were then employed by that nation a few years later, in two well-known international incidents. Clear signatures of the nature of the weaponry utilized were present in those incidents. Details of these incidents will not be included in this paper.

[17] We point out that this is highly interesting itself, since it showed that the observers were operating in a different frame from that of the watches and the gun, which were "frozen". We also point out that recently light itself has been "stopped" in quantum experiments, yielding something quite similar.

Since the energetics weaponry already utilized special EM "hidden variables," Bohm's hidden variable theory and quantum potential were directly adapted into the program to dramatically extend it into the development of quantum potential weapons.

Stalin Personally Initiated the Soviet Energetics Program with the Greatest Urgency

While Stalin was at the Potsdam conference, at the close of WWII, the U.S. exploded the first atomic bomb in the desert. Truman informed Stalin in general terms that a powerful new U.S. weapon had been successfully tested. Secretly, Stalin already knew of our atomic bomb progress, for he had a spy in the program. While he was still at Potsdam, he then secretly called the Director of the Soviet atomic weapons program and directed a speed-up.

After we exploded two atomic bombs on Japan, the Japanese surrendered and WWII was over. See again Figure 1. Stalin vehemently ordered his Academy of Sciences to produce the next great technical breakthrough at all possible speed, since the American atomic bomb had frustrated his plan to wait two years after the war while the West speedily disarmed, then march into Europe and take it in six weeks. Now his massed troops could just be bombed back into the Stone Age by U.S. bombers using atomic bombs.

A Great Technical Breakthrough in Physics Can Always be Had in Four Years

The scientific community can have a great new technical breakthrough whenever its furious and dogmatic resistance to innovative discoveries or the possibility of innovative developments can be suspended. All that is necessary is a concentrated group of highly skilled, open-minded scientists, the money and facillities, and a strong headlock placed on the powerful but dogmatic scientific groups who would otherwise hamstring the program and destroy it.[18]

[18] Present day examples are (i) the cold fusion fiasco, where the U.S. scientific community has revealed furious determination to ignore more than 600 successful experiments worldwide, (ii) a similar fury against any and all research into extracting EM energy from the vacuum, even though all EM energy comes directly from the active vacuum via the proven asymmetry of source charges and dipoles, (iii) violent suppression of proven "extended electrodynamics" methods of rapidly curing severe diseases, even in terminal stage (resistance to anything except "cut, drug, burn" and anything that would interfere with the monstrous profits of the large pharmaceuticals), (iv) continuing dedication to an electrical engineering model that does not even model or apply what powers an electrical circuit, (v) continuing resistance to quantum potential research and development, (vi) slavish dedication to "big nuclear science", massive accelerators, dangerous nuclear power plants, and a "hot fusion WPA program", even though much higher energy physics than these programs advocate and use can be and is being done on the tabletop, using time-energy instead of spatial energy, and (vii) increasing "lock-up" of all research funds into the organized hierarchy's politically approved agenda. The community has deviated so far from scientific

We proved it in the WWII Manhattan Project, where we went from nearly zilch to the operational atomic bomb in 4 years. But we did it only by secretly bypassing the conventional U.S. scientific establishment. Einstein wrote to President Roosevelt around the scientific community, and when the President approved and ordered the highly classified program, conventional scientists not on the project were just parked on the sideline and ignored so that the job could be completed. The naysayers were also muzzled because of the extreme classification of the project; they faced jail if they engaged in their usual ad hominem attacks and dogmatic eloquence.

Further, today the "Skunk Works" approach repeatedly proves that bold new projects can be done, when the skilled scientists and facilities are mobilized and no adamant opposition by the conventional community is tolerated.

Numerous examples of the U.S. scientific community's suppression of innovation and new technology can easily be furnished. Such are well known to any historian of science. Cold fusion, the amorphous semiconductor by Ovshinsky, the first laser papers, ultrawideband radar, Mayer's original conservation of energy law, Boltzmann's work, Wegener's continental drift, flight of heavier-than-air machines, the rocket as a great strategic weapon, and hundreds of other examples come readily to mind. Such suppression has been the major characteristic of the organized scientific community since its inception, as pointed out by numerous leading scientists and authors. As Planck stated, usually one gets a new physics only after the old physicists who so adamantly oppose it just die off and get out of the way.

Today, the U.S. scientific community is in fact our "front line troops," although—except for a little lip service—the managers of the organized scientific community are blissfully unaware of it and have little or no sense of mission in out-of-the-box areas with respect to national survival. It is ironical, e.g., that our orthodox scientific community does not even know what powers an EM circuit—energy extracted directly from the vacuum by the asymmetry of the source charge (considered in its modern view as a dipolarity) and by the source method in defending archaic theory in the face of experiments that falsify it, that the ubiquitous violation of the law of increasing entropy (second law of thermodynamics) by electrodynamics itself continues to be adamantly resisted using ad hominem and inflammatory attacks, slander and libel, and destruction of scientific careers of researchers. We flatly are not getting our taxpayer money's worth from our present scientific community, and—barring a Stalin-like shakeup from top to bottom—we are not going to get our money's worth in the future unless the community is forced to free up funds for young graduate students and postdoctoral scientists wishing to work in "out of the box" scientific areas. As Max Planck stated, "An important scientific innovation rarely makes its way by gradually winning over and converting its opponents: it rarely happens that Saul becomes Paul. What does happen is that its opponents gradually die out, and that the growing generation is familiarized with the ideas from the beginning." In other words, one doesn't get a scientific innovation until the old dogs so bitterly opposing it just die off and get out of the way. This long-known and stated characteristic of the scientific community—its fierce and unrelenting resistance to change and innovation—is presently the greatest threat to the survival of this nation.

A Typical Example: The Suppression of Cold Fusion

As an example, much of U.S. Science—dominated by nuclear factions since the advent of the atomic bomb in WWII—vehemently attacked cold fusion and the cold fusion researchers, including wholesale ad hominem attacks, with a viciousness seldom seen in the history of science. Many dogmatic scientists declared the entire field at best a mistake and at worst a fraud. Even the character of many of the leading cold fusion scientists was openly impugned and the researchers were slandered and libeled. All this was done by conventional dogmatic scientists who have not solved the fundamental source charge problem {10,12}, have no inkling that all EM energy in 3-space comes from the time-domain {10}, and have not a clue as to what really powers every EM circuit. Since they also do not know where the electrical energy driving the chemistry actually comes from, they have no knowledge of the effects of time-energy in electrolyte solutions.

They also appear to have little or no knowledge of the implications of Evans' and Searles' transient fluctuation theorem[19] in thermodynamics showing to what degree the second law of thermodynamics can be violated and reactions can run in reverse, nor its extension to the micron (colloidal) size level and to two seconds in duration.[20] If they did, then they would realize that the Coulomb barrier provided by repulsion of like charges (such as two H+ ions), often reverses into the attraction of like charges, with the barrier changing into the Coulomb attractor. This can last (by experimental proof shown by Evans et al.) up to two seconds, in a volume of fluid up to a micron in diameter. Hence it is not "against the laws of physics and thermodynamics" to observe attraction of two protons in an electrolyte so closely that each enters the strong force region of the other and the two form a quasi-nucleus. In the decay of this reversal zone, the preferred decay of the quasi-nucleus can be by quark flipping in one of the protons, yielding an atom of deuterium emerging from the decayed time reversal zone. Such results have been meticulously observed in many cold fusion experiments in multiple labs and nations, and by multiple researchers. Since these and other novel nuclear transmutation results are replicated experiments (more than 600, in multiple labs, multiple nations, and by multiple researchers), it means that no amount of theory can refute them or the results. The harsh skeptics launching the frenzied ad hominem attacks are thus revealed as the unscientific bigots they are, since they ignore substantial experimental results that contradict the prevailing theory. The excess energy production and inexplicable new nuclides (Figures 21, 37, 38) obtained by these multiple experimenters are completely inexplicable by ordinary nuclear interactions in the accepted theory.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Patent Office has been instructed not to accept any patent applications that would interfere with present nuclear planning. Positive cold fusion results have also been successfully obtained in several U.S. government laboratories, including at China Lake where very strange instrumental effects have the experimental team puzzled. I proposed an explanation of those anomalies in August 1998, and have included it in my book just published in September 2002 {73}.

Revolutionary New Processes Are Hidden in the Cold Fusion Experimental Results

Once understood, cold fusion holds the breathtaking key to systems that consume a tiny fraction of time flow itself as a fuel to produce copious heat energy for the world's needs. Unknown to the conventional scientists, of course, electrodynamics itself already does this, but it has just not been recognized and accepted. Transducing one microsecond per second of time into transverse wave EM energy will produce some 9x10^{10} watts of real electrical power, if all the transduced EM energy is intercepted and used. This is the real way to extract energy from the vacuum and use it cleanly and cheaply.

To grasp such a notion, recall that the fundamental units used in physics are completely arbitrary. It is perfectly possible to express all physics in only a single fundamental unit—for example, the joule. Time then becomes totally a function of energy. So it is not so insane after all to express time as highly compressed energy. Mass is also highly compressed energy. That concept is now familiar after Einstein, the nuclear age, and $E = mc^2$. Time-as-energy is just as straightforward as mass-as-energy, but it has just not yet come into recognition.

The use of time as compressed energy, however, leads to some profoundly new types of electronuclear reactions presently unknown in particle physics. These new transduction reactions produce the new nuclides in cold fusion experiments, and generate the electronuclear interaction. We explain that in some detail in our new book, Energy from the Vacuum, previously cited {10}.

When interpreted as using time-energy, cold fusion shows us the way to a new electronuclear regime of nuclear reactions where nuclei, elements, and compounds can just be directly assembled by comparatively weak (in terms of spatial energy!) electromagnetic interactions. Presently we have made substantial progress in understanding the fundamental mechanisms generating these electronuclear reactions, after presenting preliminary results in August 1998.

As one example, time-reversing a single fermion (a particle with spin 1/2, 3/2, etc.) is precluded by the Pauli exclusion principle. But one can time reverse two of them, or any even number n, where they act as a semi-boson or group of semi-bosons. Simply put, if a time-reversal zone is established momentarily in the region where like charges exist, then the n-tuple fermion cluster can be achieved because the law of attraction and repulsion of charges is temporarily reversed {74,75}. This unexpected "attraction of paired fermions of like sign" will form quasi-nuclei in many cases, particularly in small clusters of two or four, etc.

Hence two H+ hydrogen ions (two protons) in such a time-reversal zone in a fluid are drawn together into a quasi-nucleus, which actually is an excited isomer of deuterium (Figure 37). Time-reversal zones are temporary in cold fusion experiments due to the statistics of their formation and the transient fluctuation theorem {76} of thermodynamics. As the time reversal zone decays, the quasi-nucleus of two protons is increasingly in an excited and unbalanced state. The excited-state diproton nucleus decays by flipping a quark in one proton, converting it to a neutron. That produces a neutron + proton nucleus, which is a deuterium ion, strictly by electronuclear means. Or four protons may cluster by "attraction in a time-reversal zone" and form a 4-p nucleus. That is an excited isomer of a helium nucleus. As the time-reversal zone decays, first one quark flips in one proton and then another quark flips in a second proton. That produces a helium nucleus - i.e., an alpha particle. Or two deuterium ions can attract and form a quasi-nucleus (Figure 38), which is already an exact isomer of a helium nucleus and thus easily decays into an alpha particle by simply "tightening" as the weakened strong force recovers faster than the Coulomb force can reduce, vanish, and resume in the opposite direction. The exact reaction equations for these reactions are given in my new book, Energy from the Vacuum {10}.

We filed an Invention Disclosure on the process of forming and using time-reversal zones to cause like charges to attract and unlike charges to repel in vacuo, in fluids, and in other media, resulting in the formation of semi-nuclei as excited isomer states of other nuclei, followed by decay into new nuclides. We will follow it with patent applications in the future. This represents a completely new kind of particle physics interaction presently not included in the textbooks, and not requiring high-energy processes. Literally thousands of new nuclear interactions—all permissibly violating the second law of thermodynamics because the statistics permit such violations and experiments prove it—are now possible.

Cold fusion does indeed hold a new kind of nuclear physics in its hand—but a physics presently considered very alien by our orthodox nuclear science community. For decades nuclear scientists have been seeking ever more spatially energetic particle smashing, believing that extreme high energy nuclear reactions and transmutations cannot possibly be done with charged particles at low spatial energy. One is sympathetic to the scientists, because even the concept of "low spatial energy transmutation" itself sounds like an oxymoron. And it would be, if one were limited to spatial energy alone, as is presently assumed by physicists. But one is also speaking of the neglected and compressed huge time-energy component of those low-spatial energy photons, and that is quite a different matter. The lower the spatial energy of the photon (the lower its frequency), the greater the amount of compressed energy transported in the time component as "time". The transposition of time-polarized EM energy into longitudinally polarized EM energy—and vice versa—is already justified in quantum field theory. Use of that extremely high energy component by its transposition or partial transposition into spatial energy in fact provides a much higher energy physics interaction than present orthodox high energy physics utilizes, knows, or considers.

Almost all the learned scientists are thinking only of spatial energy, since that is the only kind they have been "taught" to consider. Hence, from their view (i.e., on the premise of their implicit assumption) it is perfectly "logical" to condemn cold fusion, since in their view, "cold" implies low (spatial) energy and "fusion" implies high (spatial) energy transmutation. What is unknown to the orthodox community is that the "cold" in cold fusion also implies "extraordinarily high time-energy". So with a little transduction of highly compressed time-energy into spatial energy, "cold" fusion actually can imply "extremely high spatial energy made available by transduction" also.

As an example, the Chief Editor of Science recently had the courage {77} to publish results of sonoluminescence research reporting positive experimental transmutation results {78}. A paper was then published in Nature {79}, pointing out that the (spatial) energy involved is insufficient for such nuclear transmutation temperature, thereby implying that the reactions reported by the first researchers are not possible.

However, given formation of a time-reversal zone, this second paper is not necessarily applicable to the sonoluminescence fusion process, because the paper is based on an unwitting two-part premise that (i) only spatial energy can be used for nuclear transmutation and (ii) no time-reversal zones exist to nullify that premise by having reactions (such as the law of attraction and repulsion of charges) run backwards. That premise is already experimentally proven to be invalid by Evans et al., and it fails when the time reversal zone effect is considered.

We strongly stress that thermodynamics—both in theory and as demonstrated in experiments—not only allows but predicts—for a certain fraction of the time—the formation and existence of just such "reversal zones" where the usual reactions run in reverse {76}. It is also experimentally proven {54}. In that case a much higher energy—time energy—can be and is employed to convert the Coulomb barrier into the Coulomb attractor.[21] We know now (from the experimental demonstrations by Denis Evans et al.) that such "reversal zones" may be up to a micron in size and may endure for up to two seconds. The subsequent decay of that TRZ then allows the quasi-nuclei temporarily formed in it to decay by quark flipping alone, allowing the quasi-nucleus to easily transmute into a perfectly well known nuclear reaction product.

To quote Arthur C. Clarke, when a learned scientist says something is possible, he is probably right. When he says something is impossible, he is probably wrong.

Stalin's Dictatorial Impact on Soviet Scientific Management's Response

Stalin was a powerful dictator. He simply killed or jailed those who opposed his will. So after his blunt order (Figure 1) circa latter 1945 to find a great new technical breakthrough area quickly, his Academicians and high level science managers were faced with a severe dilemma: They could not afford to oppose or criticize a vigorous search for new innovations and a great breakthrough, and they could not remain passive. Their very lives depended on they themselves personally finding such a breakthrough in great haste and presenting it to Stalin. They had to actively spur the efforts of their most outstanding subordinates and Soviet science itself, or suffer dire personal consequences. Siberia and prison camps loomed for the lot of them unless they produced.

To put it bluntly, Stalin "got their collective attention" and their "whole-hearted support." Those few who resisted simply were shipped post-haste to the notorious prisons of Siberia, and worked to death in short order.

[21] We strongly point out that, when the reactions run backward and negentropy appears in those reversed regions, the conservation of energy law is violated unless time-energy is being converted to spatial energy. Either we must begin accounting time as energy, or we must give up the conservation of energy law itself. The obvious solution is to account the time energy being utilized, as well as the 3-space energy.

So the highest-level Soviet scientific managers now desperately demanded of their subordinate scientists anything—anything at all—that was novel and had breakthrough implications. An almost convulsive national scientific effort was launched immediately, with hardly a detracting voice. A great team of the very best Soviet scientists was rapidly formed and methodically searched the scientific literature of the world from beginning to end. Nothing even remotely like that search and review has ever occurred in the West.

For example, one great technical center set up by the Soviets had a staff of about 2000 Ph.D.s with associated translators, staffs, etc. The Soviets purchased and hauled in copies of all the scientific literature of the West—by the shiploads—to such centers. Their scientists then methodically went through the material, journal by journal, paper by paper, page by page. There are and always have been myriads of innovations and discoveries sitting on the shelf in the scientific literature, never followed up, or opposed by standard models and credos. The first tier of reviewing Soviet scientists was composed of excellent scientists. They skimmed out the "cream" into a select pile which the second tier then analyzed in depth. The second tier was composed of the best nonlinear scientists in the world—the "superscientists."

They were seeking new principles of nature that could rapidly be developed into highly advanced technology, and they found them—sitting there in the literature, already pointed out, and long ignored by the Western scientific community.

Shortly Stalin had his great new breakthrough area emerging, and they had their heads.

Our Own Science Community's Progress During These Decades

For decades foundations physicists (Bunge, Feynman, Wheeler, Lindsey, Margenau, etc.) in the U.S. have repeatedly pointed out the substantial foundations problems in electrodynamics. Nobelist Feynman and the great John Wheeler tried to "fix" the problem whereby electrodynamics still erroneously assumes force fields in a space filled with a material ether (unit point positive charge, unit point north pole, and unit point mass assumed at every point in space). Unfortunately they failed, primarily because their absorber theory {80} contradicted the photon hypothesis and hence quantum mechanics.

Meanwhile, our own National Science Foundation and National Academy of Sciences has directed only minimal work on correcting electrodynamics and dramatically extending it. Faraday and Maxwell—as did every other scientist at the time—rigorously assumed a material ether. Maxwell's equations also implicitly included that material ether assumption. They still do, even after Heaviside's truncation and Lorentz's symmetrical regauging, because none of the Maxwell-Heaviside equations were changed to eliminate the material fields in space (material ether) assumption after the Michelson-Morley experiments falsified it.

Every major university in America still teaches that implicit material ether, even though it was falsified over a century ago. That is an exact measure of the caliber of "foundations" work our own scientific community does if left alone. In more than 100 years, they have not even chosen to root out the material ether from electrodynamics.

Figure 39 This polluted and suffering planet. Direct result of the scientific community's adamant resistance to upgrading classical electrodynamics and electrical engineering.

The prevailing flippant attitude is that, "Well, your TV set works, doesn't it?" Yes it does, but we also do not have practical electrogravitation and inertial propulsion, nor do we have cheap clean EM energy from the vacuum. Instead, we have a severely polluted planet (Figure 39), ever increasing deaths from biospheric fumes and polluting byproducts, increasing destruction of species, and a monstrous unleashing of far more coal and hydrocarbon burning in our near future while the world tears itself apart and destroys its economy and civilization in a rising series of oil and energy wars. The direct responsibility for that mess lies directly with the scientific community and its fierce resistance to innovative research and development, and changing a century-old, long outmoded classical EM and electrical engineering model.

Wryly put, it's high time we "got the lead out" of EM field theory, where the lead is the material ether and other non-sequiturs cluttering the theory.

Such drastic modeling errors would not be tolerated of government-funded aerospace engineers and contractors developing a new missile system. So it should be equally intolerable in the government-funded scientific community and in fact in the civilian scientific community as well, and it should not be tolerated of either the National Academy of Sciences or the National Science Foundation.

Einstein {81} said it perfectly, as follows:

> "...the scientist makes use of a whole arsenal of concepts which he imbibed practically with his mother's milk; and seldom if ever is he aware of the eternally problematic character of his concepts. He uses this conceptual material, or, speaking more exactly, these conceptual tools of thought, as something obviously, immutably given; something having an objective value of truth which is hardly even, and in any case not seriously, to be doubted... in the interests of science it is necessary over and over again to engage in the critique of these fundamental concepts, in order that we may not unconsciously be ruled by them."

Upholding and perpetuating flawed electrodynamics models seriously impedes the progress of scientific development and revolutionary new technology.[22,23] At some point, one must legitimately question the upper management of the U.S. scientific community for not modifying classical EM and electrical engineering to include the active vacuum exchange with every charge and EM system. In not doing so, they continue to advocate perpetual motion source charges, creating energy from nothing, on a scale unparalleled in history.

It is little wonder that we do not have electrical power systems that successfully and freely utilize more than a trillionth of the vacuum energy they freely extract from the local vacuum. There is not now and there never has been a single electrical engineering department, professor, or textbook that knows what actually powers an EM circuit—real observable EM energy extracted from the local seething vacuum by the source charges and the source dipolarity.

[22] Oddly, the conventional electrodynamics model assumes that every source charge freely creates energy out of nothing at all, and pours this energy out continuously in all directions, thereby establishing its associated EM fields and potentials at light speed, reaching out across the universe. From the 1960s alone, the total assumption of incredibly vast numbers of perpetual motion machines has been carefully hidden from the new students, so that today even many professors do not realize that in their model all EM fields and potentials, and every joule of EM energy in the universe, are assumed to be created by a vast assortment of perpetual motion machines called source charges. That problem has not been solved in electrical engineering or in classical electrodynamics, and if the scientists have their way, it is not going to be solved. Yet the basis for its solution—the asymmetry of opposite charges such as the dipolarity (in the modern view) of a source charge—has been in particle physics since 1957, with the award of the Nobel Prize to Lee and Yang in December of that year.

[22] One keeps one's sense of humor. The raucous skeptics and "defenders of the orthodox EM faith" who so noisily denounce legitimate COP>1.0 EM system researchers as "perpetual motion nuts", are themselves unwittingly the greatest perpetual motion nuts ever recorded in history. Further, they are so ignorant of what their present model actually means, that they do not even know it. It is one thing to be ignorant and to recognize it; it is quite another thing to be ignorant and so ignorant one does not know it—45 years after broken symmetry was rigorously established experimentally by Wu and her colleagues, and the Nobel Prize awarded to Lee and Yang.

Since our scientific community cannot seem to make such a simple change (as including the active vacuum's interaction with every charge and the charge's broken symmetry in that interaction) even 45 years after the basis for that change has been resoundingly proven in particle physics, our national survival is at stake and the nation itself is seriously threatened by the superweapons developed by the KGB over the last five decades. We would have already been totally destroyed—twice in 1997 alone—had it not been for the intervention of a friendly little foreign nation. My colleagues and I played a very small alerting role in those affairs, so we are speaking from experience, not from extrapolation. We would be quickly destroyed today, were it not for the continuing "balance of terror" provided by the little nation.

U.S. Scientists Have Committed Monstrous Crimes and Gone Unpunished

Rather sadly, we also point out another thing that has to be said: scientists are no more moral or immoral than any other slice of American citizens. A percentage of scientists is capable of committing horrible scientific crimes, as distasteful as such a statement may be. That includes the deliberate experimentation on humans, resulting in deaths. In short, at least manslaughter and perhaps even murder, since knowledge of the probable results was there beforehand.

One would think U.S. scientists would never scientifically condone and perform experiments leading to mass deaths for 30 years (i) as they did in the Tuskegee case in Alabama. Over 400 poor blacks were supposedly treated for syphilis, while actually not being treated at all, but were deliberately tricked and allowed to rot with syphilis so our "ethical" scientists could watch how their brains decayed, so to speak. Over 100 of those poor blacks died with the disease while the scientists cold-bloodedly watched them expire and kept meticulous records. Or (ii) as they did in the case of whole body nuclear radiation for 30 years—again by trickery, deceit, and illegal use of security classification to hide these acts—of helpless retarded children and others, some of whom also died.

Once these heinous incidents were exposed publicly, the political power of the scientific community is such that no scientist was ever indicted or tried for these heinous mass murders, and none is going to be. The scientific community has not fiercely called for punishment of these mass murderers amongst their midst—guilty of precisely the same kind of horrible actions for which we tried and executed war criminals at Nuremberg.

Incredibly, the President of the United States formally apologized for these incidents! He did not turn the case over to the Justice Department for prosecution of high crimes against humanity and mass murder, as would have been done for ordinary citizens. Had a single doctor in his private clinic done such things on his own, he would have been arrested, summarily tried, and either sentenced to life in prison or executed.

The sad thing is that there was really no sharp clamor from the scientific community to bring their fellow scientists to justice, a la Nuremberg. By their silence, the organized scientific community showed a side that scientists are loftily not supposed to possess. So long as the scientific community continues to tolerate those mass murders of American citizens and not call for justice, then just so long do they stand convicted by their own resounding silence and inaction.

We cite these painful incidents (there are others!) to point out that one must not deify the scientific community. The conduct of science is no better and no worse than the conduct of human affairs in other areas. Science is also a big business, and it has its moral scientists and its immoral scientists. It does its moral business and it does its immoral business.

We painfully submit that both sides of the scientific character must be considered, when one examines such things as the tolerance or intolerance of the scientific community to dramatic innovation and "out of the box" research. We have to consider it now, because it has become a serious threat to the continued survival of our nation. The conduct of scientific affairs will unavoidably include suppression, maneuvering, spin control, and fierce struggle for power and funds—such is in the very nature of human beings, and it is present in the scientific community on a bell-shaped curve as in all other human communities. It is ongoing widely today, and to an uncomfortably large extent much of science has been captured and effectively controlled by controlling the scientific funding and prescribing what research must be done for the funds available.

As the French say, "The more things change, the more they remain the same." Science is still the same way as it was when Planck made his famous statement. It will still be that way tomorrow, and a century from now. As with any other big enterprise, it has to have checks and balances imposed and enforced on it from outside—by the government itself. Little or no indication exists of that happening in the near future, until we get something like an anthrax spray attack on a large city, and have a million or more Americans dying in the streets.

Energetics: New Principles of Physics and How the Soviets Found Them

Under Stalin's whip, the Soviets particularly sought anything that indicated possible new principles of nature. It is no accident that Nobelist Petr Kapitsa later informed Nikita Khrushchev that a means of total neutralization of foreign missiles could only come from a group of new principles in physics called energetics. A group of new principles is precisely what energetics is. So if our scientific and intelligence communities wish to understand energetics, they must first understand the new principles it is based upon. They cannot just simply apply ordinary electrodynamics and "business as usual" as they have largely done. The massive Soviet scientific search program spurred by Stalin is where those new principles came from.

When the first tier of Soviet review scientists found something that had not been followed up, and saw that it had significant implications if found valid, that paper was laid aside into a "select" pile. That select pile then went to the "super" scientists, for full-blown review and analysis by some of the brightest and sharpest minds on the planet.

The Russians came up almost immediately with Whittaker's 1903 and 1904 work. That work shows a hidden electrodynamic longitudinal EM wavepair structure (in phase conjugate pairs) inside the scalar potential and comprising it.

This is a dramatic extension of electrodynamics to incorporate a full-infolded general relativity infolded inside the electrodynamics. Whittaker showed that scalar potential functions in interference already create all the "normal" fields and waves anyway (the beginning of superpotential theory). This novel interferometry and its inherent capability for action-at-a-distance did not elude the Russian superscientists. The superb Soviet scientific team came up with that and with much, much more.

Nothing like the comprehensive, intense review of the entire scientific literature has been accomplished by the U.S. scientific community. Nothing like it is being done now.

Longitudinal EM Wave Interferometry Energetics Was Almost Immediately Uncovered

At the end of WW II, the German radar team and infrared team were taken to Russia. Both teams were years ahead of their Western counterparts.

One of my close colleagues has validated that the German radar team had some severe instrumental anomalies while still in Germany. We think this is what they were:

In WW II the Germans invented radar absorbing materials, to coat their submarine snorkels and prevent Allied antisubmarine warfare bombers from tracking the snorkels and destroying the subs. A wide variety of highly nonlinear, doped materials were investigated. In addition to single beam radar cross section, the Germans also examined the materials in multi-beam illumination circumstances.

It appears that, in some multibeam experiments with some materials, conditions were just right so that the multi-illuminated absorbing material acted as a pumped phase conjugate mirror (PCM), and wave-to-wave interactions emerged. This meant that the absorber material PCM would suddenly gather up all the energy in the pumping beams, use one of the other beams as a signal input beam, and fire an amplified retroreflected pulse right back down the signal input beam, wrecking the experiment and creating havoc in surrounding equipment.

When the German radar team went to Russia, their knowledge of these anomalies went with them. In the desperate Russian scientific climate to find lust such anomalies, this startling and anomalous phenomenon would have been exhaustingly examined and studied, once the German radar engineers got to Russia to their new laboratories.

In short, it appears that the Russians quickly came up with what today is called "nonlinear phase conjugate optics," but first in the radar band rather than optics.[24] So before 1950, it appears that the Russians already had working phase conjugating pumped phase conjugate mirrors for the radar bands and in other bands.

Fisher {82} details that we Americans did not "stumble onto" practical phase conjugate optics experiments until Russian physicists briefed Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory scientists in 1972 about the strange wave in many of their optical experiments that "came out of nowhere and restored order from disorder." At that time, the KGB energetics weapon scientists had known aboutphase conjugate retroreflection and its amplified pumping, for more than 20 years. Indeed, the first giant strategic scalar interferometers had already been deployed and utilized to kill the U.S.S. Thresher nearly a decade earlier (Figure 6).

By 1950 Russian Energetics Was Off and Running

By the beginning of the 1950s, the Russian scientists under iron KGB control were already experimenting with "scalar potential interferometry" at a distance, a la Whittaker 1904. Here transverse EM waves, EM fields, and EM energy—either divergent (heating) positive energy or convergent (cooling) negative enery—could be readily created at a distance {83} (Figures 40 and 41). Further, the longitudinal EM wavepairs used in this interferometry had the marvelous characteristic of easily penetrating right through the earth and ocean, with only a little intervening interaction, given that the LWs are sufficiently well made {84}. The interferometry "beams" can and do also move superluminally—again, right through the earth and ocean.

[24] Of course, they would also have investigated it at all other bands as well.

By 1950, the Russian scientists were experimenting with deliberately creating and phase conjugating longitudinal EM waves, forming phase conjugate wavepairs. They then assembled the desired (mathematically calculated) sets of those waves, adjusted frequencies and magnitudes, phasing, etc., to produce EM potentials having a desired deterministic internal spacetime curvature set (internal spacetime engines) and dynamics.

As a result, by the mid-50s Russian weapon scientists were already experimenting in bioenergetics with the direct inductance of diseases and health changes via the transmission into human targets of such "internally structured" EM potentials, fields, and waves. They were also experimenting with the production of EM energy, potentials, fields, and waves at a distance, directly through the earth and the ocean. Either heating (energy flow divergence) (Figure 41) or cooling (energy flow reconvergence) (Figure 40) could be produced at will in the distant interference zone, merely by altering the bias voltage on the chassis grounds of the interferometer's transmitters. Rapid switching between the exothermic and endothermic modes thus was straightforward{85}, as demonstrated (Figure 35).

By the latter '50s, longitudinal wave interferometry weapons had already emerged from advanced engineering development and were in full production engineering toward deployment. The LIDA device {86} and even more advanced versions for directly affecting the human mind and its state of consciousness had emerged in psychoenergetics as one class of devices rather openly released and utilized. The LIDA uses structured EM microwaves {87} to induce a hypnogogic or cataleptic type of trance-like state in either a human or a cat. as tested years later by Dr. Ross Adey of the U.S. Early prototypes were purportedly used against our prisoners in North Korea during the Korean War to assist in their brainwashing by their North Korean Captors. Prisoners reported that its effects were irresistible.

Meanwhile, energetics weapon testing in several major modes was being conducted, particularly from Soviet research ships over remote regions of the ocean and at night. Descriptions of such tests—many of them seen by passing ship's captains—can readily be found in the open maritime literature. We gathered and published many such incidents and cited references.

Deployment of the Soviet Energetics Weapons and Their Quick Use

In January 1960 Khrushchev spoke obliquely of these "fantastic" new superweapons, just within the portfolio of the Soviet scientists, so to speak, in an important speech to the Presidium. Parts of that speech were reported in the New York Times {88}. No one in the West knew what Khrushchev was talking about. Our intelligence community, which bases many of its assessments on the tired old phrase "We have no evidence that..." simply treated it as propaganda, It wasn't, and the U.S.S. Thresher was to be destroyed (Figure 6) three years later by that same weapon Khrushchev was speaking of.

Khrushchev began rapidly inserting long-range missiles and nuclear warheads into Cuba in 1962, precipitating the Cuban Missile Crisis. Kennedy knew Khrushchev's strategic bombers and rockets were in horrible shape, due to direct information received from Colonel Oleg Penkovskiy, a Russian spy in our employ courtesy of British Intelligence. No one knew of the superweapons, but they were not yet operationally ready in Oct.-Nov. 1962. So Kennedy called Khrushchev's bluff and faced him off. Blustering awhile to obtain U.S. assurance that it would not invade Cuba, Khrushchev was forced to back down and withdraw the missiles. In his exuberance he had simply moved too fast in inserting the missiles into Cuba. Had he waited a few months later, the strategic superweapons would have been operational and ready. Any U.S. naval blockading force would have thus faced quick and eerie destruction or disabling, as was soon to be demonstrated in the case of the U.S.S. Thresher and its surface companion, the U.S.S. Skylark.

This severe loss of face by Khrushchev, before the Communist Party, made it imperative that he do something quite dramatic to stay in power, and do it as quickly as possible.

Khrushchev's first large, full-up, strategic longitudinal EM wave energetics interferometer weapon became operational on site by April 1, 1963. A few days later, Khrushchev employed it to kill the U.S.S. Thresher atomic submarine (Figure 6) underwater off the East Coast of the U.S. By simply creating EM noise in an interference zone placed on, in, and around the sub underwater, and thus jamming the sub's electrical controls so that it could not be controlled, the helpless sub sank to crush depth and imploded. The U.S.S. Skylark on the surface had multiple systems seriously jammed or rendered nonoperational. This was the Russian deception plan, to have the kill of the sub resemble an accident.

One day after the successful clandestine kill of the Thresher, the same weapon was used to demonstrate a powerful underwater electromagnetic burst 100 miles north of Puerto Rico (Figure 42). The energetics underwater burst equaled a substantial deep underwater nuclear explosion in size. The burst was seen by a passing U.S. jetliner crew and was reported to the FBI and the U.S. Coast Guard when the aircraft landed in Florida. A colleague interviewed the co-pilot of the aircraft, and relayed the interview information to me.

Why the Soviets Could Continue to Attack and Kill U.S. Targets with Impunity

Ironically, Khrushchev clearly demonstrated the inability of U.S. science to comprehend the numerous test incidents of Soviet LW interferometers, including the actual destruction of strategic U.S. targets (our latest and greatest nuclear attack submarine!) right off our coast. The greatest strategic weakness of the U.S.—and the thing that may yet completely destroy all of us—is the continuing snail-like pace of U.S. scientific progress in revising, correcting, and extending its seriously flawed classical electrodynamics model. This scientific inertia placed us several decades behind in development of defenses in the areas of longitudinal EM wave weapons, quantum potential weapons, and causal system weapons. It countered our strategic nuclear armada for two decades. We were for some time analogous to the Spanish Navy with its wooden ships, when it faced and was destroyed by American steel ships. Hopefully at least some more modern work has now been accomplished in higher group symmetry electrodynamics, so that we are not quite as defenseless as we formerly were. But we still have a very long way to go.

When one performs a standard strategic analysis on a nation, one of the areas examined in depth is called national style. One of the major characteristics in the U.S. national style is that we do not react to slowly increasing threats or changes

(Figure 43). That style particularly applies to the scientific community. Because of it, the Russians knew that our government only inches forward in achieving new basic science. We run at enormous speed, doing applied science. We are essentially Romans and great engineers. We are largely not Greeks and not great esthetics discoverers. We also will just ignore new threats if they emerge very slowly and are only gradually perceived, and we will hide behind that infamous phrase, "We have no evidence that..."

BOA CONSTRICTOR LIGHTNING STRIKE

Americans tend not to react to slowly increasing things, but react to rapidly increasing things.

In short, we react to the coiled rattlesnake, not to the boa constrictor. We are now in a long, bloody, costly war against terrorism because of that very characteristic of our national style. For decades, the slowly increasing infiltration of terrorists and their weapons was just ignored. Oh, yes, the official "threat studies" pointed it out, placidly.[25] But no one got very excited about it. The prevailing attitude was that "Ah, yes, but nothing like that will happen on my watch!"

As clearly demonstrated by their successful decades-long radiation of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, the KGB chess masters knew that, if the test kills using their superweapons were not too often repeated, and if they even vaguely resembled other things known in the world, the U.S. scientific community and government investigators would resist all suggestions of Russian superweapons and super technology using new principles of nature. And so would our intelligence community, since they rely on the scientific community for their scientific assessments. They were well aware of our historical "ostrich" position (Figure44).

[25] Indeed, if one will look at the threat studies prior to William Cohen taking office as U.S. Secretary of Defense, one will find widespread complacency about the terrorist threat, and mostly just lip service to it. It was definitely not very important to most of the intelligence and scientific community. Cohen built a fire under the entire threat community, forcing them to get their act together and start actually studying the terrorist threat, asymmetrical warfare capabilities and dangers, and what could be done about it. He did force the research and threat communities to do a creditable job of studying it, and to publish reports detailing it. Unfortunately, the tenor of the political community outside SecDef Cohen's control was basically "business as usual, not to worry." September 11, 2001 changed all that forever. Once again we had waited until the rattlesnake struck and actually bit us, before the nation rose up and paid attention.

We're running out of energy!
We must redouble our efforts!
We must gigantically centralize!
We have to keep polluting the Earth, if we are to have lots of electrical energy! There is no free lunch!
No!
Every dipole in the universe is a continuous free EM energy generator, continuously extracting and pouring out enormous EM energy from the active local vacuum.

Figure 44 The only energy resource problem is the theoretical ostrich problem in science. We must become theoretical owls, rather than ostriches.

The KGB deception just depended upon the U.S. tiger to keep its stripes and exhibit its normal reactions or lack thereof. They also utilized (i) a series of strategic deception plans, deliberately designed to perform the tests suggestive of discredited phenomena such as UFO reporting and "lights at night" types of things, and (ii) a continuing series of subtle and anomalous stimuli (probes) designed to rather slowly attract the attention of U.S. Government at high levels, and of state-of-the-art U.S. government scientific contractors as well. The trick was not to attract U.S. attention too suddenly or too strongly. Show them the slow boa constrictor, not the lightning-fast rattler, and see how they reacted, if at all. By their reactions, the KGB could assess whether or not the U.S. government, intelligence, and scientific communities understood what was happening.

Precisely as anticipated by the KGB, we showed them for some decades that we really had little or no comprehension of the superweapons and their testing right over our heads. Even today, at least in the open community there is still little recognition, even of the violent weather war raging right over our own heads since July 4, 1976 and easily recognized.[26]

A case in point was the deliberate induction of diseases and health changes in U.S. personnel in the U.S. Embassy in Moscow for over 40 years (Figure 11). On a continuing basis, this excellent intelligence probe showed (by the U.S.'s actions or lack thereof) that we knew nothing about energetics.

Another KGB probe method was to kill a target once in a while, such as a jetliner or a submarine (deliberately rather seldom here, because the U.S. military would react if a certain frequency threshold were exceeded). Such kills resemble or can be posed as natural accidents or terrorist incidents. Quite a number of such incidents have occurred over the last three decades. The National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB) does not have higher group symmetry electrodynamics in its knowledge base or on its "checklists", nor does it have scalar interferometry, psychoenergetics, bioenergetics, or quantum potentials. In total, the results of deliberate stimuli of the U.S. continually assured the KGB chess masters (with 100% certainty) that we were a complete novice in the energetics game, and we were a lamb increasingly ready for the slaughter.

The major contribution to the continued success of these deliberate measures by the KGB has been provided for decades in the "nonreaction of our own scientific community to slowly increasing threats." To a lesser extent, our own intelligence community has also not focused sufficiently open-minded and highly qualified scientists to comprehend what is occurring in "new principles of nature" phenomena. "In the box" electrical engineers with Bachelor of Science degrees often are the analysts who analyze and assess such "out of the box" phenomena. Good luck!

Ordinary radar engineers may analyze an ordinary radar rather well. They will never, never become aware of a radar beam carrying infolded spacetime curvature engines. Such is not even in their lexicon or in their belief structure. They have no understanding or experience at all with longitudinal or time-polarized EM waves—most have never even heard of time-polarized EM waves. Mention curvatures of spacetime and their dynamics as deliberate "engines" impressed inside EM fields and potentials and waves, and one gets a glaze right over the eyes of the intelligence analyst recipient.

Western science conceives the mind as a meat computer, and does not understand that mind operations are totally electromagnetic and causal, but nonphysical—meaning in the time domain rather than in 3-space. Mind operations primarily use time-polarized EM waves rather than the transductions into transverse EM waves that the scientists actually measure. Hence Western science has not the foggiest notion as to what Russian psychoenergetics is all about, or how it can even "be." Certainly Western science has had no notion of deliberately creating time-polarized EM waves for direct engineering within the mind itself and within the mind's time-EM operations.

[26] The weather war over our heads has been particularly violent, and violently resisted, this year (2002).

As Arthur C. Clarke puts it in his "third law," "Any sufficiently advanced technology is indistinguishable from magic. "

Our long fascination with our "normal" (optics, IR, UV, radar, COMINT, satellite photography, etc.) technological intelligence collection systems will certainly not lead to any great breakthrough understanding of Russian energetics weaponry. That could only have come through HUMINT or COMINT. HUMINT is an area which, in the past, we have mostly just neglected or given lip service to for decades—and that came back to bite us severely on September 11, 2001. Even when we use HUMINT, it will not yield energetics results if the managers and directors themselves (and the agent handlers in the field) have no understanding of it and do not even know the proper questions to ask. And the system will not deliver results if the Intelligence Collection Requirements do not address the proper issues because ordinary electrical engineers and conventional electrical physicists having no inkling of psychoenergetics, or how it works, drew them up.

COMINT, on the other hand, suffers from its own extraordinary prolific output -as well as by only conventional analysts and conventional scientists examming it. Warehouses of COMINT information often have not even been read in any way except a casual glance by a junior analyst, and certainly have not had serious foundations scientists examine it in detail. ELINT does a little better insofar as a human analyst looking at it, but then what is a conventional electrical engineer or radar engineer to make of a giant hemispherical globe that slowly forms and expands from a tiny "seed bubble" of intense glowing light that appears (Figure 35), as it did off the Kurils in April 1984? What will he label it? "Light phenomena?" Where are the technical descriptors of the actual process forming the phenomenon? Where are the implications as to the strategic military use of such phenomena? The reader can see the point. For decades our analysts ignored prolific reports of such incidents by the hundreds. Why, everybody knew it was glowing swamp gas!

One cannot even write a proper "intelligence collection requirement" if one does not understand the basic phenomenology. So essentially no one in U.S. intelligence was writing the proper intelligence collection requirements.

The Science Behind the Soviet Energetics Weapons

The science behind these weapons is called _energetics_. (See again Figure 8.) Energetics consists of three branches, depending upon the nature of what is being targeted. The branch targeted against nonliving matter is just called the same name: Energetics. Targeted against living cells and biological material, the nervous system, etc., that branch of energetics is called bioenergetics. Against the mind and its functions (which are time-like and thus involve scalar photons and time-polarized EM waves), energetics is called psychoenergetics {89}. See Figure 45. Psychoenergetics includes both the conscious[27] and unconscious mind[28] of the individual—and even Jung's collective unconscious mind[29] of the entire human species {90}, and in fact even the collective unconscious mind in all species on earth, which corresponds to Lovelock's Gaia concept.

We remind the reader that we are talking physics, not metaphysics and not mysticism. Strong Soviet physics developments over a sustained period have occurred in all three energetics areas, and these areas continue to be developed at present.

Once a nation enters into LW EM development, it has just entered into unified field theory development also. Particularly with longitudinal EM waves, one is directly engineering general relativity itself, and spacetime itself, as well as the dynamics of spacetime curvatures and sets of such curvatures. But it is an even greater unified field theory than Western physicists suspect. Not only does it unite the four forces of physics, but it also unites mind and matter and their dynamics as well.

[27] The conscious mind is a very fast serial processor, processing one snapshot at a time.

[28] The unconscious mind is a massively parallel processor, doing a great many things simultaneously. It is totally conscious, but multiply so. Since the serial processor conscious mind can only "see a single slide projector in the viewgraph at one time", when it "looks at the unconscious mind" it sees a large number of slides simultaneously, hence just sees "black" or "nothingness" (no single thing).

[29] Jung himself labeled it a mind (and hence a living entity). His modern followers shudder at such a concept, and very much downplay the "mind" and "entity" aspect, preferring that it just go away.

We shall also refer to time-polarized EM waves as time-density waves. The reason is that a time-polarized EM wave is one where the EM energy is on the time-axis and oscillating along it, like the squeezing of an accordion. In short, it is a longitudinal EM wave on the 4th Minkowski axis ict, where the only variable is t. Hence it is a wave of the variation of time-density along that axis.

All three branches of KGB energetics use longitudinal EM waves, longitudinal EM wave interferometry, and Whittaker-structuring of fields and waves to provide organized curvatures of spacetime known as spacetime engines or vacuum engines. They also use time-polarized EM waves, as mentioned above. Any or all can also employ the quantum potential as well as negative energy EMP aspects. For now, the reader should just recognize that each infolded longitudinal EM wavepair comprising the scalar potential, includes both a time-density wave along the time axis and a longitudinal EM wave in 3-space {91}. So ordinary electrostatic scalar potential fi—ordinary voltage—is made of a harmonic structure of coupled time-polarized and longitudinal EM wavepairs.

Oscillations of time density oscillate the local rate of flow of time. In turn, since time has the energy density of mass, its spatial energy equivalence W is given by $W = c^2t$. Any change in a time density wave is a very powerful oscillation of loca1 spacetime curvature. So time-density waves constitute a very powerful form of infolded general relativity, inside potentials and hence inside all EM waves and fields. The KGB weapon scientists call that inner general relativity (time density waves) the information content of the field. Unfortunately our follows confuse that term with common "spectral analysis" which it very definitely is not. But as part of the deception plan, the Russians are quite happy to help them think it is exactly that, and in fact the Russians go to some pains to continue to help our fellows think that.

KGB energetics involves the use of a highly structured general relativity infolded inside electrodynamics—inside EM potentials, fields, and waves regardless of type. In addition, that very special GR is using the very strong EM force along the time axis as the main agent of curvature. By deliberately structuring these time-polarized EM waves and their dynamics, extremely powerful spacetime curvature engines can be employed, either created locally or at a real distance, or also globally in an entire selected distant region.

Once these spacetime curvature engines structure the distant targeted spacetime region. Then in that interference zone the engines therein act upon any mass present. In theory, any physical effect known can be engineered, according to general relativity, once one can create and utilize the proper set of spacetime curvatures (the proper set of spacetime curvatures and their dynamics). In GR, curvature of spacetime acts directly upon any mass present, and vice versa. With such technology one can therefore engineer mass to any level and at any distance (and eventually in any quantity) at will, using energetics methodology. The engineered mass may be either living or inert {92}. It follows that bioenergetics and psychoenergetics effects can also be engineered at a distance in similar manner. All it requires is the proper engines for the effects desired in the targets desired.

By using time-density waves and their dynamics, mind itself can be engineered and controlled at a distance as in the cases of Captains Button (Figures 22 and 23) and Svoboda (Figure 24).

The Importance of Scalar Photons and Time-Density Waves

Now we digress momentarily. Again, there are four major photon polarizations in quantum field theory {93}. The first two are transverse photons, polarized in the x- and y-direction respectively (transversely to the line of propagation, which is customarily taken along the z- axis). Ordinary transverse EM waves are comprised of such photons or blends thereof. Though ignored, EM waves prior to interaction with mass do transport EM time-energy as well as EM spatial energy, though in electrodynamics that time-energy transport has been ignored, thus confusing the effect with the cause.

The third polarization is a longitudinal photon, vibrating along the z- direction (the direction of propagation). Obviously longitudinal EM waves are comprised of such longitudinal EM photons.

The fourth polarization is a scalar photon, since it oscillates only along the time axis (the word "scalar" refers to the fact that it has no vector field component in 3-space). In American physics the latter photon is largely ignored since time is not an observable in quantum mechanics. However, such scalar photons do comprise time-density waves and EM time-energy currents, and they are involved in powerfully curving spacetime via oscillating the time domain. Hence by their oscillations they produce spacetime curvature oscillations, which in turn project small components into 3-space. Sufficient such coherent projection components are in fact longitudinal waves in 3-space.

The combination of the scalar and longitudinal photons is observable as the instantaneous scalar potential, and when Whittaker's 1903 decomposition of the scalar potential is slightly corrected, then the scalar potential is comprised of coupled pairs of waves, where each pair consists of a time-polarized EM wave coupled to a longitudinal EM wave. The combination of the scalar and longitudinal EM waves in the presence of charge is observable as the macroscopic scalar potential. Negative charge absorbs the time-polarized photon from the time domain and re-emits a longitudinal photon in 3-space, while the positive charge absorbs a longitudinal photon from 3-space and re-emits a time-polarized photon in the time domain.

Psychoenergetics: Engineering the Mind-Matter Interaction by Engineering Mind

We shall be interested in what actually constitutes a living biological system in the psychoenergetics view (Figure 46). Mind operations are time-like rather than existing in 3-space, and for that reason mind and its operations are not observable. Observation is a d/dt operator acting on an LLLT ongoing interaction, which removes the T and leaves a frozen LLL snapshot, via d/dt(LLLT) => LLL. Imposition of observation itself breaks, any and all connection with time-like operations, including mind and its operations.

The body's cells and their parts are linked by a mutual quantum potential. Mind and thought (from a mindworld) occupy the internal SW biwave structure of the QP to that body, being continually disconnected and reconnected by the photon interaction generatrix for the flow of time.
ALL POTENTIALS IN THE BODY ARE ASSOCIATED WITH AND CONNECTED TO THE QUANTUM POTENTIAL.
THE BRAIN AND NERVOUS SYSTEM ARE SPECIAL TUNERS/SWITCHERS BETWEEN INNER AND OUTER EM "SIGNALS".
DEEP CONTROL IS VIA VACUUM ENGINES: NESTED STRUCTURING OF THE SWZ BIWAVES INSIDE, AND COMPRISING, THE SCALAR POTENTIALS.

"Dynamics" involves "velocity", and in general relativity's 4-space velocity is rotation (Figure 47). Any mind-operation or change is dynamics and produces a small velocity, which is a small rotation. This projects a very small component into 3-space, in the physical body, but still in the virtual state. We are speaking of physics rather than metaphysics! Sufficient coherent mind operations (changes) have just such small (virtual) rotation components in 3-space that will project coherent little projection components (virtual) into 3-space. Coherently sustaining these components (intent) results in their coherent integration to breach the quantum threshold and become detectable (produce an observable 3-space result). That is how an "intent" change sustained in the mind becomes an actual physical energy input to the body and nervous system.

- An object moving with velocity v < c has rotated slightly out of 3-space toward the time dimension.
- Its "projection" back into 3-space is shorter, providing the Lorentz-Fitzgerald contraction.
- When velocity v = c, a full right-angle turn has been made, and the object has "lost" its projection along its direction of motion.
- Hence it appears as a 2-dimensional plane moving at the speed of light; in short, a photon or a light wave.

Lorentz-Fitzgerald Contraction

We again stress that the scalar potential is comprised of coupled time-density and longitudinal EM wavepairs. Mental operations also are time-density wave changes, hence they are changes to the interior of potentials, including the ambient potential of the vacuum itself. Potentials superpose, and their coherent internal structures add (integrate) coherently. Hence, mind changes can coherently integrate to produce minute but real, observable, physical input changes to the body system. Mind permeates the body via the interlinked and superposed potentials of the body. The living bio-organism's mind and its operations can be modeled as an organized operating wave dynamics inside a scalar potential and superposed potentials of the body of that organism. Since fields are made from the more fundamental potentials, these operations also function inside the fields of the body. The organized time-density dynamics constitute both the conscious mind and its operations and the unconscious mind and its operations. More subtle depths of the time-density dynamics also constitute the human collective unconscious mind functions and operations. Again, we are speaking physics, not mysticism.

See Figure 48. The "component projection" (coherent integration) process from time-like mind operations into 3-space in the body potentials introduces into the living body the physical commands correlated to the mental intent of that entity. This is the solution {94} to the long unresolved philosophical problem of intent, and addresses the unresolved physics problem of just what constitutes the "observer." But the subsequent physical changes accomplished by the responding body as a servomechanism, also produce small rotations into the time domain (into the mind domain) but in the virtual state. However, a series ol' coherent physical changes produces coherent virtual state changes in the mind realm, which in turn coherently integrate into perceptual input. In this fashion, the mind senses the response of the body to its order, and any errors in that response that need correction. The time delay gives also the sense of identity and personal persistence, hence creates the perception of self, the "responding body belonging to self," etc. Interwoven perceptions of coherent rotation changes from other 3-space phenomena that do not respond to mind intent, also create the perception of the "separate physical world." That these phenomena do not respond directly to mental intent creates the perception of the "separateness" of this "external" physical world, while the interweaving creates the perception of "existing simultaneously" with or in the external world.

All of that perception, dynamics, rotation, and processing is subject to direct engineering via psychoenergetics means.

Without further elaboration, we again stress that the conscious mind is a serial processor, whereas the unconscious is a massively parallel processor. Westerners are prone to equate self to consciousness or conscious mind operation alone. That is not the case. Consciousness is just one attribute of the self (of the total feedback loop having delay between feedforward and feedback).

The totality is the mind-body coupling mechanism (Figure 48) enabling a living biological system (Figure 46).

By using time-density waves formed of scalar photons, the mind realm also can be directly engineered by the same energetics technology. Hence, for the Russian energetics weapon scientists there followed the development of psychoenergetics as an entire class of breakthrough electromagnetic weaponry.

This resulted in the development of not only a unified physics of matter and space, but also a unified physics of mind and matter reaction. Any true unified field theory must integrate the observer and the unobserved as well as the various categories of the observed. It is now possible to directly model and engineer both physical and mental reality and their interaction. Russian psychoenergetics has been developed to do precisely this {95}.

Quantum Potential Weapons Are Utilized in All Three Energetics Branches

In addition to scalar interferometers, there is another category of energetics weapons used in all three branches. That category involves the use of quantum potential weapons, after David Bohm's quantum potential in his hidden variable interpretation of quantum mechanics {96}, published in Physical Review in 1952. We openly published one mechanism for creating a quantum potential {97}; there are others.

Presently these quantum potential weapons are the most powerful and most flexible weapons on earth. Nothing else can stand against them. Any nation not possessing QP weapons is already a second-rate power, regardless of how many nuclear missiles, bombers, and submarines it possesses, or how many high-energy lasers and high power microwave weapons it possesses.

The greatest problem the Soviets had was not in making the QP itself, but in (a) localizing its creation to the specific area or region desired, and (b) restricting its coupling to the type of equipment, entity, level, size, type of nuclei, etc. that was desired. We have not yet fully solved the problem of how they are able to do that, but have made a little progress upon it.

The Importance of Longitudinal EM Waves

The KGB energetics weapons use longitudinally polarized and time-polarized EM waves as their basis, rather than transversely polarized EM waves. There is a surge of renewed U.S. interest—and a revolution in electrodynamics—just underway in this country (and in the major weapons laboratories of other nations) vis a vis longitudinal EM wave solutions to the major equations of physics. E.g., one may check the Los Alamos National Laboratory Internet web site for summary papers by Rodrigues and Lu {98}. There are now formal EM wave solutions faster than light speed, slower than light speed, etc. {99}. There is also experimental support for superluminal tunneling of EM waves in waveguides {100}. In addition, as is well known, the speed of the ordinary scalar potential is infinite in the Coulomb (transverse) gauge {101}

Higher topological algebra is being used to embed the electrodynamics in most of the KGB energetics work. Maxwell's original theory {6} was some 20 quaternion and quaternion-like equations in 20 unknowns. Quaternion algebra has a higher topology than either vectors or tensors. Heaviside and others reduced the quaternion-like theory of Maxwell down to four equations in four unknowns—or to two coupled equations, depending upon how represented—and formed the much lower topology vector algebra in the process. This serously demoted the topology of electrodynamics and placed undue limitations upon what can be done with it. The subsequent mathematical promotion of electrodynamics to tensor algebra still did not recover much of the EM functioning possible in quaternion algebra. An even vaster, far more powerful electrodynamics emerges in Clifford Algebra electrodynamics, which may be the coming modern trend.

However, even with Clifford Algebra, there remain fundamental foundations difficulties—such as bluntly confusing energy transport with energy dissipation, by arbitrarily integrating the Poynting vector around a closed surface so as to select only the divergent portion of the Poynting energy flow. That produces the energy dissipation flow associated with the circuit, not the overall energy flow associated with it. The overall energy flow is some 10^{13} times greater in a nominal case, as (i) discovered by Heaviside in the 1880s, (ii) never even considered by Poynting, and (iii) deliberately discarded by Lorentz with a little integration trick {102} still used by classical electrodynamicists and electrical engineers. Electrical engineering departments, professors, and texts do not know and do not teach that all EM power sources—such as generators and batteries—actually pour out of their terminals a far greater energy flow than the meager shaft energy input to the generator or the chemical energy dissipated in the battery. Lorentz arbitrarily discarded the huge Heaviside nondiverged output energy flow component a century ago, with the observation that it "has no physical significance" {103,104}.

Part of the emerging electrodynamics revolution is intuitively obvious. Higher topology algebra used in one's electrodynamics model means that lots more things can be done—in circuits, equipment, and components. As an example, suppose one can only draw geometrical figures on a flat, uncurved plane. Then compare the figures there to what can be drawn when a third dimension is added so that the plane can be curved, twisted, folded, stretched, compressed, etc. in 3-dimensional space. That is similar to the dramatic differences between electrodynamics in a higher topology algebra and electrodynamics in the far more limited tensor and vector algebras.

Further, if someone's circuits are working in a higher topology, a lower topology analysis will not even see their true functioning. This turns out to be true for Tesla's work, where so many pundits have used vector or tensor algebra in the belief that they therefore knew what Tesla was doing. They did not, nor did they even use the proper tools to see what he did. For the proof, see Barrett's examination of Tesla's actual patented circuits, using quaternions {105}.

Energy, Wave Energy, and Wave Speed are All Dramatically Altered

The energy of a pure longitudinal EM wave (LW) is infinite (unlimited). In practice, only an imperfect LW is produced experimentally, and therefore its energy is finite, but that energy may be extremely large, and the wave's propagation may be many times faster than the speed of light. This is much like quantum tunneling, which has been measured to be superluminal. Nimtz et al., e.g., have transmitted Mozart's 40th symphony through a barrier in a waveguide at 4.7 times the speed of light {100}. Other researchers have transmitted information at lesser velocities but still at greater than c, the speed of light in standard vacuum.

Einstein assumed light speed in vacuum to be universally constant. That is correct for transverse photons and transverse EM waves, but not necessarily for other polarizations. Instead, it can be a function of the energy density of the vacuum (i.e., its stress energy density), which can be a matter of the gauge and the wave polarization. Further, c as a constant applies to transverse polarized EM waves (which are "surface" waves of the medium, so to speak) and not to longitudinal or time-polarized EM waves (which are "subsurface" or "subspace" waves). In general, the speed of the EM wave can be a function of the energy density of the vacuum (i.e., its stress time-energy density). And it is also a function of the type of EM wave being utilized.

"Empty space" is filled and writhing with the continual transiting of higher order EM waves, the presence of standing high order EM waves, and energetically organized regions where the energy is in the LW mode and in the time-density mode. Indeed, space (more correctly, spacetime) itself is nothing but a plenum of such waves and their wave-to-wave interactions.

The longitudinal and time-density effects in empty space are correlated with seasonal and periodic variations of time-charging and longitudinal EM wave emissions from planets, stars, etc. As a result, the characteristics of empty space itself periodically vary, and these can be detected as variations in the speed of light through the affected space.

The interplanetary radar measurements, e.g., do indeed show several periodic variations of the speed of light in interplanetary space, on a weekly and essentially monthly basis. In this data the proclaimed constant speed of light is upheld only by averaging the measurements over a month-long period, as shown by Wallace {106}. Actually, the scientists are dealing with variations of the periodically varying local time-density of spacetime, but have not taken that into account.

There are also specialized "galloping wave" zones, created by variations in the interferometry of the interpassing and interfering longitudinal EM waves in space. Such galloping waves from wave interferometry are already known in the literature {107} from 0.1 to 100 times the speed of light, but they do this on a "surge forward and lag backward" mode about an average speed of c in the laboratory here on earth. In space away from planetary masses, that value "c" varies from its textbook value also.

All that has really been shown is that interplanetary space is not quite uniform after all, contrary to present scientific assumptions.

One would think that this fundamental foundations anomaly shown by the interplanetary radar measurements would excite the entire scientific community and trigger a massive scientific investigation. Instead, scientists such as Wallace who publish critical analyses showing that the data directly prove the variation of c in "ordinary" space, are just ignored and essentially "parked on the side-lines" until they eventually fade away.

A Process for Creating Longitudinal and Time-Density EM Waves

Today we know that some plasmas very often can produce a longitudinal EM wave from a transverse EM wave, and can produce a transverse EM wave from an input longitudinal EM wave. This was not known when the Priore team was performing its experimental work. However, it provides one method for producing and detecting longitudinal EM waves.

The Priore team in France unwittingly made longitudinal EM waves by inputing transverse EM waves into Priore's rotating plasma in a giant plasma tube (Figures 12 and 49).

- At the end of the project, Priore had developed a large unit to treat humans.
- A few were treated.
- Cures replicated what had been done in lab animals.
- The massive size of the unit and long treatment time (hours) made the process bulky and very inconvenient — and expensive.
- We proposed a way to do it with a suitcase-sized unit and a treatment time of two minutes.*

Quantum Potentials and Multiply Connected Spacetime

It appears that a sufficiently clean longitudinal EM wave can be utilized to create a quantum potential, very similar to Bohm's notion, by iterative retroreflection between two phase conjugate reflectors. When sufficient iterative self-targeting occurs and persists, the waves eventually "snap in" and fully converge to laser-like beams without any energy divergence {97}. At that point, one has achieved an essentially "pure" LW, which has infinite velocity. For all practical purposes, there is then little or no difference between this wave and a quantum potential.

A pure longitudinal EM wave just "appears instantly" everywhere in space that it will be. It is already an element of a quantum potential. In this sense, all that a "quantum" potential is, is an ordinary scalar potential in which the composite EM longitudinal phase conjugate wavepairs really are pure longitudinal EM waves. It would seem that this also moves the gauge to the Coulomb gauge, so far as the potential is concerned. It follows that, by establishing significant and clean longitudinal EM wave contact between any two points via iterative retroreflections, one establishes a quantum potential if sufficient harmonics are established in the contact. The implications for "phase conjugate shooting" to go one step farther are obvious.

By "scanning" an area with the appropriate LW transmitter array, with deliberately imperfect LWs so that contact reaction occurs, and then decreasing the imperfections in the scanning by iterative retroreflection, it appears that a quantum potential can be created and connected between the transmitters and a desired distant region.

Essentially, in the case of pure longitudinal EM waves and quantum potentials, we must model the situation in terms of a multiply connected spacetime. The divergence-free waves are now pure longitudinal waves in one sense, and pure potential beams in another sense. In any case, the Coulomb gauge applies. As is well-known, the potential moves at infinite velocity in the Coulomb gauge.

Thus a single station can be connected by such a QP to any number of distant stations—by first "knitting them together" into a common multiply connected spacetime by iterative mutual LW self-targeting beams. It matters not if one or more distant station(s) is/are then moved beyond the star Sirius; the moment an energy signal appears in the initiating station, it is already instantly in each distant coupled station anywhere in the entire universe. There is no separation distance involved. Here one no longer needs to propagate transverse EM wave energy painfully through space at the speed of light. Instead, one is now dealing with multiply connected spacetime. One now has the instant appearance in each and every distant coupled target of the energy input into the single "transmitting" or "coupling" station. So the process is a startling and giant "energy amplification method" as should be expected from something that has infinite energy in the first place!

One vulnerability and disadvantage of a QP weapon is that, if the target is aware of one's coupling and also has QP technology, he can now immediately send back any energy form or "greetings" he wishes, from any one of his coupled targets. He can even do it inadvertently, without even knowing he has been coupled by a quantum potential. In other words, the QP provides a two-way street, if the target is aware of it and has the technology himself, and even if he is unaware of it and does not have the technology. For that reason, actual use of the QP weapon in strategic strikes requires caution and special considerations. Usually it requires very rapid single use and then cessation of any further usage.

Need for Caution with QPs Used Against Biological Organisms

Another QP weapon disadvantage is that rather extreme care must be rigidly exercised, particularly when linking living creatures. For living things, the QP is best utilized in the absolute minimum energy mode. E.g., an extremely weak OP already links every member of the human species. Suppose one increased that linkage intensity carelessly. Immediately the entire human race is in grave difficulty. Every death of a person feeds into every other living person. Every birth of a baby feeds into every living human. Even the fertilization of one human ova instantly feeds into all other ova. The integration of all those changes would totally disrupt—and instantly destroy—all human life on Earth. Since chimpanzees have very similar genetics to that of humans, all the chimps would probably die also. Other higher primates would also suffer or die, as would many other species.

What might be useful, of course, would be to use a QP to kill every smallpox, HIV, Ebola, and other dread disease pathogen on Earth. If so, it would first have to be made extraordinarily specific, else it could threaten all or most of the life on Earth.

A very useful adjunct would be to use a QP device to nearly instantly scrub and decontaminate (disinfect) an anthrax-contaminated large city—such as New York or Washington, D.C.—by instantly killing all the anthrax spores in that locality. Or to clean all the antibiotic-resistant staph pathogens out of U.S. hospitals by just killing them all instantly and periodically. Or to rid the Earth of necrotizing fasciitis—flesh eating disease pathogens.

An extremely localized QP could be used to connect with all HIV viruses and DNA inside an AIDS patient's own DNA. One could then kill the HIV viruses not yet integrated into the patient's cellular DNA. One could also time-reverse the patient's own HIV-infected DNA back to normal, effectively "removing" the HIV DNA already dumped into the patient's own infected cells. In theory, 100% of the HIV infection could be removed from the patient's body, restoring him or her to a completely HIV-free condition.

A Hypothetical Example

Suppose one arbitrarily increased the even weaker QP that presently joins all living things on Earth, regardless of species. Instantly every living thing on Earth would die, and the Earth would be instantly converted to a sterile planet.

Even though physically embodied life was gone, however, all the forms of those species would remain in spacetime activity, their vacuum engines—for both minds and bodies—forever embedded in the local potentials and fields of the material Earth. In other words, the Earth's potentials and the local spacetime potential would still be dimensioned and conditioned for the life forms that once moved upon it in physical form. The dimensioning and conditioning (engines) for every life form that ever lived on the Earth exists now at every point in the Earth and in the local spacetime. With proper application of energetics, in theory it is possible to recover any of these life forms desired, back into living form.

When one understands that environmental aspect, one understands why the Miller-Fox-Urey biogenesis experiments {108,109,110} (Figure 50) would still produce living organisms again. A physically dead planet or test flask is not necessarily a "completely dead" planet or flask, when one considers the presence of spacetime engines and dimensioned potentials. One recalls that these forms and engines contain not only physical forms, but also the mind-aspects and the mind/body coupling and dynamics aspects as well.

In short, the entire biochemical notion of biogenesis from truly inert matter devoid of any form of life or pattern of life appears to be a false premise. Since potentials reach to the end of the universe, then any structured potential structures (dimensions) the universal vacuum potential everywhere in the universe {111}. The Miller-Fox-Urey experiments were not performed in a truly "sterile" environment after all, when the new energetics is considered {112}. One realizes that the entire universe is alive; the mere presence of a single living microbe or other form anywhere establishes an entire living noosphere. The Russian researchers—such as Kaznacheyev {113}— into EM induction of disease in targeted cells at a distance also realized that biology included a noosphere, and it could be engineered.

- Engines of and from all life forms ever on earth or in the universe exist in the ambient vacuum potential.
- The Miller-Fox-Urey experiments were not in a "sterile" environment.
- Heat (IR) and UV constitute (1) a harmonic interval with a difference frequency, and (2) amplifying by the process previously shown.
- These experiments "kindled" previously living forms from the available gases etc. by amplifying the ancient living engines from their virtual state to the observable state, so that the masses were molded into the physical states of their templates.

Herman Kahn, then director of the Hudson Institute (a leading think tank), once remarked that it did not concern him that there existed mechanisms that would destroy all physical life on earth. Instead, he stated, it concerned him that he know almost 200 such mechanisms. The quantum potential weaponry is yet another doomsday weapon with a thousand lethal mechanisms to add to Kahn's list, were he still with us.

The QP Weapon Is a Superb Energy Amplifier "For Free"

In a multiply connected spacetime established between multiple separated (to the observer) stations, one can instantly input one megawatt of power into every distant stution by inputting it into a single station. Suppose that coupling station is coupled via QP to one million distant stations (scattered anywhere in the universe). Then in each distant coupled station there now instantly appears one megawatt of power, even though we have input only a single megawatt in our "transmitter" coupled station. This is a superb one-on-many weapon system and energy amplifier—perhaps the ultimate weapon system.[30]

AS an analogy for understanding, one can look at it this way. Put a dot (point) on a piece of paper. Mathematics tells us that an indefinite number of other points can be "superposed" directly on that original point. Now input some "energy" into the original point. It instantly appears in each and every other superposed point. That is precisely the way a quantum potential linkage between stations works, except that in normal singly-connected 3-space the points are observed by a normal observer to be widely separated. Aristotelian logic—which is an "either/or" logic—does not apply. Instead, a higher topology logic applies.[31]

[30] However, we should not be loo surprised at such "astonishing" effects, once we appreciate that with the quantum potential and pure longitudinal waves one is playing with infinite energy anyway.

The QP weapon can be used with microwatt input to induce low-level disease states or pre-disease states (shadow disease states) (Figure 51) in entire populations. Tests done in this fashion will violate the "vector carrier" aspect of infectious disease transmission. Instead, the tests will cause a few widely spaced nearly simultaneously cases of the disease being tested. Several such tests (e.g., with necrotizing fasciitis) have already been conducted in the populace of the United States.

Or a QP weapon can be used with megawatt or gigawatt input to blast multiple distant targets simultaneously. One may destroy, e.g., every single transmitter of a given type. Or one may instantly kill all ships and weapons and paraphernalia in a large naval task force steaming toward its target. Or if one wishes to take the ships and equipment, the weapon can just kill all the humans instantly in that task force. ICBM sites, e.g., are vulnerable and obsolete since 1990 to any nation possessing QP weapons. So are underwater nuclear submarines and long-range strategic bombers. The entire strategic and tactical armada we have built up so painfully over the decades is obsoleted—also meaning countered—by any enemy possessing sufficiently advanced energetics weapons, and particularly quantum potential weapons.

[31] We developed such a logic years ago, and have recently included it in Energy from the Vacuum 2002, ibid.

Other Novel Uses of QP Weapons

If an enemy has such QP weapons and you do not, you are easily and directly destroyed at will, once certain other deterrents are overcome. One of these previous deterrents that had to be overcome was the stability of nuclear weapons in our nuclear arsenal. To remove this stability and render them easily destroyed, the holder of a scalar interferometry capability could induce sudden massive fissioning and fusioning of many of the targeted onsite weapons if the scalar potential interferometers were used massively. However, the resulting tremendous nuclear explosions—many "in the dirt and dirty"—would also unacceptably damage the attacker. Further, major antagonists usually clandestinely introduced hidden nuclear weapons into the cities and target areas of their opponents, which practice was known as "dead man fuzing." The notion was that, even if one side suddenly destroyed the other, that destroyed side could still detonate its secret nuclear weapons hidden in the attacker's homeland territory, destroying him as well. In essence, the killed side (the "dead man") had set off the fuzing of his pre-planted weapons, to destroy the attacker even though the "dead man" was already dead.

One strong reason that the Russians pursued the quantum potential weapon so strongly was precisely because it offered a mechanism to solve this "dead-man fuzing" problem, removing it as a viable deterrent. Obviously it would be quite advantageous to be able to dud or destroy these hostile weapons in one's very midst, even though one did not know their locations, and pull the fangs of the dead-man fuzing installed by one's opponent.

There appear to be ways of directly connecting a QP, e.g., to every atomic nucleus of a given type, in a given region (say, in a region consisting of on the surface of the Earth, in the Earth to some depth, in nearby space, on the surface of the ocean, and beneath the ocean). Connection can be made, e.g., to every U235 nucleus and to every weapons grade plutonium nucleus. Or with the technology developed, the users ought to be able to make such connection only between certain pre-selected localized amounts of U235 nuclei or plutonium nuclei.

Now suppose that such a QP is established between weapon-sized groups of U235 atoms. Then one hits one U235 nucleus in such a group in an activator station with a neutron bullet. Voila! One simultaneously hits every other linked U235 atom (including the activator station—one just blew it to smithereens if it contained very many U235 nuclei) in such weapon-sized groups. The raw U235 in ores in nature is still okay if the ore contained only tiny traces of U235 nuclei. But all the "neutron-struck" fissionable nuclei in nuclear weapons worldwide—regardless of owner or location—fission in the weapons immediately. That destroys all the nuclear weapons on Earth—including the clandestine nuclear weapons that various nations have spirited into other nations perceived to be their enemies, as a "checkmate" against sudden surprise attack. One does not need to know where a weapon is at all.

However, it gets all the weapons by exploding them, and that itself could create a giant nuclear destruction and fallout problem that would probably do in most life on earth because a great many nuclear weapons will have exploded "in the dirt and dirty." In short, it is an entirely unacceptable solution to the dead-man fuzing problem.

Of course, no sane enemy would wish to use the QP in such fashion, because it is quite suicidal for him and essentially destroys civilization. But suppose the sane enemy is well aware of the exact nature of the new cold type nuclear reactions (we explained these in an initial rough paper given in August 1998 at an Energy conference in Utah). The energy initiating these "time-reversed" nuclear reactions starts from "inside" the nucleons in the nucleus and moves outward (that is true of any "reversed" zone).

- Via quantum potential joining U235 and Plutonium in warheads
- Includes weapons airborne, underwater, in storage
- Transmutations of the nuclides themselves
- Part of the initial barrage launched by Aum/Yakuza/KGB
- Will occur in the first minutes (10) of the strategic strike, following psychoenergetically crew-disabling QP weapons

Note: Duds both overt and covert nuclear weapons and weapons-grade materials -- including "suitcase-delivered" covert weapons on site in Russia which otherwise provide dead man fuzing

Figure 52 Simultaneous dudding of nuclear weapons worldwide. Also duds nuclear reactors and nuclear propulsion systems.

Direct isomeric transmutation then becomes a preferred decay reaction to induce in the nuclear weapons one wishes to dud. By gradually inducing (slowly "kindling") one of these transmutation reactions, one can just "transmute" the U235 to—say—an isomer such as U238, with some readjustment and energy balancing in the ensuing rebalancing decay processes. In that way, one gets no nuclear explosions. One can even choose the transformation or several successive transformations so as to minimize any resulting nuclear radiation. The attacker also destroys all the nuclear reactors, including those in civilian power plants, nuclear submarines, and elsewhere. But he gets just about all the nuclear weapons if he transforms both U235 and plutonium (Figure 52). In about 10 minutes he will dud them all, without any nuclear explosions, but he would probably allow about one hour "just for good measure and nearly 100% certainty."

This offered the Soviets the ideal solution to the worrisome hostile nuclear arsenals of the world, since they also had additional nonnuclear strategic weapons of a different kind and of great power.

Apparently that very kind of QP weapon became operational, on site in Russia, circa 1989 under KGB control. For the first time, it provided the KGB with a guaranteed solution to the nuclear dead-man fuzing problem that had until then prevented its massive use of the scalar potential interferometers (such as in 1985-1986 as originally envisioned by Brezhnev).

By almost simultaneously leasing the earlier scalar interferometer weapons to the Yakuza and Aum Shinrikyo at the end of 1989, the KGB obtained an influx of vast new funds {114}. It thus concentrated even more intensely on the more advanced energetics weapons such as QP weapons and psychoenergetics weapons {115}.

So with a QP weapon one can attack multitudes of targets, using a single "coupler" or "transmitter," all without "propagating the EM energy through 3-space." Further, with the technology developed, only the number of outrigger stations coupled limits the energy amplification achievable. One can alter matter at any level, from the quarks in the protons and neutrons in the nucleus, to the lattice bonds, to the molecular bonds, etc. Or one can structure the emerging energy (that emerges directly out of the local spacetime itself), so that structured local spacetime curvatures (engines) appear in the target zone(s). These ST engines can be generated so as to perform macroscopic functions against real systems—e.g., jamming electronics, as against the U.S. air attack on Libya in April 1986 (Figure 25), or as was done by a longitudinal EM wave interferometer in the attack and kill of the U.S.S. Thresher (Figure 6) in April 1963 {116}.

The U.S. Narrowly Escaped Destruction Twice in 1997 Alone

On two occasions in 1997 the United States would have been utterly destroyed by the die-hard faction of the KGB, except for direct countering by a friendly little foreign nation. The present author and three colleagues played a very minor role by alerting that nation to the impending attacks. There was certainly no reason to contact officials of our own country; the U.S. was and is powerless to prevent such attacks, although hopefully that is changing! It made much better sense contact the only nation that could possibly avert our impending disaster. Of course we later also informed proper U.S. government officials of our actions.

The first strategic attack was scheduled for between early to mid-February, and involved (1) dudding all nuclear weapons, (2) striking the QP weapons in the little nation simultaneously, as well as extant scalar interferometer weapon sites in other foreign nations, and (3) then leisurely blasting cities, facilities, and installations with iterative and continued scalar interferometer strikes. This third phase would include work assigned to the Yakuza/Aum Shinrikyo teams. That is how the Yakuza (and Aum Shinrikyo) expected to revenge themselves for the Western defeat of Japan in WWII, and for the West's dropping the atomic bomb on Nagasaki and Hiroshima. To be able to "get in on the kill" is why the Aum Shinrikyo and Yakuza leased the scalar (longitudinal EM wave) interferometers from the Russians in the first place {117}.

These, along with negative energy EMP weapons, are the kind of energetics weaponry that now determines our fate, and against which the U.S. presently has still inadequate defenses. Our own scientific community does not believe such weapons even exist—apparently due to the "not-invented-here" syndrome. Most of the U.S. scientific community is thus relatively useless and outdated as far as contributing to the strategic survival of the United States is concerned.

Purpose of the Novel Attack on Captain Button

Hopefully, some scientists are aware of the strange incident that involved the mental seizure of Captain Button in his A-10 (Figure 22) and controlling him for well over an hour (Figure 23), including controlling his perceptions, intent, and actions while performing complex technical tasks. That was the test of a KGB psychoenergetics weapon, developing and to be deployed by the KGB. That was the "acceptance test", so to speak—deliberately conducted over the United States—for the KGB's system that would be produced in numbers sufficient to counter the QP weaponry, if the QPs of the little friendly nation were to be placed in the insane command and control mode. This was yet another Soviet counter, planned for the near future against the counter by which the little nation did force abortion of the KGB second attack (scheduled for May 1) in 1997.

The purpose of the attack on Captain Button can be understood as follows: The later second scheduled strategic attack on the U.S.—scheduled for May 1, 1997—was forcibly aborted after the friendly defending nation switched to an insane command and control mode. The insane C3 mode counters the MindSnapper type attack that instantly kills all on-site operators and renders the sites too "hot" for new personnel to come in from outside and control it. In short, the U.S. could have been destroyed in that scheduled May 1 attack, but with the change of the friendly QP weapons to insane C3, Russia would also have perished in the immediate quantum potential counterblow from the little nation[32] that would have been automatically delivered by the site weapons themselves. The May 1 attack had been predicated upon the fact that a preliminary MindSnapper (negative energy EMP) attack on the friendly QP weapon sites would have instantly killed all persons on site,[33] and neutralized the site for some months because of the resulting longitudinal EM radiation. However, the shift of the C3 of the QP weapons to insane mode rendered such a pre-emptive MindSnapper attack totally ineffective because Russia would still have been destroyed.

[32] There are also variations. As an example, the insane C3 can also include a separate channel requiring a countering "punch in" code every 15 minutes (as in a heightened alert status) or the control system will order the launch initiation (this accepts that all on site personnel have now been suddenly killed). So the insane control system is also flexible, and many variations and considerations are possible.

Hence another countering means was required, and in fact that additional system was already in development. It was a very sophisticated array of psychoenergetic weapons, each with a special, highly trained team of operators capable of fully controlling one targeted individual while he was directed and controlled to go about performing desired technical tasks. We estimate that it required one psychoenergetic weapon (very complex, multiple transmitters) and an operator team of perhaps 20 to 30 skilled operators (one for each major human function to be controlled) to adequately control the mind and actions of one distant person performing quite technical tasks. Hence several hundred such "weapon sets" were required to take over all persons on the targeted QP weapons sites in the friendly nation, have the controlled crews deactivate the QP weapons including using the security code and procedures to standdown for maintenance, etc.

Once the QP weapons were totally on standdown, then the MindSnapper would have struck suddenly and killed every living thing on site, neutralizing the site for several months due to subsequent strong longitudinal EM wave emissions from the struck site. No new crews could have entered the site and lived, so the sites could not be operated after MindSnapping, even though the QP weapons were still intact but just on standby. Of course, a third phase then would have involved strikes by scalar EM interferometers to leisurely and completely destroy the systems and sites, permanently taking out the physical system as well.[34] With the first two of that three-part series of strikes completed successfully, then the KGB weapon sites would have been absolutely free to blast North America and our European allies into smoking ruins, leisurely and at will, given the first 10 minutes of dudding all nuclear warheads worldwide, to take care of that old type of "dead man fuzing".

From the open reports of the Button incident, and from the kill of Captain Svoboda a few weeks later, the nature of the next strategic attack that would be scheduled was immediately apparent. Accordingly, we warned the little nation about the shift to a new attack plan, and estimated the new schedule between mid - 1999 and the first of 2000. Of course, we also passed that information on to our government as well, but apparently, no one believed it. The proper U.S. intelligence agencies, however, certainly intercepted my faxes to the little nation's Military Attache in Washington D.C., and particularly my fax a few days before May 1, sent directly to the Prime Minister of that nation and urging the change to an insane command and control system for the QP weapons and the reason why.

[33] We point out that it required a longer time to develop the more powerful negative energy EMP weapons capable of just destroying the sites, personnel and all. The first effective weapons of that type could easily kill personnel brains, nervous systems, and hearts while still doing little damage to the much more robust QP systems and on site equipment.

[34] We strongly believe there are shielding provisions at those sites, against scalar interferometry attacks, which reduces their effectiveness and delays their destructiveness. However, so far this analyst has not deciphered those shielding methods or mechanisms.

It turned out that, some months after I alerted them to the coming psychoenergetics, MindSnapper, and scalar interferometry attack in that order, to be scheduled between mid-to-end of 1999, apparently the friendly nation suddenly struck and utterly destroyed the KGB facilities for the MindController negative energy EMP weapons being painfully built up in sufficient number. Probably scalar interferometry weapons were used to destroy them. The onsite psychoenergetics crews and facilities were destroyed and neutralized completely.

Anyway, as we passed mid-1999, the type of "Y2K" problem we were worrying about was whether or not the attack was on, headlined by a psychoenergetics weapon strike on the little nation first, with the three phases as previously scheduled back in 1997.

Later, in early 1999 I realized the Russian/KGB development of the causal system robots (Figure 10), mentioned in the introduction. In the latter part of the third quarter of the year, working at my computer at night, I was struck by one of these very beasts from within my computer (Figure 20), in very bizarre but unmistakable fashion (previously detailed). In 10 seconds I was nearly killed and severely disabled for a period of time (it took four days to recover completely). Because of the features deliberately utilized by the CSR on my computer screen so I would recognize it, I grasped the nature of the attack (the KGB wanted me to recognize it, and live to tell about it!), how it was done, how it jammed the brain and vision center and strongly fibrillated the heart, upset the equilibrium, etc. I also realized that, in 20 seconds or so additional exposure, I would have been a very dead person, expiring with a very violent heart attack and severe brain embolisms. Note that the CSR deliberately struck directly from the computer screen through my retinas and onto the nervous system, passing through the vision center and flashing it tremendously, and jamming my mind, brain, and nervous system.

When I recovered shakily about four days later, I notified the small nation, once again, as best I could, giving the exact symptoms of the attack and explaining what it was. By then I knew what was coming down, the form it would take, and the deceptive cover (Y2K uncorrected errors!).

The little nation then quickly proceeded to search out—apparently inside the North American signals, potentials, fields, and waves "superhighways" for the CSRs—all the CSRs and destroy them in place. It turns out to be a fairly straightforward operation, once one possesses advanced longitudinal EM wave interferometry weapons and techniques. Locating a "very dense" and very dynamic set of LWs performing organized functions is analogous to a normal radar locating a large bomber in cloud cover. One "burst" from the LW "radar," and the targeted CSR is completely disrupted and electronically destroyed.

So a very short (lasting a few days) and strange strategic battle was fought in infolded space or subspace, inside our electrical and electrical systems and inside the fields, potentials, and waves in them. A mighty attacking armada of perhaps several million main battle systems was intercepted and destroyed throughout our homeland, without the slightest notice by our own government, scientific, and intelligence communities. And without a whimper of what is usually recognized as "combat actions".

Afterwards, a very simple and innocuous little message was received which, reading between the lines, simply meant "thank you very much." In short, my hard-pressed colleagues and I got a small "Attaboy!" for our role in alerting the friendly nation.

So Y2K and the Millennium Celebration came, while we waited to see if the CSRs were gone or if they would erupt with damage all over the U.S. Fortunately, they were gone like popping balloons, and so the fourth scheduled strategic attack upon the U.S. in the space of three years—this time actually launched—was successfully destroyed.

Whatever I can do to help the survival of my country I will continue to do without hesitation, regardless of whether the U.S. scientific, intelligence, and military communities are aware of the new threat or not, and regardless of whether they believe it or not. Presently our fate and that of the Western world rests on the shoulders of a small but advanced and friendly nation. That is beginning to change, it seems, but still not swiftly enough to suit our needs.

We simply must change all that, by developing QP weapons and defenses ourselves. It is not an option; as an example, China has now finished—as of earlier 2002—and deployed QP weapons. Almost simultaneously, China also finished and deployed the more powerful negative energy EMP (MindSnapper-type but much more powerful) weapons and deployed them as well. So we have entered a very dangerous period when the strategic changes that are likely to occur will be both massive and traumatic.

AS this is being written in early October 2002, it is obvious that our nation is also preparing to strike Iraq if need be, either with a coalition effort or alone. If so, then Saddam Hussein will certainly unleash whatever terrorist forces he has in North America. He will attempt to unleash upon us all the weapons of mass destruction at his command. This could even happen within the next 30 days, with the MidEast exploding, giant polarization of the Arab world, general chaos in the MidEast and upset of world oil supplies, and skyrocketing fuel and energy costs with severe impact upon the already seriously ailing U.S. stock market.

If Saddam Hussein succeeds in doing sufficient damage to our cities and energy infrastructure with more weapons of mass destruction than we have credited him with, then the potential economic collapse of the United States and much of the developed world is an uncomfortable possibility. If that happens, turf wars will erupt all over the world, the world economy may collapse, the KGB and rogue Japanese (Yakuza and Aum Shinrikyo) will move and unleash further destruction, Pakistan and India are likely to erupt into a nuclear war, and several other regions may also erupt into nuclear war and use weapons of mass destruction. What China might do in such event is anybody's guess.

In short, the Armageddon we have so long feared, with the resulting collapse or destruction of much of civilization, could well be approaching. Let us hope that dark picture is terribly, terribly wrong, and that we successfully avoid Armageddon one more time!

Meanwhile, we would be in much better shape to weather the coming storm had our scientific community not grossly betrayed us. But if and when millions of Americans are dying in the streets with no effective means of treatment, and no effective defenses to prevent onslaught after onslaught against our nation, all those deaths and all that suffering will be directly the fault of our own organized scientific community.

Rogue Japanese (Yakuza and Aum Shinrikyo) Have a Role

In the information briefing furnished the previously named agencies, we briefly detailed the elements of the attack, how our own nuclear weaponry can be dudded anywhere, etc.

We also detailed the strange role of the Japanese Yakuza and the Aum Shinrikyo, who leased the operational use of the early generations of KGB longitudinal wave interferometry weapons in 1990 directly from the KGB. The first down payment on the lease was $900 million. I previously furnished pertinent information on this to an investigative U.S. Government agency. Since then, the Yakuza have set up their own scalar interferometry weapons development facilities in Japan, including portable energetics weapons,[35] and have assumed a very secret and nearly unsuspected role somewhat similar to Bin Laden's role in the attacks of September 11, 2001—but much more deadly when the coming Armageddon erupts.

Inducing the Gulf War Disease

In 1986, the Russians had already solved the dead man fuzing problem theoretically, but had not yet completed the development and deployment of the necessary QP weaponry. The KGB's first "combat demonstration" test of the ability to localize a QP in a selected region of space was against the U.S. air attack on Libya in 1986. That test apparently used a laboratory apparatus to prove the process. In short, it was a major milestone whose success moved the system into full production engineering and production. The system was then developed at very high speed after the successful demonstration in 1986. The first strategic KGB QP weapon(s) became operational on site in latter 1989.

[35] We strongly suspect some of these portable weapons have already been infiltrated into the United States—e.g., to be used against nuclear power plants and other lucrative targets such as refineries, oil fields, etc.

It was this QP weapon that was used to generate the so-called Gulf War Disease in our soldiers in the MidEast. In the action package, I explained precisely how that was done. I have also finally placed the simplified gist of that explanation openly on the Internet for all to see (website www.cheniere.org). Those suffering U.S. veterans were casualties of war, not victims of just nerve gas whiffs or chemicals or their own stress, etc. The initial U.S. Government and U.S. scientific community's assertion that "it was all in their heads" and due to stress, insults every veteran who has ever served his nation. One justifiably has contempt for such treatment of our veterans. Sadly, the latest "studies" are beginning to conclude the same thing once again.

Apparently our intelligence and military command agencies have not yet learned the lesson of the decades long Soviet microwave radiation of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, which was responsible for health changes of many kinds in U.S. personnel and was also responsible for the deaths of three U.S. Ambassadors to the Soviet Union. Apparently we are still using radar engineers and electrical engineers for electrodynamics analysis, and these analysts apparently still believe that in the absence of the EM fields there can be no induced EM effects. One sadly comments that, just as the electrical engineering departments of our universities have been unable to walk across the campus to the particle physics department and find out what the discovery of broken symmetry in 1957 portends for their discipline and model, then the intelligence community apparently has not yet learned that no EM analysis of such things as the microwave radiation of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow or the shootdown of the TWA-800 is worth a tinker's dam unless it is a higher group symmetry EM analysis. As Barrett showed, our fellows still have not grasped what Nikola Tesla already accomplished in actual patented circuits circa 1900 and shortly thereafter. Tensor analysis and vector analysis simply will not show what is really there.

Our veterans were hit with a "cocktail mix" of specialized disease "spacetime curvature engines" just below the observable threshold, in the "shadow" (virtual, but nearly observable) state[36] (Figure 53). The immune systems and the cellular regenerative systems do react to that shadow state level.

[36] One should think deeply about this, in terms of the solution to the source charge problem (which our engineers have not thought of very much, much less solved). Every charge already "engineers" the virtual stale at will, converting virtual energy into deterministic observable EM energy. That means we can directly engineer the virtual state vacuum itself if we put our minds to it. Actually Nobelist Lee has already pointed out that we have not even tried to do this! See T. D.

Such a "simultaneous mix" shadow induction "spreads" the reacting finite immune system and regenerative system (Figure 53) and their resources all across that entire mix of shadow diseases, so that only a much smaller portion of the immune system and of the regenerative system is directed against any one of the shadow diseases. This in turn greatly heightens (by a factor of 5 or more) the susceptibility of the body to all additional disease pathogens, and it greatly lowers the ability of the body to recover from any disease or biological warfare strike. In addition, the exposed veteran's body fluids and masses have accumulated a persistent "time-density charging" that very slowly decays (by emission of weak longitudinal EM waves) over months or even a few years.[37] The sperm from these veterans did indeed have the innate "engines" and therefore the capability to gradually infect their wives. So did the saliva in their mouths. The weak "dimensioned" LW radiation from their bodies could also slowly alter the cellular regeneration and immune systems of their family members in close proximity, over a period of time, thus inducing the disease in them {118,119,120}.

Lee, Particle Physics and Introduction to Field Theory, Harwood, New York, 1981, in his "Chapter 25: Outlook: Possibility of Vacuum Engineering," p. 824-828. On p. 383 Lee points out that the microstructure of the scalar vacuum field (i.e., of vacuum charge) is not utilized. We add that the West does not utilize it. It has been utilized for some decades in the former Soviet Union and now in the continuing KGB energetics and bioenergetics weapons programs.

[37] See T. D. Lee, "Can Time Be a Discrete Dynamical Variable?." Phys. Lett., 122B(3,4), Mar. 10, 1983, p.217-220.

The induction of GWS in our troops was in fact a test for the present clandestine use—already ongoing—of that technique to spread the immune and regenerative systems of the targeted U.S. population. This in turn gradually makes us more susceptible to terrorist BW attacks and disease pathogens of all types from anyone else. This tactic is already in place and accomplished, and it will substantially increase the American civilian casualties in our cities when they are subjected to terrorist BW attacks in the near future. Those attacks now will have some five times the effectiveness that our present planners estimate. In short, it is going to insure the deaths of millions more Americans. The approaching war in the MidEast, with Saddam Hussein's unleashing of his terrorist assets in the U.S. to the maximum extent possible, thus will probably see a five-fold increase in the effectiveness of some of his mass destruction weapons that Hussein's assets are able to unleash on America.

The entire affair of the Gulf War Disease was both a preliminary test and also a magnificent intelligence probe by the KGB, to clearly demonstrate once again that the U.S. Government and the U.S. scientific community are still nearly totally unknowledgeable of QP weaponry, immune and regenerative system "spreading," disease induction by bioenergetics means, etc. It follows a methodology used with great success for four decades by the KGB,[38] and one that our own government, scientific community, and military community has yet to decipher. So long as the threat only slowly increases, Americans remain complacent in their ignorance, ignoring the boa constrictor slowly strangling them, while awaiting the cobra seen in the distance?[9] We have unwittingly cooperated with the KGB boa constrictor for four decades, even as it slowly prepared to crush us. In the Gulf War, that crushing moved to the next threshold, to actually inflict casualties and deaths on U.S. troops and totally get away with it because of the bioenergetics (in the Russian sense) ineptness of the U.S. scientific community.

[38] The decades-long microwave radiation of the U.S. Embassy and induction of health changes and diseases, was a case in point. A high level target—the U.S. Ambassador—was involved, guaranteeing U.S. Government attention at the highest level. Puzzled, the U.S. government would then call in their most trusted EM scientific analysis groups. By the responsive actions then taken by the U.S. at the Embassy, the KGB could ascertain with absolute certainty whether or not our scientists knew of the use of infolded engines in bioenergetics. For more than four decades our actions assured them with 100% certainty that we knew nothing of what their "information content of the field and potential" actually was, or how it had been weaponized and was being used right in front of our faces and before the entire world.

[39] It is bizarre that our scientific community—even after those decades of EM induction of diseases and health changes in American personnel in the U.S. Embassy in Moscow—still do not and cannot believe that conditioned EM radiation can induce cellular disease. Such total blindness is inexplicable.

40-Years of Russian Induction of Diseases In U.S. Embassy Personnel

Sadly, our own fellows have never even figured out how the diseases and health changes were previously induced by the KGB for decades in personnel in the former American Embassy in Moscow. Three U.S. Ambassadors to the Soviet Union died as a result of their exposure to that radiation. Many other Americans on site were made ill or suffered health changes.

When Johns Hopkins scientists studied the problem, they found a most anomalous thing: no health changes occurred in areas where the EM forcefields existed in the microwave radiation. Instead, the health changes only occurred in areas where the potentials were gradient free so that the force fields were zero—and thus the potentials (and their specific internal "engines") were persistent. Using only a classical EM force field analysis—which does not show any of the internal longitudinal EM wave substructuring of the fields, potentials, and waves—the Johns Hopkins scientists erroneously concluded that it could not have been the weak microwave radiation causing the health difficulties, because no such health difficulties occurred where the forcefields were present. That is, they very naively assumed that "no force fields" meant no EM effects were possible. Their entire findings thus were based on a total non sequitur, the assumption that there can be no electromagnetically induced physical changes in matter in the absence of fields! The Aharonov-Bohm effect alone falsifies that entire premise. So does general relativity and higher group symmetry electrodynamics.

Actually, the Johns Hopkins scientists had just clearly proven the exact opposite: that it indeed was the radiation that induced the health changes. That is simply shown statistically, and it is a deep and continuing mystery how good scientists and their governmental overwatch did not notice the violation of inference methodology.

Simply put, there was 100 percent correlation to the presence of gradient free EM potentials— the persistent kind. There was zero correlation (or 100% anticorrelation) to the presence of the normal electric and magnetic fields—i.e., where the potentials changed over a very small region of space. Hence it could only have been the constant potentials, else we must throw out statistical inference theory altogether.

If the changes had not been caused by the EM radiation at all, one would have had some health changes in regions where fields were present and some health changes where the fields were absent. Considering the lengthy time the radiation persisted and the number of personnel affected, the statistics are decisive. Without question, the cause was indeed the persistent potentials where the force fields were zero. Whittaker's two papers—one in 1903 and the other in 1904- would then show how it was done. The 1904 paper and superpotential theory alone would not have explained it, since that alone does not include the "information content of the field"—i.e., spacetime curvature engines infolded inside the normal EM potentials, fields, and waves.

So, the U.S. government and U.S. scientific community "botched it badly," unfortunately, by elemental statistical inference standards. And unfortunately, they have continued to "botch it" to this day. Both the scientific community and the intelligence community missed it. Elementary statistics theory alone, coupled with the Johns Hopkins results, clearly indicates that the microwave radiation was causing the health changes, to a very high degree of confidence.

This demonstrates how "totally inexplicable" some of the effects generated by longitudinal EM wave interferometry and by "structured" or dimensioned potentials, fields, and waves can seem to our conventional scientists. If we examine the serious foundations flaws in classical electrodynamics and electrical engineering taught in our universities, and the near-total lack of higher group symmetry electrodynamics training, we can understand why our scientists and intelligence analysts did not and do not have the background required to properly assess the incidents and effects.

Western Electrodynamics Is in Sad Shape

Actually, numerous scientists have long pointed this out. For example, quoting Mario Bunge {121}: "...it is not usually acknowledged that electrodynamics, both classical and quantal, are in a sad state."

In quantum electrodynamics, it is the potentials that are the primary causes of all electromagnetic phenomena, not the force fields as used by Johns Hopkins and the Government in its analysis. We know that classical EM is wrong in its focus upon force fields as primary EM causes; the Aharonov-Bohm effect, Berry phase, and geometric phase work in some 20,000 papers in the physics literature already show that. Indeed, we also know that the classical force fields do not even exist apart from mass; in space, only the potential for such a force field exists, in case some charged matter is brought in to interact with the EM entity as it exists in mass-free space (as curvatures of spacetime).

The Aharonov-Bohm effect and its implications have been published in Physical Review—our most prestigious physics journal—since 1959. Later publications have included the Berry phase extension of the AB effect, and Aharonov and Anandan's further extension of the Berry phase to what is today called the geometric phase. The potentials are indeed the primary EM causes, and the force fields do not even exist as such in mass-free space, but only in mass. Yet our classical EM taught in our universities has not been changed in its fundamental acceptance of the material ether since 1865.

Every university in America is still teaching and defending a rather mangled electrodynamics where

(1) The material ether is still assumed, even though destroyed more than a century ago by the Michelson-Morley experiments;

(2) The force fields are erroneously assumed to exist in massfree space, but in force-free form(!!!) when what actually exists there as an EM disturbance is a general relativistic perturbation of spacetime (i.e., an oscillation of the local curvature of spacetime). Actually, force identically is the time rate of change of momentum, where momentum is mass times velocity. Thus mass is a component of force and force field. There is no force or force field without mass. As Feynman put it, there is no force field in massless space; instead, there is only the potential for such a force field to be formed at the various points, should a charged mass be placed at (added to) each of them;

(3) The source charges are erroneously assumed to create their fields and potentials and all that energy in them, reaching across the entire universe from each and every charge, right out of nothing at all. This perpetual motion and creation of energy error continues even though particle physics has known (and proven, both theoretically and experimentally) that any charge (as a set of composite dipoles, when the charge is taken with its clustering virtual charges of opposite sign) is a broken symmetry in its fierce energy exchange with the vacuum. Hence the charge extracts that energy in its fields and potentials from the active vacuum, and outputs the extracted energy across space {122}.

Our own electrodynamicists and electrical engineering professors and departments would have us believe - and they continue to imply such in every university in America—that every charge is a perpetual motion machine clearly in violation of the master energy conservation dictum that energy can neither be created nor destroyed. The complete lack of scientific understanding that every charge extracts energy from the vacuum and freely and continuously pours it out as real observable EM energy, is reflected in rather silly "witch-hunts" {123} against electrical systems which exhibit more energy output than the operator himself inputs—i.e., systems which exhibit a coefficient of performance (COP) of COP>1.0, which are open EM systems far from equilibrium in their active environmental exchange.

Let us reason together! If the second law of thermodynamics really did prohibit COP>1.0 electrical systems, then it also would prohibit the demonstrated COP = oo of a solar cell array. It would also prohibit the demonstrated COP>1.0 mechanical systems such as a windmill, waterwheel, or sailboat—all of which have COP = oo! In other words, the second law cannot even be a law if it discriminates only one type of energy prohibited from being used for COP> 1.0,

For some inexplicable reason, EM COP>1.0 systems have come to be dogmatically labeled "perpetual motion machines" by the professional skeptics since EM systems must take their excess energy from the known active vacuum environment! In short, the dogmatic scientific community is saying that "windmill-type EM systems" with COP = oo are permissible for exchanges with physically active and observable environments (such as the sunlight used in solar cells, the heat in the air used in heat pumps, the water currents used hydroelectric power plants, the winds used in windmill power generation, etc.), but they are not permissible for exchanges with the proven modern active vacuum virtual particle flux energy environment, even though the discovery of broken symmetry in 1957 already proves that all EM energy is indeed freely taken from the seething vacuum environment by the asymmetry of the modern dipolarity of the source charge! We refer the interested reader to the proven broken symmetry of opposite charges {124}. We also refer the reader to Nobelist T. D. Lee's statement applicable to the skeptics' naive notion of symmetry. Finally, in modern physics all the major forces of nature are generated by the exchange of virtual particles. It is these forces that then translate against a resisting mass or entity to provide useful work. So all useful work in the universe already comes from the interactions of the seething virtual flux of the vacuum. On what distant planet have the skeptics been hiding while all this modern physics has been developed?

One must keep one's sense of humor! It is ironic but true that every major university in the U.S. continues to teach, uphold, and advocate—by implication—EM charges as ubiquitous perpetual motion machines, freely creating energy from nothing. And that is those professional skeptics and witch-hunters never mention that their own naive understanding of electrodynamics already implicitly assumes and teaches perpetual motion machines freely creating energy from nothing at all—and on a scale unparalleled in scientific history!

We have one chart with some 32 major foundations errors and flaws in the electrodynamics taught in all our schools; there are many others in addition. This erroneous teaching has so indoctrinated our graduate students that most electrical engineers no longer know the real difference between power (the rate of change of form of energy and thus the rate of production of work) and rate of energy flow (whether it is being dissipated or not).

Every textbook speaks of "sources furnishing power," when it is the rate of dissipation of energy in the individual loads and losses to provide the rate of doing work that constitutes power. Sources do not furnish power! They furnish energy flow (specifically, their source dipole furnishes energy flow, extracted and transduced directly from the active vacuum, and only a tiny bit of that enormous energy flow is diverged into the circuit and used). The various components of the receiving circuit interact with that energy flow to catch and dissipate a little of it, thus producing power and work locally in the intercepting and dissipating component.

A massive nondivergent (nonintercepted) energy flow has zero power (time-rate of doing work), but if intercepted and diverged, the divergence may develop enormous power (time rate of doing work) in and upon the interceptor, diverger, or collector. Even many physicists today are confused on the difference between rate of work and rate of energy flow per se. E.g., for about 30 years now, there has been a polite debate involving that very subject in the American Journal of Physics. It is still not completely resolved, because the argument has not actually addressed where all EM energy in fields, potentials, and waves comes from in the first place: directly from the seething vacuum via the asymmetry of the source charge. It also has not addressed the long unaccounted giant Heaviside nondiverged energy flow component.

Toward a Deeper Electrodynamics

The first thing the Soviet Academicians did after WW II was to completely overhaul electrodynamics, but in highly classified areas controlled totally by the KGB. Stalin's boot firmly planted on their backside saw to it, creating the terrible fear that if they failed to produce, they would surely die. Not having experienced such a "Stalin boot," our own scientific community continues leisurely onward, while it teaches 110 years old electrodynamic material filled with non-sequiturs.

The Russian use of the "information content of the field" euphemism is a case in point. Our fellows (in both the intelligence community and the scientific community) assume the Russians are speaking of simple transverse EM wave spectral analysis. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Let me explain.

In 1903, E.T. Whittaker—a leading theoretical physicist at the time—showed that any scalar potential is comprised of a harmonic set of bidirectional longitudinal EM wavepairs. Each pair consists of a longitudinal EM wave and its true phase conjugate replica (i.e., its "antiwave", or time-reversed twin, coupled together).

Unknown to Whittaker, that LW wavepair actually includes a time-density wave in the time domain, coupled to a longitudinal EM wave in 3-space. Per quantum field theory {66}, such a coupled pair would be observable as the scalar potential. Knowledge of this specialized coupling is necessary in order to properly decipher the Priore mechanism. That mechanism was demonstrated to time-reverse (dedifferentiate) a diseased or damaged cell and all its parts back to it previous normal state, genetics and all. The time-reversal was accomplished by "pumping" the cell and all its parts in the time-dimension so that time-reversal propagation of the mass-energy is achieved. The time-domain pumping is done by the associated time-density wave, which always accompanies any longitudinal EM wave a priori. So sometimes we sloppily say that the "longitudinal EM wave pumping" causes the time reversal of the mass, but it is really the associated time-density wave pumping that causes it. The time-density wave component also can cause time charging or time-excitation charging of a mass. During its alternate existence as masstime, the time portion is altered, and that is a time-excitation or time-energy excitation.

It turns out the human cellular regenerative system (Figure 29) also uses the same time-excitation charging methodology to produce time-pumping of the cell and all its parts. This produces a slow time-reversal (dedifferentiation) of damaged cells back to a previous state. This is in fact the basic mechanism for healing, as used by the living body.

Reversing aluminum, for example, just converts it back to ordinary aluminum. Not too interesting.

Reversing an HIV infected cell, however, would produce a healthy, normal cell with normal genetics. When a damaged cell turns into a cancerous cell, it is due to a process called promotion (change of the cell to a cancerous cell). Reversing a cancerous cell would change it back to a healthy, normal cell again—in short, it would constitute demotion of cancer and then healing of the damage in the now normal but damaged cell. In the AIDS patient, simply pumping the entire body with the time-density wave accompanying the longitudinal EM waves produced in a plasma—as Priore did for terminal tumors—would time-reverse all cells, completely ridding them of any residue of HIV infection. This would remove all the "HIV factories", thus completely solving the problem of AIDS. We have also uncovered a more advanced process where matter can essentially be directly engineered in any conceivable manner, including nuclear transmutation etc. We have filed a Provisional Patent Application and will file formal patent applications on those processes in the future, as soon as funds are available (patent attorneys are expensive!)

Time Is Highly Compacted Energy

Since time is energy compacted by some $9x10^{16}$, even small time-density changes can produce enormous spatial energy, should any of that compacted energy be transduced from time-density waves into transverse EM waves and thus into spatial EM energy. Such transduction can indeed occur in nonlinear materials and processes, such as in electrolysis.

The New Transduction Model Explains the Cold Fusion Results and Mechanisms

In August 1998, we presented a conference paper pointing out that cold fusion uses this very transduction of EM wave types, one into the other. We presented such new concepts as (i) TW to LW to TDW transduction and in the other direction also, (ii) time density charging of a particle to an excited time-density state (analogous to energy charging to an excited energy state), and (iii) the observation that excess phase conjugation in a local region can generate a time reversal zone where like charges attract and unlike charges repel.

With these concepts we were able to explain the excess heat appearing in the cold fusion experiments of hundreds of researchers. We also came up with (iv) a totally new class of nuclear reactions without the usual high-energy considerations. That is, we showed the exact nature of the electronuclear reaction that is forming the anomalous nuclides in cold fusion experiments. Production of the new nuclides was revealed to be simply what one would expect from this mechanism, as indeed was particle clustering of like-charged particles.

We also explained (v) all the instrumental anomalies occurring in a series of well-documented cold fusion electrolysis experiments at China Lake. In fact, (vi) we added a completely new term to the conservation of energy law, thereby extending it.

An updated explanation is included in my new book, Energy from the Vacuum, 2002, ibid. With the new transduction interactions, one must state that the total energy in (a) spatial energy form, (b) mass-energy form, and (c) time-energy form is what is conserved.

So when transduction occurs in cold fusion experiments (electrolysis), some of the time-density charge energy is gradually transduced into ordinary transverse EM wave energy, which as it scatters produces excess heat not accounted for in present particle physics interaction models.

Scientists with only the "old" 2-term Einstein conservation law in mind, will be firmly convinced that this excess heat represents a violation of conservation of energy, hence is impossible. So they will question the calorimetry ability of the cold fusion scientists, etc. Unfortunately, the more ardent defenders of the orthodox faith will unjustifiably impugn the intentions and morals of the experimenters themselves with vicious ad hominem attacks. Such has indeed been precisely the case. Many of the harsh scientific critics have acted like cur dogs in a pack attack, and not as scientists at all.

Once one analyzes cold fusion in the new 3-term conservation manner and with the new transduction concepts, one immediately sees that the overall conservation of energy is upheld, while the special case represented by the former energy conservation law (conservation of the sum of the spatial energy and the mass-energy) is permissibly violated. The former case was a special case in that it arbitrarily assumed that no transduction of time-energy into spatial energy or mass energy—or vice versa—occurred.

In essence, successful cold fusion experiments show that, via transduction, a bit of time itself can be "utilized for fuel" and transduced into ordinary EM energy. Energy-wise the system has become a nonlinear open dissipative system[40] far from thermodynamic equilibrium {125}. As such, it is permitted to (1) self-organize, (2) self-oscillate, (3) output more energy than it itself has, by merely receiving, converting, and using excess energy from its environment (in this case, from the transduction of a tiny bit of the time-charging that has occurred), (4) power itself while simultaneously powering a load or performing useful work, and (5) exhibit negentropy. With the exception of transduction of time-charge into excess energy, all of that is already in the thermodynamics texts, though it has not been clearly spelled out in electromagnetics texts. The source charge, e.g., exhibits all five of those capabilities. The inclusion of the time-domain as part of the external active environment, however, is an extension of previous open dissipative system work by leading researchers such as Prigogine. It dramatically extends the meaning of "active environment".

[40] But we point out one idiosyncrasy of thermodynamics, which defines a "closed system" as one in which mass does not cross the system boundary, but energy is free to exchange across that boundary {125}. Hence, eerily a "closed thermodynamic system" is actually an open system with respect to energy exchange between system and environment. As such, energy-wise the system can be a system far from energetic equilibrium with its external active environment, and still be considered a closed thermodynamic system! Energetically, a closed thermodynamic system that exchanges energy but not mass is permitted to exhibit COP>I .0 and even COP = oo!

Why There Is a Time Delay in the Onset of Cold Fusion Phenomena

With an energy-to-time compaction ration of $9\text{x}10^{16}$, energy processes have to transduce spatial energy into time for quite a while in order to build up very much time-excitation charge. This leads to an initial delay in the onset of the "new law" transduction phenomena, as directly shown by the vast majority of careful cold fusion experiments. This build-up occurs during the "palladium-lattice loading" time, e.g.

By the same token, there is a time delay after cutoff of the input power to such experiments, during which time the slowly decaying time-density charge by its transduction into spatial energy continues to maintain the anomalous new processes (such as excess heat production) as they slowly subside. So the hours-long or even days-long delay phenomena after input power shutdown are also explained by the new approach.

In summary, there exist some very anomalous but very good experiments by excellent scientists—more than 600 of them—that are at least totally consistent with the above new wave polarization transduction model. Consistency with experiments is the first element of proof (it is necessary but by itself it is not sufficient). The new model also contains and obeys the conventional conservation of energy law until the new transduction phenomena become observable, at which time the extended energy conservation law applies. So in its lower limit, the new model corresponds to the present model—again, another requirement of any model purporting to extend a scientific area past that area's conventional model description.

The KGB weapons scientists—not the regular Russian academic establishment—have about a 40-year lead on us in all these areas. While our own scientists have dallied and pursued the standard model, the Russian weapon scientists have produced the equivalent of 10 Manhattan Projects, back-to-back, in the "new" energetics area.

The Early Soviet Longitudinal Wave Interferometers

Using longitudinal EM waves, the early KGB energetics interferometers could pass their beams right through the earth and ocean. LWs readily penetrate matter, reacting with it only weakly.

Some LW interferometry was also done using ordinary EM waves as carriers for the LW wave functions. Each such transverse wave carrier is in fact two scalar potential functions (Whittaker 1904, the initiation of superpotential theory). In each scalar potential for which functions are extracted and used to make the normal transverse carrier wave, there exist LW biwave pairs comprising said potential. So by assembling the desired LW biwave subsets, the two scalar potentials and their resulting interference-produced carrier wave are internally structured as desired. This is the use of the so-called internal information content of the field. We speak of such a deliberately structured potential, field, or wave as having been conditioned, dimensioned, or activated. If these terms are deemed inappropriate, just use the more generic term "internally structured." Then one has to explain what the "internal" is, and how this "internal" can be "structured."

In the distant interferometry zone, those dimensioned potentials, fields, or carrier waves would interfere and produce the desired alterations in the local spacetime (including specific spacetime curvature engines). Remember, the potentials are just bundles of special waves. We are discussing a special form of nonlinear multiwave interferometry, where the individual waves and waveforms comprising the total wave package assembly constituting a carrier have been carefully chosen in advance.

In the local spacetime in the distant interference zone, such multiwave longitudinal EM wavepair interferometry creates ordinary EM waves and energy that arise directly from each and every point in that individual interference zone. We stress that ordinary transverse wave EM energy propagation through the intervening space between the interferometer transmitters and the distant target does not occur.

In January 1960, in a speech to the Presidium, those are the weapons then in final engineering development for production that Khrushchev spoke of as "fantastic new weapons".

Khrushchev Killed the Thresher to Prevent His Own Dismissal

The first deployed large force-structure interferometer weapons became operational circa 1 April 1963. Khrushchev was still smarting from his Cuban missile crisis fiasco and his humiliation by Kennedy. Having overplayed his hand and gotten caught,[41] Khrushchev was desperate to stay in power and not be thrown out by the Communist Party leaders for such a massive loss of face.

On April 10 of 1963 Khrushchev used his new interferometers to reach through the earth and ocean and "kindle" EM jamming in the electrical controls of the U.S.S. Thresher nuclear submarine underwater off the East Coast of the U.S. The reader should recall that, wherever the interference zone is established—including in the earth or underneath the ocean, in the atmosphere, or in space—the energy arises directly out of the local spacetime. There is no Faraday shielding of such effects, which do not depend upon ordinary transverse wave EM field energy propagation through space. The energy appears everywhere within the targeted object, simultaneously.

It is extremely important that the reader recognize the dramatic difference in the way energy propagates in the new mode as compared to the old "propagation through space" mode. In the old mode, energy transport arises in one spatial location and is considered to proceed serially through the intervening spatial points to the intercepting and interacting particle's location. The Poynting model presently uses only this mode. In other words, the energy propagates from without the object to the object, and thence inward inside the object, if possible as the object interacts.

On the other hand, when the energy arises at each and every point in spacetime, it then propagates outward from each arising point. Thus in the nucleus of an atom, the "energy flow" starts at all interior spatial points and flows or diffuses outward in all directions. So the energy "meets" and interacts with the quarks in the nucleons, before it meets the "nucleon as a whole" and translates it. For this reason, with energetics it is easier to alter and "flip" quarks in nucleons than it is to translate nucleons, since one is using the new energy propagation mode. This simple reversal of the outside-to-inside energy propagation to an "inside-to-outside" mode, is a revolution in particle physics and effects on materials.

In fact, the energy dramatically enters the "interior" areas of nuclei, nucleons, etc. in a manner heretofore impossible or extremely difficult to achieve by high-energy physics, which can only do it by smashing into the object with sheer brute kinetic energy. Therefore the new "inside to outside" energy propagation mode can produce—at feeble spatial energy—extraordinary nuclear interactions not possible by brute force "outside-to-inside" energy propagation means. By controlling the structuring of the arising of the energy at each point in spacetime, the energy structure interacting with the quarks and other interior components can be tailored to order. This is the primary secret of transmuting an element at a distance by a specialized energetics weapon. The structuring of the emerging internal energy can be deliberately tailored to change quarks in—say—some of the nucleons of U235 and plutonium nuclei. In this fashion nuclear warheads, nuclear powerplants, and nuclear propulsion systems of atomic submarines can be altered at a distance, beneath the earth's surface, beneath the ocean's surface, in space above the earth, etc.

[41] Oddly, had he simply waited a few more months or a year before injecting the missiles and nuclear warheads into Cuba, Khrushchev's strategic scalar interferometers would have become operational. With those in operation, a "Cuban missile crisis" might well have had a different outcome.

The EM "hash" emerging from the Russian interferometry simply jammed the electrical controls and systems of the Thresher from inside its very electrical circuits. Out of control and helpless, the Thresher sank to crush depth and imploded (Figure 6). The EM "splatter" from that interferometry, arising from the local spacetime throughout a surrounding region, engulfed the Skylark, the surface companion of the Thresher. The resulting spurious EM jamming severely interfered with multiple electronic systems on the Skylark. Several electronic systems just ceased working altogether. Their electrical forces were time-energy excited and time-reversed so that electron currents in them became impossible (blocked).

It required over an hour for the Skylark to transmit an emergency message back to the Navy that the sub was in difficulty, through all that interferometry jamming effects. The Russians undoubtedly "tracked" the sub till it imploded, then cut off the interferometry. As the "time-density charging" in the area slowly diminished, all failed electronic systems in the Skylark returned to full functioning. This was because the excess time-energy excitation just decayed away, so that electrical currents could again flow.

Khrushchev Demonstrated the Powerful Blast Capability of Strategic Interferometry

The next day, 100 miles north of Puerto Rico, the same KGB interferometer weapon was powerfully pulsed to produce a giant EM burst deep under the ocean's surface (Figure 42). A cone of water rose up from the surface to about a half-mile in height, observed by the startled crew of a passing U.S. jetliner and reported to the FBI and Coast Guard when the aircraft landed in Florida. As it rose, the cone of water spread into a cauliflower shape typical of a deep underwater nuclear burst that does not vent the gas bubble. Then that giant cauliflower of water fell back out of the sky and into the ocean. The second successful demonstration of Khrushchev's scalar interferometer weapon had been made for the benefit of the Presidium and the leaders of the Communist Party.

With those two dramatic tests, Khrushchev had killed the latest and greatest U.S atomic submarine and demonstrated the awesome power of energetics weapons. He had shown the leaders of the Communist Party that the U.S. had no inkling of his new superweapons. He had struck the U.S. a formidable blow in a direct act of war—but a new kind of clandestine energetics war—and gotten clean away with it. Now it was Kennedy, rather than Khrushchev, who had been duped. So had the entire U.S. Intelligence Community and the U.S. Scientific Community. Sadly, mostly they apparently remain duped or partially duped to this day.

Khrushchev managed to stay in power nearly two years longer by these two demonstrations. So the KGB/Soviets embarked on a decades-long program of buildup and development of the new weaponry, clandestinely, in order to take the U.S. by surprise attack and destroy it utterly.

In 1972 Brezhnev named 1985 as the target year when Russia would be able to do as it pleased, and would essentially control the land, the oceans, and space {126}. This was stated at a secret meeting of the European Communist parties in Europe. A British intelligence agent was in the meeting, and furnished the U.S. that information. Later it was openly released and published.

The Russians met that 1985 deadline, and the resulting increase in killing U.S. missiles and aircraft in 1985-1986 was most indicative. Other indicators such as massive weather engineering were already ongoing.

Weather Engineering Over North America

The first KGB weather engineering tests over the U.S., using their relatively new interferometers, produced signatures of anomalous perfectly round holes appearing in clouds. These experiments started in 1967 or thereabouts. The Russians gave us that very severe "deep freeze" winter of 1967, as an initial weather-engineering test of their energetics interferometry weapons.

The KGB communists do have a sense of historical dates, and they often do things on certain dates in symbolic fashion. Full-time Soviet weather engineering over North America started in earnest on July 4th, 1976—our Independence Day and our bicentennial. This was the KGB's "gift" to the United States on such a historic occasion. Full-bore weather engineering over the Americas has continued to this day, and even increased. It was passed into the hands of the Yakuza and the Aum Shinrikyo upon their leasing of those interferometers on site in Russia at the end of 1989. In 1985 I produced a rather crude videotape[42] (40 minutes) with pictures of the giant radial cloud signatures etc. associated with such weather engineering operations since 1976.

The basic weather engineering method is simple. Use an LW interferometer (LWI) to reach through the earth and cool the air in a region and produce a high-pressure area, due to the densification of the air. Use another interferometer to *heat an*other area and form a low-pressure area, due to the expansion of the air. Then carefully steer those highs and lows by gradually and slowing rotating the distant antennae and slowly adjusting the interferometry range simultaneously, according to a calculated schedule.

[42] T. E. Bearden, "Soviet Weather Engineering Over North America," 1985.

By that means, the LWIs easily catch, entrain, and steer the jetstreams largely responsible for our weather. Put sharp loops and twists in that steering, and the huge angular momentum of the jetstreams developed in those sharp turns and circles will spawn tornadoes, violent weather, etc.

The first complete weather engineering system over North America in 1976 also used the Woodpecker's normal EM carrier signals with dimensioning and internal assemblage of the composite longitudinal EM wavepairs. A giant "interference grid" was established over much of North America. A great deal of local adjusting of the interferometry in the grid was necessary. These local grid readjustments caused "sudden popouts" of EM energy, creating many atmospheric booms, rumbles, and explosions.

To really stir up big weather trouble, the Russians—and now the Yakuza and Aum Shinrikyo—also heat or cool areas of the ocean where El Nino and similar "water engines" form. A dimensioned LW interferometer is required for this operation. By slowly and protractedly heating or cooling the water in one of the "warm water engines" fueling the weather, one causes a very significant, long-term, later effect on perhaps an entire continent.

One can create great droughts in some areas, great floods in others, etc. The KGB has been doing this extensively, since 1976. The great floods in Red China a few years ago are a direct example of KGB/Yakuza weather engineering, as is much of the extreme heat of 1998. In fact, thanks to the weather operations of the Yakuza under their KGB mentors, 1998 was the overall hottest year on record till then, since records were kept. At least for the summer of 2002, the record may have been broken again, with a significant season of giant forest fires burning away.

One purpose of the excess heating of the atmosphere, of course, is to do damage. An added "benefit" to the KGB is to furnish support to the environmentalists who are concerned about global warming. Understand, there is indeed such a thing as global warming. But by augmenting the atmospheric (and ice sheet) heating just a bit in a single year, the statistical analyses are skewed. The skewed analyses will show that the global warming problem is far more imminent than it really is, if the LWI engineering of it were suspended. Nobody on either side of the global warming debate seems aware of the LWI intervention that is ruining the results of their models and calculations.

In turn, the heightened global warming indications, detected as a result of the LWI interruptions, impel strong activist support for such things as the Kyoto treaty, which is specifically designed to the strategic detriment of the U.S. if and when the U.S. Senate ever approves it. The Kyoto treaty does not even apply to some 160 countries including Russia, China, etc. This focuses a certain proportion of our government time and effort in grappling with an inflated global warming problem, immediately. It directly fits the KGB strategy of "spreading" our government energy and attention all over the map, anywhere but upon the coming strategic energetics strike and upon energetics weaponry.

The die-hard section of the KGB strategists are chess players. They will come at you anyway, anyhow, and anywhen that they can. Everything that can be impressed to serve or support the overall objective, will be impressed and used. That is the overriding principle when analyzing Russian KGB strategy.

Khrushchev meant every word of it when he said to Nixon in their famous Kitchen Debate: "We will bury you!" Interestingly, to this day Americans and their government officials have continued to be deceived as to exactly what Khrushchev meant. He meant it literally.

Earthquakes to Order

According to U.S. Defense Secretary Cohen, electromagnetic induction of earthquakes is now recognized by the U.S. Department of Defense, considering his little-noticed statement in Georgia in 1997, which we previously quoted. An interesting exchange of induced earthquakes (Figure 54) had occurred in latter 1988 and early 1989. Here two sides seemed to be "counting rifles."

As Secretary Cohen made his April 1997 statement obliquely recognizing the scalar interferometer weapons, the little friendly nation had just completed countering and averting a massive strategic energetics strike upon the United States and Western Europe, scheduled for May 1, 1997 —just three days later. A little more than two months earlier, a previously scheduled attack had also been countered and averted by the same friendly little nation.

Once one can reach into or through the earth and ocean and create energy in a desired interference zone, induction of earthquakes is simple. Use the interferometers to deposit energy in a fault zone over a period of time. Keep it up, and the piezoelectric plates build up enough mechanical stress to forcibly "slip" and produce an earthquake.

Put the energy in very slowly, and one gets a long "overpotential" effect where the rocks do not slip for a long time, while the energy builds to higher levels due to the static friction of the rocks. Then there occurs a rather rapid catastrophic slip. In short, one produces a large destructive earthquake. The KGB weaponry can produce earthquakes of the highest magnitude if they work at it.

If one wishes to induce a quake in an area where there are no known faults, then one simply focuses the interference zone there inside the solid rocks and proceeds to deposit the energy, preferably rather quickly (in hours instead of days). The entire rock will be expanded and it will fracture, producing an anomalous so-called "flat plate" earthquake.

Around the early 1900s, the "normal" rate of large earthquakes was two or three per year. That gradually increased after WW II. During one week in year 2000, there were some 20 major earthquakes around the globe. Obviously, someone is doing it, since this is far beyond what could be expected naturally. Presently that "someone" is mostly the Yakuza and Aum Shinrikyo, on site in Russia and leasing the LWIs. With the scheduled CSR attacks forcibly aborted, the KGB has the problem of restraining an increasingly impatient Yakuza and Aum Shinrikyo group, while keeping them paying the lucrative lease money. Consequently, inducing some big earthquakes is one way to "keep the troops occupied and busy." Shooting down the occasional aircraft or missile is another way.

I worked for 8 years or more with an inventor (Floyd Sweet, now deceased) who had an energy device {127,128} sensitive to artificially induced quakes of that fashion, even such quakes thousands of miles away. The device would sit right on top of a normal quake and not react. We could tell within some 8-10 thousand miles—and often even for greater distances— which quakes were artificial and which were natural.

So during that period I was able to clearly ascertain what was going on, and who was doing what to whom, and which quakes were normal and which were manmade. Several artificial U.S. quakes, the Armenia quake, and a subsequent big quake in Russia were particularly interesting in the mid and latter 1980s. The huge 1976 China quake was directly induced by the KGB.

In 1984, on my behalf Roy Brewer {129} had briefed President Reagan on these scalar interferometry weapons (Figure 55), then briefed the National Security Council. Let us hope that these high level briefings may have borne at least some fruit.

Readying the Weapons for the 1985 Readiness Demonstration Tests

In latter April 1985 I received an urgent call from my close colleague Frank Golden. In his avionics repair work, he suddenly found that his best calibration instruments were very "noisy." He replaced one expensive instrument, and the second was "noisy," also. A third proved equally noisy. This was unparalleled. It was not the instruments, but instead it was all the electronics to be repaired, that were emitting electromagnetic noise!

So Frank borrowed one expensive instrument and brought it home for the weekend. He altered it by a proprietary method so that he could detect energetics radiation. Voila! The entire earth was alive with Soviet energetics signals. The weak interferometry of so many signals impinging into the weakly interacting electronic systems to be repaired, had generated the electronic noise his instruments had detected.

In response to Frank's call, I immediately proceeded to his location. I personally observed on the oscilloscope, as detected by Golden, some 27 pairs of Russian energetics signals, each of the two in a pair being 12 kilohertz apart. (We have previously explained why two frequencies are used, and one "pretends" one transmitted the difference frequency). Each of these frequency pairs represented the entire earth held in entrained resonance. Each pair was an "energy tap" in the earth, extracting enormous energy from the heat of the molten core of the earth itself and outputting it as 12 kilohertz power for transmission to giant interferometry weapon sites.

Each "tap" was extracting energy sufficient to power perhaps 4 to 6 of the giant intercontinental energetics interferometer weapons. We were observing something like 100 to 150 massive weapons on line and radiating. A full-up strategic dress rehearsal—or preparations for a full-up strategic attack on the U.S.—was underway.

Gorbachev was still a "new man on the job" at that time. Further, 1985 was the 40th anniversary of the end of WWII, and a very important occasion for the Communists and in fact for all Russians. The May Day celebrations that year went on for several days, not just on May 1.

What we were seeing were preparations for a massive May Day weaponry demonstration in and around May 1, 1985. We were observing the preparation and demonstrated readiness of all that great armada of Soviet energetics weapons, to meet Brezhnev's 1985 schedule laid down back in 1972 {126}.

Longitudinal EM wave communications to deep underwater Soviet subs, the huge interferometer armada, and everything else—all were being readied and demonstrated. I can assure the reader that observing full rehearsal of preparations for the next World War was a most sobering experience.

After May 1, most of the armada of interferometers was stood down again because it had been demonstrated that the "ready schedule" had been met. All but one of the giant energy taps in the Earth were also stood down again. That one remained active.

The May Day report to the heads of the Communist Party that year must have really been something!

As usual, apparently our own scientific and intelligence communities did not detect the main activities, and would not have believed it if one told them. They certainly did not believe it when I published it in 1986 in Fer-de-Lance, but labeled it sheer fantasy or at best total conjecture.

It was neither fantasy nor conjecture. It was direct experimental measurement. It was in fact what used to be called scientific method. The problem with our intelligence agencies was that they operated behind policies. Once the policy is decided, then regardless of what the intelligence analysis indicates, anything against the official policy is just ignored. This neat little policy method of doing business has resulted in making our intelligence agencies some of the most political-minded and manipulative groups on Earth.

Meeting the 1985 Schedule for Readiness

In 1985, KGB/Russian preparations began in earnest for the energetics weapons readiness projected for that year by Brezhnev in 1972. Being full-bore tests, these actually went after destruction of vehicles and killing people. These were actual acts of war. The so-called "Cold War" was not nearly so cold as pictured in the news media!

Early that year, an LWI was used to cool the combustion in the engines of a jet liner off the coast of San Francisco, bound for Los Angeles (Figure 56). This flamed-out the engines. The stricken craft fell 30,000 feet before the time-density "cooling" charge drained away, sufficient for the pilot to restart his engines and limp into San Francisco. Gravitational and inertial anomalies—a clear signature of the use of this EM/GR weapon—were exhibited upon the personnel in the cockpit. The official investigators ignored those signatures; after all, such is not in their standard checksheets! And everybody knows the standard checklists are already perfect!

KGB Crews Regularly Practiced Against U.S. Rocket Launches from Cape Canaveral

In a late Nov. 1985 night shuttle launch at Cape Canaveral, the Russian interferometer crews continued their practice of using the U.S. shuttle launches as convenient "simulated" ICBM launches, for energetics interferometer crew practice (Figures 15 and 16). EM missiles (balls of EM energy formed in the area by distant LW interferometry through the earth) were used as the "destructive agent", but were offset from the actual launch in order not to destroy the shuttle. This was normal crew drill, not combat operations. The practice range for energetics weapons is—as might be expected—the actual targeted area and targeted nation itself.

As shown in Fer-de-Lance, I published an actual picture (Figure 15) of such a KGB EM missile strike, offset from that shuttle launch in late Nov. 1985 and snapped by Bob Gladwin. I also published an actual picture of a second such EM ball of glowing energy (Figure 16), over the launch site for the same launch, and used as a registration point (the LWs deviate slightly in passage through the earth, since the potentials in the earth are not constant). George Suchary took the second photo.

A standard artillery "shift-from-known registration point" method of firing was being used. In other words, the crews establish LW track on that EM registration ball, right through the earth. That represents a point having a known set of coordinates—a registration point—established in the firing computer. Then when the targeted strategic missile (in this case the shuttle's main booster) ignites, the interferometer also tracks the huge ionization target of the exhaust with the same weapon system.

That gives a known relative location of the missile rear end, with respect to one's registration settings for the registration point ball of light. Then add some meters to move up onto the missile body proper, and voila! The center of the target missile that will be fired is now in the bulls-eye, so to speak. That is a standard "shift from a known registration point" method of shooting, well known to every artillery group on the planet. The "marker beacon" is what is known as a "high burst registration," except it is not a burst but a steady ball of energy maintained over the area as the registration point.

The distant rocket or missile can now be destroyed in a variety of ways:

(1) Just create a sudden EM surge arising right in that spacetime (that is, just pulse the interferometer). That burns out some of the inner electronics of the missile, causing partial or complete missile failure.

(2) Sharply pulse the interferometer to introduce EM energy surges and sparks in the fuel or solid propulsion, igniting it massively and blowing up the rocket. Works well for aircraft fuel tanks as well.

(3) Form another EM missile and hit the missile broadside with that, burning through it and destroying it immediately.

(4) Hit it with an explosive EM missile internally, instantly exploding the missile into pieces. Or

(5) Hit it with several of the above simultaneously.

Suchary and Gladwin had captured the direct evidence of KGB dress rehearsal for the strike and kill of the Arrow DC-8 in Gander, Newfoundland about two weeks later.

Kill of the Arrow DC: Practice Turned into Performance

Two weeks later, the same KGB weapon tested against the Cape Canaveral shuttle launch was used to destroy the Arrow DC-8 at Gander, Newfoundland, killing some 256 occupants, 248 of them being U.S. soldiers returning from peace-keeping operations overseas. The aircraft was not iced up; later that was clearly established.

See Figure 17. As the ill-fated Arrow aircraft began its thrust down the runway for takeoff, it was already under LW interferometer track (the exhausts of the engines were being precisely tracked) by distant KGB operators. The KGB operators simply began to cool the combustion gases in the engine combustion chambers as had been done to a U.S. jetliner earlier that same year (Figure 56) off the coast of San Francisco (there they had completely flamed out the engines). Now they did not want to flame out the engines during take-off, but just wanted to reduce the thrust of those engines.

So the available thrust of the engines began decreasing as the aircraft picked up speed on the runway toward takeoff, even though the turbines were rotating at full speed. For powered flight, it is the thrust-per-drag ratio that is important. One can reduce that ratio by ice-loading and therefore increasing the overall aircraft drag, as all Transportation Safety Board checksheets assume if the engines are at full rotation and if operation and icing conditions are present. Or one can reduce the ratio by reducing the engine thrust itself, as was done for the Arrow, even though the plane is de-iced. All the Transportation Safety Board checksheets assume that it has to be drag increase, and thus due to icing.

The National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB) investigators know nothing about longitudinal EM wave interferometry and its capabilities—and its development by several nations of the world. Neither do their checksheets. Sadlly, the NTSB is not even aware that the electrodynamics and electrical engineering it assumes is so perfect is in fact a decrepit old model based on century-old errors. They are unaware that much better electrodynamics models have long been developed for particle physics, because the crusty old classical model is totally inadequate. Their checksheets also are "unaware" of anything really modern such as electrodynamics models of the higher group symmetry kind.

The thrust reduction by combustion gas cooling does not appear on the official checksheets and is never considered. It is not considered to this day. It will probably still not be considered this century.

Observers on the ground heard those engines "laboring," which can be a direct symptom of combustion gas cooling and engine thrust reduction. Rough running and missing can be another, if the cooling increases. Engine flameout occurs when the combustion no longer can be sustained because of the dramatically lowered temperature of the gases.

The Arrow Pilot Sensed the Lack of Power, But the Aircraft Was Immediately Hit

See Figure 17. At rotation and liftoff, the pilot of the Arrow DC-8 immediately sensed his lack of lift, and started a slow turn to the right, apparently intending to come around and land again as an emergency measure. Meanwhile, crossed beams had formed in the sky above and off to the right side. From those crossed beams of light, there shot down a bright "streak" of light that struck the fuselage of the aircraft in the right side, ahead of the engines. That was the EM missile strike—just as had been offset from the shuttle launch two weeks earlier in Florida, and photographed by Bob Gladwin.

That piece of Arrow DC-8 fuselage hit by the EM missile, with the burned hole in it, was recovered and tested. Tests showed no explosive residues on the edges of the hole, so it was not made by a bomb or other explosive device. Instead, it was made by an EM missile of the type that over a decade later hit the TWA-800 several times off Long Island and killed it.

In the Arrow aircraft's kill, the fiery EM missile sharply ignited the plastics in the forward cabin, which explosively outgassed. One product of such outgassing is hydrogen cyanide. A whiff or two, and all the passengers in that section were already dying of cyanide poisoning. In the autopsies of the recovered bodies, about half the passengers were already dead of cyanide poisoning before the plane impacted the ground and exploded. They died while that aircraft was still flying and sinking tail-first toward the ground.

The results of those autopsies were deliberately withheld from the Canadian investigative board.

The impact of the EM missile on the Arrow DC-8 was clearly recorded by sharp, vertical EM surges (spikes) in traces on both data recorders on board the aircraft. In Gravitobiology, on p. 82 I printed the recorded sensor responses for that signature also.

Elements of the U.S. Government Deliberately Suppressed Vital Evidence

Several eyewitnesses, including Judy Parsons, physically observed the formation of the crossed beams in the sky. Parsons and perhaps others actually saw the streak-down and strike of the EM missile when it hit the doomed Arrow DC-8. Parsons tried to testify, but her testimony was never allowed to be heard by the Canadian Transportation Safety Board. A major U.S. News agency interviewed her, but then squelched the story for some "unknown reason." Other witnesses (who are still reluctant to come forward) did observe the strike of the EM missile also.

Why would the U.S. government deliberately suppress information relating to the cause of the deaths of 248 of our soldiers returning from peacekeeping missions overseas? Why were they so determined that this direct act of war be declared an "accident" in the face of overwhelming evidence that it was not an accident at all?

Iran Contra was not yet divulged at the time. Recall, at very high level our own fellows had directly violated the law, and were engaged in the illegal Iran Contra fiasco up to their eyeballs. Also, some officials in Washington in certain high U. S. Government circles were in near panic, in their personal (erroneous) firm belief that a MidEast-sponsored terrorist bomb had destroyed the Arrow. In that case, so they reasoned, with the murder of 248 of our soldiers, the American public would be so aroused and angry that they would force military action against the MidEast nation or group, and that would then reveal Iran Contra. Too many highly placed people's hands were dirty!

So extreme spin control was the major requirement. Damn how many American soilders had just been killed in an overt act of war against the U.S. Damn the implications of the use of eerie new weapons we did not possess. A hue and cry from the U.S. public would almost certainly reveal Iran Contra and smoke out the duly secrets. That must not happen at any cost. Some high officials—particularly the ones who engage in such illegal acts, in assassinations, murders, etc.—are far more interested in covering up their nefarious deeds than they are interested in any kind of justice or morality. Consequently, the fix was in.

So U.S. officials placed enormous pressure on Canada to produce a finding of icing. Lots of other skullduggery occurred, which probably constituted criminal activity by some U.S. officials. A high-ranking U.S. military officer arrived on site quickly, apparently under orders to erase that scene as fast as possible. He almost immediately wanted the Canadians to bulldoze over the site, even before recovery operations were complete and while the investigation was just getting underway. The site was bulldozed over in unseemly haste not long thereafter. That would appear to possibly constitute deliberate tampering with the evidence at an official site of investigation, on the part of whoever ordered the General to bulldoze the site precipitously.

In addition, witnesses such as Parsons were never allowed to testify. The Canadian Board waited until the half of its members who strongly opposed any ad hoc finding were absent, and hastily approved a finding of icing as the cause of the "accident." Later the disgruntled Board members who were absent when the "voting" occurred, issued their own minority report. Unfortunately they knew nothing of scalar interferometry and energetics weapons, and so they strongly believed it had to be sabotage and explosives.

Anyway, the blackguards hiding Iran Contra buried the incident, and the savage kill of 248 of our soldiers and 8 civilians went unpunished. Anyone such as the present author who pointed out what had really happened and why, was just branded a lunatic. After all, the blackguards who do not flinch at murder and unapproved assassination do not blink an eye at slander and libel.

The sad part is those fine young soldiers and the 8 civilians who were killed, and the grief and lasting changes made to their families. It is the children who had to grow up without their fathers, the mothers whose husbands were suddenly dead, etc. They deserved much better from their government than they got.

Other Direct Energetics Signatures on the Arrow DC-8

Meanwhile, in the lifting DC-8 the strike of the EM missile had also time-density charged the forward cabin materials. Those materials slowly decayed from their excited states via longitudinal EM wave emission. When a human body is subjected to fairly significant LW waves (accompanied with their time-density waves), it gets its internal immune system and cellular regeneration system "jammed," since these systems use LWs and accompanying time-density waves. The cells and tissues are also "time-energy charged" as well, and so spurious LWs continued to be slowly emitted in their tissues and cells locally, leading to gradual, general debilitation. After a time delay for the effects of this time-charge decay to be exhibited, such exposed persons will get sick with odd symptoms of various diseases such as influenza.

The ground handlers on the scene and exposed to the struck materials of the aircraft, were also exposed to longitudinal EM wave radiation from those materials which had been instantly "time-charged" at the powerful strike. Hence they were exposed to fairly significant LW waves, and should therefore have shown later symptomology.

Some 60 or so of the ground handlers actually retrieving the crash materials later sickened with all sorts of mysterious maladies: dizziness, stomach cramps, flu-like symptoms, weakness, nausea, fatigue, etc.—precisely what would be expected if some the materials they were handling were emitting longitudinal EM radiation, exposing them to significant LW radiation. That is a clear signature again of a strike by an EM missile, and the exposure of those retrievers to LW emissions. In no normal way could 60 of those ground crewmen handling the wreckage debris all come down simultaneously with the exact symptoms of

LW radiation sickness, unless that was what it actually was.

Many of those sickened persons remained debilitated for years. Probably a few are still alive and debilitated.

There are other signatures on the Arrow DC-8 kill. I did a small bit of work on the problem in the interests of Arrow airlines, but of course the conventional investigators they also hired could only conceive of an ordinary explosive. Nevertheless, I did tell them as best I could what happened to their aircraft, their crewmembers, and our own valiant soldiers.

Our troops on board the tragic Arrow DC-8 did not die from a simple over-iced plane that crashed as a result of carelessness in deicing operations. They died as the result of an act of war against the U.S., carried out by the KGB as a test in an entire series to demonstrate the 1985 readiness that Brezhnev had specified in 1972. That war is still partially ongoing and undeclared to this very day, with other players such as the Yakuza and Aum Shinrikyo also now in the game—and possibly even the Chinese, who certainly have had the weapons for some time, and have had QP weapons and negative energy EMP weapons since earlier this year (2002).

With the kill of the Arrow DC-8, the KGB made its deadline that had been set down 13 years earlier by Brezhnev. To meet the 1985 schedule, something significant had to be killed successfully and clandestinely, no later than Dec. 31, 1985. The KGB made the schedule on December 12, 1985, by killing the Arrow DC-8 after a warm-up and full dress rehearsal against a U.S. night shuttle launch at Cape Canaveral about two weeks earlier. And they also demonstrated just how ignorant of such energetics weapons and their usage the U.S. government, scientific community, and investigative boards really were.

We were fortunate they did not just go ahead and kill that same shuttle in late November 1985. Instead, they waited and killed the Challenger a few months later.

Other Acts of War Completed the Milestone

Apparently the final demonstration of milestone completion called for the destruction of an aircraft, kill of an ICBM, kill of a space shuttle, induction of earthquakes, and demonstration of the new quantum potential weapon still in the advanced laboratory stage. The KGB completed much of the milestone demonstration in 1985. The remainder they completed in 1986.

In January 1986 they killed the space shuttle Challenger, and the very next night the KGB even gave a big party in Moscow, to celebrate the "perfect success of their active measures" against the shuttle. General Daniel O'Connor, former head of U.S. Army intelligence, personally issued an alert to many high-ranking U.S. government officials, pointing out the almost certain involvement of the KGB and the fact that the loss of the shuttle was almost certainly due to a hostile act by the Soviets.

In April 1986 (May Day report time was coming!) the KGB killed a Titan ICBM fired from Vandenberg Air Force Base. They also induced several large earthquakes for practice, and then began the induction of the long-dreaded "giant California quake" in the San Andreas Fault zone.

This latter induction of what would have been a massive quake in both San Francisco and Los Angeles, and all along the San Andreas Fault, was countered (destroyed) by a civilian group known to this author, with a backlash that resulted in the Chernobyl incident.

In April 1986 (for the same May Day report) the KGB also demonstrated the effectiveness of their newly emerging quantum potential weapon against the convenient U.S. air attack on Libya (Figure 25).

Kill of the Titan Missile Over Vandenberg Air Force Base

In 1986, the KGB began gingerly using those energetics interferometry weapons to kill other U.S. aircraft and several U.S. missiles, including killing a Titan 34-D fired from Vandenberg AFB on 18 April 1986. The Titan was killed 9 seconds after launch, partially crippling the U.S. space surveillance program. That kill was part of the demonstration of readiness milestone completion.

There was a completely decisive signature on the kill of the Titan. Simply check Aviation Week & Space Technology, 124 (17), Apr. 28, 1986, p. 18, where a picture (the one taken from longer range) of the Titan explosion is printed. Look about an inch above that explosion, which is already well developed. There above the Titan explosion sits the KGB ball of light registration point, just as it was sitting over the night shuttle launch in Cape Canaveral in latter Nov. 1985 when videotaped by a private photographer.

I persuaded NBC engineer Ron Cole and his colleagues to analyze a copy of that video tape frame by frame. In 17 frames, that little ball of energy above the explosion moved off on its own course, independent of the Titan explosion. Since the launch area for such missile launches is controlled and there were no aircraft over the explosion, then one again has a very clear signature. The KGB killed the Titan, with 100% certainty.

That of course was a test of the interferometry weapons in the role of Launch Phase ABM system. Tested against the Arrow, the KGB operators were emulating test of the system in a Launch Phase Antibomber role. These were vital strategic weapon tests. I published details of the use of the weapons in many other roles.

Dead-Man Fuzing and Outside Assistance Deterred a Full Strategic Attack in 1986

We have previously documented and published why the U.S. was not fully attacked and destroyed by the Soviets in 1986. It was because of our nuclear facilities, warheads, etc. which would have exploded, creating great fallout hazards worldwide, and because of nuclear dead-man fuzing weapons clandestinely placed in Russia by one or more other nations.

A friendly small nation possessing energetics weapons also intervened directly in l986, and blew up several Russian missile ammunition storage sites, some five or so in six months. In one such explosion, about one third of all the missiles in the Russian Northern Fleet were destroyed. As we stated, the so-called "Cold War" was not nearly so cold as has been represented.

In short, the friendly little nation served notice on the Soviets that, if they moved against the West, the Soviet Union itself would suffer terribly. They put it in language clearly understood by the KGB. So any full-up strategic attack for that period was stalemated by that combination of factors.

A major concern for the Soviets was their inability to counter the dead-man fuzing problem posed by nuclear weapons clandestinely hidden inside Russia and by the nuclear warheads and reactors inside the targeted nation(s). They already had the quantum potential (QP) answer theoretically, and had conducted a demonstration test of a laboratory QP device, but they had not yet completed the QP weapon systems and deployed them.

Nonetheless, a very powerful strike of peculiar nature—induction of a giant earhquake in the San Andreas Fault zone, including in both Los Angeles and San Francisco—was scheduled. This strike would have caused billions of do11ars worth of damage and would have killed perhaps 200,000 Americans. The initiation of the strike was actually begun in April 1986—as the reader can begin to see, there was to be one helluva May Day report in 1986! Incredibly, a private group here in the U.S. then made a unique and unprecedented contribution that saved the day for Los Angeles and San Francisco.

What Really Happened in the Chernobyl Disaster

Using the "inside" of the Woodpecker beams as superhighways for their longitudinal waves and interferometry, in April 1986 the KGB interferometers had started their build-up of substantial induced EM energy in the sides of the San Andreas Fault that runs through Los Angeles and up through San Francisco. Two beams were being used by the Soviets: One was coming down on the target from the North—coming over the North Pole regions and the ice caps—and one was coming around from the East and upon the target area. Completely (100%) certain signatures were present, including some ELF "chugger" waves symptomatic of the Soviet method of inducing very large quakes. The time-energy is being used, hence very low frequency ELF is employed to maximize the amount of time-energy available for transduction in the rocks on the side of the fault. The Soviets were building up a very large earthquake—indeed, to spawn a whole series of such quakes all along the San Andreas fault—with severe aftershocks following after the main quake had done terrible damage. In short, they were preparing to hit California with the "big one" that everybody had been anticipating and dreading for so long.

A private group contacted me. They stated they could take out one of the transmitters by producing a powerful (giant) phase conjugate replica signal pulse upon it that would backtrack right into the transmitter and catastrophically burn it out—a surface application of the "phase conjugate shooting" once considered for armed satellites that could shoot down rising hostile ICBMs at 10,000 miles distance. As I understood it, they had a new kind of essentially noise-free regenerative amplifier, used in a transmitter. This meant that extreme amplification could be achieved in a pulse response to a received Woodpecker signal, before the transmitter burned out.[43] Since the group had no knowledge of the exact KGB transmitter locations or the possible consequences of such an action, they asked my opinion as to the risks associated. This placed me in a real quandary.

At the time, the U.S. was literally under siege. We have mentioned some of the [43] A very subtle but important point is this: An energy flow of any amount—say, 10^{20} joules per second—has absolutely zero power if none of that energy flow is diverted or changed in form. So if one has a truly perfect noise-free amplifier, and a pure noise-free energy signal input, the signal energy input can be directly and freely amplified without limit, so long as those noise-free conditions can be upheld. In short, that rigorously constitutes regauging, and the widely used and well-known axiom of gauge freedom—the ability to change the local energy density of a system or spacetime freely and at will—applies. Relativistically, such re-gauging is merely rotating the frame of the system away from the laboratory frame. This group indeed had such an amplifier, which I physically saw, and apparently has it today. Our present texts have not yet realized the real implications of gauge freedom: It means that one can freely amplify energy without limit, once certain conditions (no divergence of the energy or change of its form) are met. This does not violate energy conservation; the "potential energy of a system" is not a fixed number at all, but depends on the frame of the observer vis a vis the frame of the system. We point out that there really are no true conservation laws in general relativity unless introduced by arbitrary measured The great Hilbert already knew this in 1917, two years after the advent of Einstein's general relativity. Hilbert stated: "/ assert... that for the general theory of relativity, i.e., in the case of general invariance of the Hamiltonian function, energy equations... corresponding to the energy equations in orthogonally invariant theories do not exist at all. I could even take this circumstance as the characteristic feature of the general theory of relativity." [D. Hilbert, Gottingen Nachrichten, Vol. 4, 1917, p. 21]. Loskutov and Logunov commented as follows: "In formulating the equivalence principle, Einstein actually abandoned the idea of the gravitational field as a Faraday-Maxwell field, and this is reflected in the pseudotensorial characterization of the gravitational field that he introduced. Hilbert was the first to draw attention to the consequences of this. ... Unfortunately, ... Hilbert was evidently not understood by his contemporaries, since neither Einstein himself nor other physicists recognized the fact that in general relativity conservation laws for energy, momentum, and angular momentum are in principle impossible." ["Nonuniqueness of (he predictions of the general theory of relativity," Sov. J. Part. Nucl, 18(3), May-June 1987, p I79).

"target year" activities, such as kill of the Arrow DC-8, flameout of jet engines early in 1985, target practice against shuttle launches at Cape Canaveral in November 1985, etc. Actually kill of targets had continued in 1986. A huge earthquake followed by several large aftershocks had been used against Mexico City on 19 September 1985, causing great damage and demonstrating a little of what might be expected when they chose to hit Los Angeles and San Francisco much harder. The Mexico City quake had been preceded by an induced, giant hailstorm weeks earlier, and on the evening of 18 September 1985 by giant radial cloud signatures accompanying the generation of excess energy in the underlying rocks as the KGB prepared next day's giant Mexico City quake. The reader should recall that, working with Sweet during this period, I knew with certainty which earthquakes were natural and which were manmade.

U.S. missiles and aircraft had been hit, the Challenger had been destroyed, and the Titan 34-D had been destroyed at Vandenberg AFB on 18 April 1986, accompanied by a 100% indicator (the substantiated presence of the marker beacon for registration and shift firing). In addition, a little Richter 5.3 quake in the San Francisco Bay area had been induced by the Soviets on 31 March 1986, a quake which was correlated with preparatory activity on the Woodpecker transmitter signals the day before, showing Soviet induction of the energy to create the quake. Again, we had instrumental evidence that it was manmade.

That quake on 31 March had been a "warm-up" and practice for the big one now about to be induced in both Los Angeles and San Francisco, and along the San Andreas Fault. In fact, it appeared that the entire fault zone would be stimulated by deposit of excess energy all along its length. In that case, induction of a distrituted California quake of unprecedented extent and great magnitude was now in process, though just beginning. If that event or those events occurred, the loss of American lives and property would be staggering.

The High Side Risk Factor

The group's query to me presented a very difficult decision situation. Such huge Soviet interferometer beams, once built up, contain enormous longitudinal EM wave energy. If a Soviet transmitter were near large nuclear facilities, and were instantly blown and shorted, all that potential energy might flash directly into the ground.

In case of such a catastrophic transmitter failure, an enormously powerful longitudinal wave pulse would spread out in all directions in the surrounding earth. The first nuclear material the pulse encountered would be fissioned abruptly and very violently. If the transmitter were within a few kilometers of one or more of the large "monster" Soviet ICBM sites, the full-up explosion of several 30 or 40 megaton warheads might result—in the dirt and dirty. The resulting fallout and contamination would be massive, would spread round the world, and would eventually kill millions for years to come. Nuclear reactor stations were a similar risk; instant fission of all the fissionable material in one of them would constitute an unprecedented and giant nuclear explosion, in the dirt and dirty. That was the high side risk.

The Low Side Risk Factor

The low side risk would be that little or nothing at all would happen; perhaps a tremor induced in a nearby fault zone, etc. I knew that the Soviets—after an early Kyshtym transmitter failure—had produced such a flashover on a much smaller scale and that flashover had caused the nuclear explosion of nearby stored nuclear wastes. The resulting fallout contaminated some 1200 square kilometers, which is still contaminated to this day. I also knew that, after Kyshtym, the Soviets had installed safety devices on all their scalar interferometer transmitters in case of just such failures.

So if the safety devices held when the transmitter suddenly shorted out, they could hold the longitudinal EM wave beams and potentials long enough to drain the energy slowly and harmlessly into the earth over an extended period. That was the low side risk.

The most likely consequence, of course, would be somewhere in the middle, between the extreme upper risk and lower risk limits. In other words, we could expect some bad repercussions in the Soviet Union almost certainly, but hopefully it would mostly be confined to that spot.

Consequences of Not Taking Counterfire Action

If no action were taken, the risk to the U.S. was appalling. If the transmitters continued, then perhaps 200,000 Americans were going to die in Los Angeles and San Francisco and along the San Andreas Fault. Perhaps 300,000 more Americans would be injured, and many of them would also die. Enormous physical damage would also be done, and those basins would be disaster areas for some years to come. It would be interpreted by our inadequate scientific community as a great "natural" disaster caused by a giant earthquake, and the ghost of Khrushchev would have had one more laugh at us, with his words "We will bury you!" silently ringing in the ether.

My Recommendation to the Counterfire Group

To save those American lives, some reasonable element of risk had to be accepted. In other words, it became a classic "risk-to-benefit" military analysis, but one that was deadly serious. To me, as a military person the medium risk had to be accepted in such case.

I gave the group my reasoning. They then asked what I would personally do if my own finger were on the fire switch. I answered that I would take out the transmitter or transmitters and save those American lives, accept the medium risk, trust in God, and pray for the best. Military decisions often have to be made in just such uncertain conditions. If one's military could not make such tough decisions, then one's military forces would inevitably lose their wars.

The Group Fired and Took Out a Transmitter

The group thanked me, stated that they would fire, and hung up the phone. See Figure 57. They did fire on April 25, just as they promised, and they did destroy one of the KGB transmitters—apparently located some kilometers (perhaps 30?) from the Soviet nuclear reactors at Chernobyl.

At the moment the transmitter was hit and destroyed, engineer Bill Bise—out in the field with magnetic field detectors and measuring the Woodpecker beams—observed the abrupt failure of the Woodpecker transmitter beam coming around the Earth from the East. Thus, he actually detected the successful destruction of that distant interferometer transmitter. Unknowingly he had detected the results of a great counterstrike in a very dangerous strategic battle.

Results at the Transmitter and at Chernobyl

We were very, very lucky. At the destroyed transmitter site, the safety circuits kicked in and caught the huge beam potential and held it for about 24 hours, gradually draining down the intense beam energy into the earth in a slow manner all the while.

A frantic Russian message to the Chernobyl reactors galvanized the operators to immediately shut down those reactors (put in the cadmium control rods).

However, the uranium in the fuel rods was of course still sitting there. Chernobyl then waited with bated breath to see if the safety circuits would hold.

Then on 26 April, the safety circuits at the transmitter site finally crumbled, and a far weaker LW flashover occurred than would have occurred earlier without the safety. The spreading LWs in the earth struck the nearest reactor core at Chernobyl, preceded seconds before by a tremor induced in the earth at Chernobyl as the LWs arrived. Part of the struck uranium in the core fissioned immediately, venting the containment structure and spewing out radioactive material. Nuclear fallout spread over much of Europe. The rest of the disaster is well known.

That unknown group, in my estimation, saved a large number of American lives—at least 200,000 or more and perhaps as many as 300,000. They also prevented enormous physical damage to California, both to Los Angeles and San Francisco and to points in between. The members of that group are the unsung heroes of this bizarre episode. It is my hope that I may live to turn the names of those persons in for the award of a very high Presidential medal. Until then I will not reveal those names under any circumstance.

Whether or not the U.S. scientific and intelligence communities know it or believe it is of no concern. What matters is that a great many Americans are still alive, and their children born since then are alive. Those Americans otherwise would have been very, very dead or never born. I personally have reflected on those desperate circumstances many times. If I had it to do over again, I would unhesitatingly urge the same action: Fire and save those American lives, and accept the medium risk. And pray.

And I did pray after recommending the strike. In my opinion, this time my fervent prayers were answered. I am extraordinarily sorry for the civilian deaths that occurred; all one can say is that it was under severe circumstances and in a very peculiar—and very desperate—war.

The Soviets had many other interferometers on line. They induced a substantial earthquake in Mexico at the end of April. Thus they did complete their "earthquake footsteps" of the milestone. On 7 May they induced a 7.7 Richter quake in the Aleutian Islands. If 7.7 to 9.5 quakes had hit all along the San Andreas Fault in Los Angeles and San Francisco and in between, then the destructive scenario I had envisioned for the West Coast would have occurred.

Figure 58 "Bottling up" shield practice over Atlanta 12 Nov. 1986. With a real shield, aircraft or missiles flying into it (from inside or from outside) explode and are destroyed.

On 12 November 1986 the Soviets even placed a giant "dummy shield" (practice) over Atlanta, Georgia (Figure 58). If the shield had been real and not just practice, any aircraft and missiles flying into it would have been instantly exploded and destroyed. That mode—"bottling up" a strategic weapons area—is useful to nullify an entire strategic ICBM launch complex or a large bomber base, etc. It can also "bottle up" a large carrier task force at sea, including the aircraft and the Tomahawk missiles, the shells from the naval guns, etc.

Kill of the Challenger Included Use of Metal-Softening

As we mentioned, during that 1986 preparation period the Russians also destroyed the Challenger spacecraft (January 28, 1986). Numerous signatures abounded, all of which we have already published.

A few weeks before the kill of the Challenger, a close colleague had experimentally proven that a metal-softening signal was indeed placed on the Russian "woodpecker" signals (Figure 7). He did this quite simply: he wired himself into a receiver, through an intervening amplifier, and tuned the receiver to the Woodpecker signals.[44] Then he took nails from a can of nails he was using, and hit them with a hammer to drive them into planks. The nails all folded up instantly like totally wet noodles. A couple dozen, one right after the other. Simultaneously, his son—who was not connected to the Soviet signal—was pounding nails from the same box, normally and without difficulty. None of the nails picked up and pounded by his son experienced any difficulty or softness.

[44] Here he was taking advantage of the fact that the infolded LW signals inside the Woodpecker carrier wave, comprising the "engines" for metal-softening, also constitute "perfect" divergence-free EM energy, so to speak, at least overall. Amplifying the signal also amplifies the "engine" inside it. When connected to his body, "potentials superpose" is the rule, and that transferred the amplified engines to his body and into the EM field immediately surrounding his body. Hence he softened the hammer metal a tiny bit, and softened the much less tempered nails quite a bit more.

Then my friend disconnected himself from the signal, and waited a bit. Whereupon when he then used nails from that same box, he drove them in without difficulty. There were no more "wet noodle" nails.

We reach a very simple conclusion: When he connected to an amplified Woodpecker signal, his body was time-excitation charged (quick charge and quick decay) with a specific signal so that the nails he picked up were charged. Then when hit with the hammer, the nails acted as if made of very limp rubber without a rebound. When he disconnected from the amplified Woodpecker signal, and waited a moment for the induced charge in his body to dissipate, the nails also discharged their engines and quit acting like limp rubber bands when hit, and became normal nails with normal behavior. That would seem to be quite sufficient to prove the thesis.

The Challenger was then destroyed, as we previously printed, with numerous signatures of the hit, including even a KGB party in Moscow to celebrate the success of killing the vehicle (and getting away with it).

Cold Molding: An Epilog to the Metal-Softening Donnybrook

I was called a total lunatic for pointing out a metal-softening capability on the Russian signals. So be it. Metal softening is achieved by an engine which serves as a pumped phase conjugate mirror for the vibrations and signals in the lattice bonds of metals. Build up that engine in the metal until the precisely reversed and overlaid signals negate the normal signals, and one has "dissolved" the lattice bonds, converting the solid to a liquid. Lattice bond cancellation is not heating.

But that was not to be the end of the "metal softening" story.

A few years later, working informally with a large UK aerospace firm "for free", I furnished them an address in Moscow of some Russian scientists associated on the perimeter of the KGB energetics weapon program. The address had been taken from their cautious advertisement for business on the Internet and furnished to me by a correspondent. A UK engineer fluent in Russian was sent to meet with those scientists in Russia. They nervously showed him several novel things, one of which was "cold-molding" of metal. The liquefied the metal without heating, poured it in a mold, and waited for the "effect" to wear off and the liquid to turn back into a solid again.

The result was that a hammer blow onto a nail head resulted in the nail acting as a limp noodle upon impact.

Briefly, an energetics charge (using LWs) was induced on the metal lattice vibrations, adding their phase conjugate replicas to the interior LWs comprising the lattice bond signals. The metal's atoms were time-density charged to an excited state (presently not recognized in Western science). Thereupon the metal lattice EM forces "dissolved" and the metal became liquid at room temperatures and without heating. The cool liquid metal was then poured into a mold. Then after awhile, the time-density charge and slowly drained away, and the metal resumed its normal solid state—all without any heating whatsoever.

On a subsequent trip the engineer brought that Russian team itself out of Russia and to the UK. The Russian scientists demonstrated cold molding to assembled UK scientists, and to some U.S. visitors. The phenomenon was physically demonstrated and proven.

I was correct about the metal softening then. We were also correct back there in 1986 about the metal-softening signal employed against the Challenger (together with several other things).

There are numerous other signatures on the death of the Challenger. Again, the death of the Challenger was not an accident. It was due to a deliberate act of war by the KGB. The KGB knew in advance—after substantial probing incidents—that they would get away with it. And they did so.

Additional Update from Year 1998 to Year 2,000 Has Been Given

In the action package we sent to the DoD in 1998, we told the rest of the KGB energetics weapons story up to that date. We gave the attack plans as we saw them and the most useful types of attacks to be expected.

I hope the reader is interested in this special energetics weapons information. High power microwave weapons, high energy lasers, and nuclear weapons are useful but no longer decisive weapons either strategically or on the battlefield against a foe equipped with such energetics weapons, and particularly against a foe equipped with quantum potential weapons and negative energy EMP weapons.

At present, we are intensely watching to see if we can pick up indicators for the next scheduled strategic attack, its probable timing, and the "new twists" included in it.

Presently, we have perhaps an 80% chance that the little nation can once again counter any new threat and cause the KGB to abort the impending attack. On the other hand, with Putin apparently limiting at least some of the action of the KGB, we have moved into our present asymmetrical warfare against terrorism—and ultimately against the extensive terrorist teams and assets already infiltrated into our homeland.

As a single example, before the collapse of the former Soviet empire, the Russians long ago slipped in nuclear weapons (from 20 to 40 KT) and hid them in all our large cities and population centers, along with the Spetznaz teams to detonate them on command.[45] Several nations have introduced teams with normal sabotage assets and also with weapons of mass destruction such as radioactive nuclear materials (for a dirty bomb), anthrax, smallpox, bubonic plague, etc. Behind the scenes, the die-hard remnant of the old KGB crew are using QP weapons to "spread" the immune systems (Figure 53) of our populace and materially enhance any BW strikes that the terrorists unleash. The rogue Japanese team (Yakuza and Aum Shinrikyo) on site in Russia are using their LWIs in a giant weather war and the occasional kill of an aircraft, etc. Over the decades Castro infiltrated some 10,000 guerrilla/special forces types trained in camps in Southern Mexico for decades. Probably at least half are still loyal and dedicated—and waiting to blow up bridges, power substations, high voltage power distribution system towers, dams, harbor facilities, refineries, pipelines (both oil and gas), etc. The first phase of WW III—delivery of the weapons of destruction and mass destruction to the targets along with means to unleash them—has already been accomplished.

We are particularly struggling against the rise of asymmetrical warfare—the superpower's paradox (Figure 59)—and our present involvement in that "new" kind of warfare is still quite foreign to us. Only time will tell how well we fare in this new type of war, which we will be engaged in for many years to come. Vice President Cheney rightly regards it as almost a state of perpetual warfare we shall have to learn to live with, as shown by his words on Oct. 21, 2001:

"The war on terrorism will not be over in our lifetime. It is different than the Gulf War was in the sense that it may never end. At least not in our lifetime. The way I think of it is, it's a new normalcy."

There is Also a Severe Bioenergetics (EM Biological Warfare) Threat

The threat from bioenergetics is equally vivid. That old die-hard section of the KGB can now attack an entire population, e.g., with electrodynamically (energetics) induced diseases of any kind whatsoever, particularly when using QP weapons. Such attacks are totally immune to inoculations and antibiotic treatment. Any kind of strain or variation of a disease can also be induced in the pathogen pool for that disease. Against a foe who has such capabilities, our entire medical establishment—including all our emergency treatment procedures and agents—is obsolete right now. A vaccination and the presence of antibodies, e.g., does absolutely nothing against the EM induction of the exact physical effects and form of a disease, as shown in the decades-long "microwave radiation" of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow (Figure 11).

To the Assistant to the SecDef in such matters, in 1998 we furnished a 200+ page briefing package and loosely proposed a crash development of the new type of medical therapeutic treatment devices pioneered and proven by the Priore group in France in the 1960s and early 1970s. Later, Congressman Cramer queried that office for an answer.

Unfortunately the Assistant SecDef s office erroneously responded to Congressman Cramer that nothing in the literature supported the mechanisms proposed. Indeed, the package we furnished contained a detailed list citing the hard French scientific papers in the literature, reporting the exact experiments and the astounding results obtained. Some 2,000 highly successful animal experiments for more than a decade of experiments in fact supported the thesis, and higher group symmetry electrodynamics fully supports the ability to use EM means to make spacetime curvature engines, so that these engines then interact back upon the targeted matter to perform the actions desired. That it does not appear in conventional electrical engineering is of no consequence; it appears in physics and it is good physics, just on the cutting edge.

We also reported, explained, and cited Becker's epochal work (Figures 27 and 28), which is copiously published in the hard literature and which was an example of the fundamental mechanism also. Becker was twice nominated for a Nobel Prize for his outstanding work. Unfortunately, the Assistant SecDef s office responded with a non sequitur.

Packages were sent also to NIH, NSF, CDC, and several other government agencies. Not a single one of those agencies was interested enough to have a competent scientist contact me and discuss the area. I strongly doubt that a single scientist anywhere in the Government bothered to seriously read and ponder the material so painfully and expensively compiled and furnished. Lieutenant Colonel (Retired) Ken Moore and I worked our fingers to the bone for weeks, preparing that briefing, and we spent all the spare money doing it that we could rake up and obtain.

The near-total lack of response itself seems astounding, but it clearly shows the state of U.S. science with respect to novel energetics innovations, even long after those innovations have been experimentally proven and documented in the hard literature, and even after they have been weaponized against us. It is a direct indication of why the U.S. never deciphered what was going on in some four decades of Soviet weak microwave radiation of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, including the kill (eventual deaths) of three U.S. Ambassadors.

For decades there have been manipulations, to say the least, in the hotly contested field of the biological effects of EM radiation. We refer the interested reader to an excellent expose of that situation: The expose is by Dr. Andrew A. Marino, Ph.D., J.D., Powerline Electromagnetic Fields and Human Health, which is current. I believe it can be freely downloaded from: http://www.ortho.lsumc.edu/Faculty/Marino/PowerlineTOC.html. Dr. Marino has been personally and deeply involved in the investigation of EM bioeffects, in court cases, and in Blue Ribbon Panel investigations and proceedings. The book is an eye-opener, and it gives one a good view of the machinations in the EM bioeffects field. We quote directly from Dr. Marino, Chap. 6, p. 1:

> "Oversimplistic as it may sound, whoever pays for EMF bioeffects research and analysis determines what data is produced and the way it is interpreted. Soon after the possibility that powerline EMFs were health risks was raised in a legal dispute involving the New York Public Service > Commission, power companies and their trade associations, particularly the Electric Power Research Institute (EPRI), became massively involved in EM bioeffects research. Subsequently, the power industry dominated funding of the effects of powerline EMFs, both in terms of absolute dollars and compared with dollars from non-industry sources...the power companies and their trade associations were deeply deceitful regarding the information they provided to scientists and to the public regarding the potential health hazards of powerline EMFs."

In the entire EM bioeffects field, there does not appear to be any mention of, study of, or recognition of EM bioeffects induced by the most powerful EM factors: longitudinal EM wave irradiation, time-polarized EM wave irradiation, and time-excitation charging of particles throughout the body and its cells, with resulting emission of transduced longitudinal and transverse EM radiation from-within-to-without.

National Institute of Health Reaction

NIH replied to my letter and action package from their Policy—read: spin control—Section. They noted that the package mentioned the Gulf War Syndrome, which was not in their mission area. So they just sent it off packing to DoD (simplest way to get rid of it, apparently no one seriously read it or even cared to read it). I queried them back by separate response letter about their lack of interest in a revolutionary proven new medical methodology well-documented to cure cancer and other dread diseases, in many hundreds of experiments by leading French medical scientists. This was certainly within their mission area.

They hastily replied from the Policy Section that, yes of course NIH was interested in all such things, and told me where to "submit a proposal." We never got out of their Policy department. Again, not a single competent scientist in the U.S.'s supposed master medical agency apparently even read the package or cared to call and discuss the matter. This was an indicator of their total lack of any grasp of the energetics threat, its testing, and its use to induce the Gulf War Disease.

Now perhaps one can see why we are so far behind the KGB energetics weapons scientists and weapons program.

Marino, ibid., is particularly enlightening on the adamant opposition by appropriate sections of NIH vis a vis the harmful effect of nonionizing EM radiation.

No responses at all were received from the NSF and the CDC, or the other U.S. government agencies to which the package was furnished.

The CDC of course comes under NIH, and thus its responses or lack thereof would be dictated by the parent NIH policies. As for the NSF, Marino, ibid., again is enlightening on the qualifications or lack thereof of its membership.

So as the reader can see, the top of the medical establishment in this nation is flatly not interested in any "controversial" or "out of the box" proven method for curing cancer, dread diseases, and mass treatment of those millions of American casualties that are coming in our cities and population centers. Again, they directly ignore scientific method's very premise: If the experiment is replicated and contradicts the theory, accept the experiment and change the theory. I personally concluded that the U.S. Medical establishment largely does not follow scientific method, but follows dogma and the already approved methodologies.

How the New Revolution in Medical Healing Works

For the reader who is a medical scientist and trained in physiology and biology, one might be interested in that revolutionary French therapeutic methodology and how it worked (before it was ruthlessly suppressed in the early 1970s).

Priore's apparatuses (Figures 12,49, and 60) simply pumped the cells of the entire body with longitudinal EM waves (each accompanied of course by its time-polarized twin, in a Whittaker pairing). The cells and every part of them are very nonlinear, so they act as pumped phase conjugate mirrors for Whittaker wave-pair engines resident in the cells and acting as "input signal complexes".

Once the cells are pumped by these now-established time-density waves, the damaged or diseased cellular masses slowly "charge up" with excess time-excitation. The irradiation took several hours, and this was the "activation" or "time-excitation charging" stage. Thereafter, the time-charge decayed slowly, all the while constituting pumping of every cell and every part of it, in the time domain.

The resident engine in the cell contains two components: (1) the normal or healthy component, and (2) the abnormal component representing disease or debility. Pumping these two components time-reverses both of them and amplifies that reversal. This creates amplified and incredibly precise antiengines in each cell and in each part of each cell. These antiengines override the weaker cellular engines resident. In turn, this "reversing" action of the antiengines causes the pumped cellular masses (actually the mass-energy, in its exact structure and dynamics)—at any and all levels, including the genetics—to be time-reversed back to normal. In biological instead of physics terms, it "dedifferentiated" the diseased or altered cells back to a previous healthy state by simply eliminating the diseased engine component. This is a dramatic extension of nonlinear optical phase conjugation from the 3-space pumping domain to pumping in the complex (time) plane, and it is effective for time-reversing mass-energy at any and all frequencies. We accent that the cellular time reversal back to a previous state includes all the cell's genetics and every part of the cell no matter how small.

Normal cells are just backed up to a slightly younger condition. Diseased cells have their abnormal engine component overridden and reversed back to zero (its earlier state), so that only a slightly younger normal engine remains resident in the cell. This simultaneously reverses the cellular masses back to their previous healthy condition.

Contrast this direct healing mechanism to the action of the immune system.

The immune system itself does not heal anything. It contains the killers, the scavengers, the locators, the markers, the attackers, and the troops manning the ramparts. Usually after a fierce battle with invading hostile pathogens, it wins. Lots of cells still living are damaged in the melee. The immune system scavenger cells then scavenge up the residue littering the battlefield. But the immune system itself cannot heal and restore a single damaged cell, including one of its own.

That healing and restoration of damaged cells is the job of the regenerative system, still little known and inadequately studied today. Perhaps the most fundamental studies were mostly by Becker et al. some decades ago. The regenerative system (Figure 29) is an EM system in its operation, as clearly shown by Becker (Figures 27 and 28), yet it is able to physically differentiate and dedifferentiate cells from one form to another at will, and in highly selective fashion. The regenerative system acts within its limitations (only weak pumping can be done for the time-reversal of diseased or damaged cells) to eliminate the delta (the deviation from normal of the resident engines in the pumped cell). That restores the normal (healthy) engine and slightly amplifies it as well.

It is obviously of the utmost medical importance to understand and apply (and amplify) this little-known technical mechanism by which the regenerative system is able to restore damaged cells back to normal.

It turns out that the regenerative system in its novel EM functioning uses precisely LW and TDW pumping of those damaged cells and gradually time-reverses their entire masses back to a normal healthy state, within its limitations.

This is the secret of the mechanism of the cellular regenerative system—which is an electrodynamic system of very unusual nature. The exact mechanism has not previously appeared in the literature. It took me 14 years to uncover that fundamental mechanism, and another 4 or 5 to refine it a bit, even though both Priore and Becker (as well as others) applied it decades before without being able to fully decipher it.

The experimental proof is already in the literature, once one understands the higher topology EM unwittingly used by both Becker and the Priore team. The proper types of higher group symmetry electrodynamics required to understand the action of the cellular regenerative system are available. There exist scientists skilled in their application and use. These scientists and that higher group symmetry electrodynamics are little used, and are never used at all in the medical field. There exists no funding anywhere for higher EM examination and modeling of the functioning of the cellular regenerative system—i.e., for the fundamental healing process.

Just imagine what this could mean to medicine: One can now develop a new medical science to amplify and apply nature's own proven method of restoration and healing of damaged cells, including all their damaged genetic material. It matters not what caused the damage, whether pathogen or gamma radiation, whatever. This new therapeutic method is a totally new general relativistic process where powerful spacetime engines are created which work directly upon the damaged cell and every part of it, physically reversing the cell and all its parts precisely back to normal condition.

General relativity rigorously tells us that a precise spacetime curvature engine (set of precise spacetime curvatures) is present and active for every specific disease condition and every nuance in it. It also tells us this flawed (disease or damage carrying engine) continuously operates on the cellular mass at every level, maintaining the exact physical condition of the cell and its dynamics. By creating a precise "anti-engine" and amplifying and applying it, general relativity assures us that we are physically acting upon the cell and all its parts at every level, down to the smallest—to precisely return every part in perfect proportion back to a previous normal healthy condition. Pautrizel directly proved the time-reversal to an actual earlier state of the cells and the organism (Figure 61). Amplification by time-domain EM pumping, means that we can cause this time-reversal of the cells back to normal to happen much more quickly than can the body itself, which can only pump very weakly.

- Pautrizel compared identical treatment of immature rats with immature immune systems, and mature rats with mature immune systems.
- Treatment restored the damaged mature system back to full mature functioning, and it promptly recognized and dispatched the pathogens.
- Treatment restored the damaged immature system back to full immature functioning, unable to cope, and the pathogens promptly reinfected and killed the immature rat.
- The lesson: The body is indeed returned to a previous physical state. The pathogens themselves are not killed by the treatment, but by restoring the ability of the immune system to recognize and destroy them.
- Only the previous ability of the immune system is restored by the process.

PROF RAYMOND PAUTRIZEL
(Renowned Parasitologist)

General relativity also assures us that any and every disease is subject to this novel treatment approach, even diseases which have resisted every other known therapy. The Sachs unified general relativity and electrodynamics, and GR/EM unification applications in O(3) electrodynamics produced by Evans, for the first time provide a solid theoretical basis for Priore's methodology and his evolutionary results. They also offer direct engineering of startling physical cures, once the technology is developed.

The profound implications of that treatment can be seen. Apparently, however, our leading governmental agencies and health agencies do not see it, do not wish to see it, have no appreciation for general relativistic effects in healing, and do not intend to have any appreciation for general relativistic effects in healing. Indeed, they seem totally uninterested in even trying to comprehend and research the fundamental healing mechanism demonstrated by nature herself.

What the French Researchers Showed

Among other things, the Priore team produced revolutionary cures of terminal tumors, infectious trypanosomiasis, suppressed immune systems, and atheriosclerosis in several thousand laboratory animals in rigid laboratory tests under rigorous protocols. Eminent scientists such as Robert Courrier and Raymond Pautrizel worked with the Priore team. Courrier was head of the Biology Section of the French Academy of Sciences at the time, also Secretaire Perpetuel of the Academy, and a noted scientist of high stature. Courrier personally presented the astounding Priore results to the entire assembled French Academy. He also sent his own most able scientist assistant to personally prepare the terminal tumor grafts on the lab animals before their treatment.

A world-renowned parasitologist who did enormously important work with Priore was Raymond Pautrizel, who is still alive at this writing though quite aged. Pautrizel was greatly persecuted for his years of determination and effort. Courtesy of Pautrizel via the late Christopher Bird, I personally have the very Ph.D. thesis that Priore himself submitted to the University of Bordeaux on his revolutionary work. That thesis was maliciously rejected in the suppression that was applied to the project. When the French Government changed to a Leftist government in the mid-70s, Government support was immediately withdrawn and the project was ruthlessly suppressed. Priore later sickened and died and that was the end of that. More than a decade later a brave and determined Pautrizel finally was able to get a doctoral thesis approved in the Priore work area, at the same university, by another doctoral candidate, Eric Perisse {40}.

There are two U.S. patents on the Priore device itself, and of course several French patents also.

All the above was rigorously documented in the 1998 package prepared and submitted by Ken Moore and I.

While Priore was still alive, a team with which I was connected attempted to mount a well-funded effort to restore the Priore methodology while Priore was still alive. We also were viciously suppressed. The lives of our financial backers and their families were threatened. The head of our project was viciously attacked financially and destroyed, fleeing the country for his very life. Whoever thinks that dramatically innovative medical science in this country is just sweet reason and scientific method, should have a strong enema to remove the serious blockages interfering with his perceptions.

This vicious outside suppression of our project so infuriated me that I made a solemn promise that, were it humanly possible, I would decipher the Priore process before I died. It took 14 years, but we made good on that promise. During the 20 years or so since our project was suppressed, it is heartbreaking to consider the millions of children and sickened and suffering people who could have been saved had the project continued and succeeded. It is heartbreaking now to consider the coming millions of casualties in our civilian populace in our cities, most of who are going to die from mass destruction weapons. And most of those would not have to die, would the scientific community waken from its long sleep and discover some modern physics and higher group symmetry electrodynamics—and their application to solve nature's mechanism for healing.

When one time-reverses the body's cells and all their parts, one forces the diseased cells to dedifferentiate back to healthy state. We strongly accent that this is accomplished by unified GR/EM processes involving precisely organized spacetime curvatures and their local actions in the cells and all their inner components, down to the finest level. It can be rigorously expressed in good unified physics, as expressed in an electrodynamics such as O(3).

The nondamaged or nondiseased cells just get a little younger. That is also highly beneficial; it reverses the ravages of aging, just a little. Indeed, one of the implications of the Priore mechanism is that aging can indeed be reversed by the process and treatment. Again, one must keep one's sense of humor. In order to get this technology and therapeutic method born, what seems to be needed is an extremely wealthy person, strongly desiring to live longer than the expected life span and do it in a vigorous, healthy body—and who is willing to fund the project with the necessary $60 million required so to redevelop and extend the Priore technology so it can be readily applied. A byproduct will be the saving of millions of American lives when those coming mass casualties from weapons of mass destruction occur in our cities.

How the Regeneration Mechanism Was Finally Deciphered

What took so long in deciphering the mechanism was the problem of how to make such precisely tailored and exact ST curvature engines, specifically so that they are exact antiengines for a specific disease and even a specific pathogen, and even for different versions of the engines for different cells in a single body having different strains of the same pathogen, having different body DNA, etc. For years, the solution of that task seemed hopeless. How on earth could one possibly work all that out in a hundred lifetimes, so that it could be precisely calculated even by an array of the most powerful computers on Earth?

After years of struggling with the problem, in one stroke of enlightenment it was revealed to be the simplest thing in all the world. Absolutely no calculation was necessary, and the exact amplified antiengine effect was a fairly simple and straightforward thing to obtain. General relativity tells us that every cellular mass and each part of it, has its own unique spacetime curvature engine, to the finest detail and an exact fit. As Wheeler put it so nicely {130}, "Space acts on matter, telling it how to move. In turn, matter reacts back on space, telling it how to curve. " The mass and its dynamics and the engine and its dynamics constantly interact upon each other, and "keep attuned and in perfect adjustment," so to speak.

That means that a "normal" cell already has just such a precise "normal" ST engine residing in it, and acting upon every component at every level—even in the atomic nuclei. Well, a diseased cell has an absolutely specific structuring, and therefore it also has an absolutely specific ST engine structuring. A priori that resident structuring for the diseased or damaged state in the individual cell differs (by some delta) from the structuring of the normal healthy cellular state for that individual cell.

Voila! That means that the ST engine for the damaged cell can be decomposed into two parts (two engines): (1) the normal "healthy cell" state engine, and (2) a delta ST engine that has been added to it so that together the two comprise the full ST engine for the exact individual condition of the cell.

What is now needed is a way to produce an exact antiengine of two parts: (1) one for the normal engine and (2) a second one for the delta (disease) engine. Applying this amplified and combined "antiengine" would overpower the resident combined engine, precisely reversing the cellular condition by reducing the delta to zero. Rigorously, the cellular mass and every part of it must then also revert to a previous physical state, or else we must complete discard general relativity itself.

Well, if we were to just time-reverse the resident engine and its two components, that would give us the perfect antiengine with its two components. Amplifying this antiengine would then produce one that was more powerful than the resident engine in the cell. Applying that amplified antiengine to the cell, that would not really change the "normal" engine component, but it would precisely reduce the delta engine component back to zero (its previous state, before it was there!) Voila! A specific healing signal of perfect structure, for the specific deviant condition of the individual cell and its every part.

Since we have a combined GR/EM to use, we can think electrodynamically about this general relativity problem. Immediately we see that phase conjugate optics is a candidate, since the "resident composite engine" can correspond to the "signal" or input wave, and the pumping of the nonlinear mass of the cell and its parts (where they act as nonlinear phase conjugate mirror materials) produces an exact phase conjugate replica (the exact amplified antiengine). The presence of that antiengine overrides the magnitude of the resident engine, and it moves the cell precisely back along the temporal path previously taken. In short, it applies a specific kind of dedifferentiation of the cell back to its previous healthy condition.

Since we extend phase conjugate pumping to the time-energy domain, then the resident composite engine and its time-stream component are the "input." The amplified antiengine and its time domain component will then forcibly propagate that pumped mass energy back over the time trajectory previously taken by it. In short, it will time-reverse the cell and all its parts back to a previous condition, completely eliminating the delta (disease or disorder). The beauty is that it will also reverse damaged or altered genetics, such as in the AIDS disease. It can do this prior to the appearance of health symptoms—it can be done as soon as the patient tests positive for HIV.

Since the antiengine is amplified, it moves the cell back to normal fairly rapidly (in a few hours, for example). At least the time charge for the reversal process is delivered in that period; one may allow (as Priore did) a full week for the time-charge and its transduction to continue reversing the cells. But it is much faster than the normal speed of the human regeneration system using the same process, because now we have greatly amplified the time-reversal rate.

It is therefore ideal for a method of quickly treating mass casualties, particularly since it can be developed and used in a portable unit about the size of a large suitcase (Figure 13).

Interestingly, during the radiation with LW EM radiation, one also pumps the pathogen and time-reverses it as well. Its "normal state" towards the beginning was a condition whereby it could move with relative immunity past the immune system's opposition, having deceived the immune system. In the treatment, a small amount of the pathogen is therefore converted back into this condition just shy of the beginning, where that part of the pathogens is resistant to the immune system. However, a very small, short "post treatment" irradiation with LW radiation for a much shorter interval and at weaker power, will clean up this altered pathogen residue by allowing the immune system to recognize it and destroy it. Pautrizel clearly demonstrated this significant fact.

Cellular and Body Rejuvenation are Possible, Once the Technology is Developed

One can in fact really accomplish rejuvenation of the aged and infirm, as the technology is developed. One could certainly solve the major problems of Medicare, and cut the patient load at least in half, relatively quickly and inexpensively. Of course lots of big U.S. drug companies will be rather violently opposed to any such idea, because much of their empire would be threatened. Much of the organized medical community depends largely on the Big Drug Approach. So the organized medical community will also vehemently oppose it, just as the formal medical science community in France viciously opposed it.

One could also produce cheap, portable LW treatment units en masse, which is what we were suggesting to the Assistant. SecDef. That way one could flood the emergency response system (response teams, hospitals, fire stations, police precinct stations, schools, etc.) with quick and effective treatment devices. They could be used to rapidly {131} treat those millions of American casualties that are going to occur when one or more of our cities are attacked in the near future by terrorist WMD attacks. This would save the lives of most of those stricken millions of Americans.

Mow Many Americans Could Be Saved?

For an anthrax attack on Washington, D.C., first generation equipment could save perhaps 70% of those sickened Americans, almost all of who are going to die with present capabilities. With second-generation equipment, one could save perhaps 90%.

For an anthrax attack without spreading via QP clandestine preparation of the populace, one would save 0.7 to 2.1 million Americans. With clandestine KGB QP spreading and a *5:*1 increase in the yield of the anthrax strike, one would save 3.5 to 10.5 million Americans.

For a truly nightmare attack (as a worst case scenario) perhaps 5 major cities might be attacked in such manner and to such degree. In that case, one is talking about saving 3.5 to 10.5 million Americans for the unspread attack case, and up to 17.5 to 52.5 million Americans for the spread case.

Further, the development of the necessary portable treatment units is doable and affordable, for mass treatment capability. Training on a portable machine could be done for a high school student in 30 minutes or less, and that student could then give emergency treatment effectively.

Absolutely nothing else out there can presently warrant such projections. Yet this is the very technology our own medical science community is eminently uninterested in, has no knowledge of, does not wish to obtain any knowledge of, and does not wish to scientifically discuss.

There Are No Resistant Strains to the New Technology, and There Cannot Be Any

A most interesting thing is that there cannot be a "resistant strain" of a pathogen for the new treatment methodology, a priori. No mass can shield against spacetime curvature effects. Slight adjustments of the controls will adjust the spacetime engines being utilized. Two or three hour's work with a developed unit and a lab team on a new strain would suffice to completely determine the required adjustments, once the technology is developed. The new information could then be quickly relayed to all stations treating patients. On each treatment device, adjusting a few dials and controls for the laptop computer controlling the unit will do the trick. The use of the final device would be so simple that a teenager could be trained to use it in less than 30 minutes.

Such new capabilities are urgently needed not only for the millions of civilian casualties we expect in the future, but also for support of our armed forces in the field. Frankly, the anthrax shots are not going to do them much good, once one realizes that the "spreading" of their immune and regenerative systems is already occurring via KGB quantum potential means. Camel pox is available to any terrorist foe, and has almost the identical actions and constitution as smallpox. Indeed, it is almost identical to smallpox.

The Gulf War Disease and Syndrome were just small preludes of what is to come and what is already being used against the entire U.S., though as yet very clandestinely. Look again at the Kaznacheyev work. He clearly proved in thousands of successful experiments that any kind of cellular disease or damage or death whatsoever, can be induced at a distance by novel EM means. Replication experiments were successfully accomplished at the University of Marburg and also at the University of Sydney.

Results of the Priore' Treatments Are Well-Documented and Independently Supported

The Priore team's results are well documented in the hard French scientific literature. At least one French doctoral thesis was eventually accepted upon the work. The astounding results really occurred. They were scientifically substantiated under rigorous protocols and even police-guarded labs for tests by a learn of outside scientists. To then deny those results simply because no one has understood the active mechanism until now, is to deny the scientific method itself: Believe the experiment when it refutes the prevailing theory.

There is also independent work by other scientists that strongly supports the Priore results, once the mechanism is finally understood.

Robert Becker et al. in the U.S. conclusively showed that living cells in situ can be dedifferentiated, redifferentiated, etc. by laughably weak currents (picoamperes) and DC potentials (which are comprised of those famous Whittaker pairs). Becker was unaware that his potentials included time density waves and longitudinal waves, as predicted by quantum field theory and as shown by Whittaker in 1903 (once one understands that a bidirectional phase conjugate longitudinal EM wavepair is a time-density EM wave coupled to a longitudinal EM wave). Application of such EM potentials by Becker transformed red blood cells into pre-cartilage cells, then further into pre-bone cells. That latter cell type was then deposited in bone fractures, healing them when nothing else would. Becker and others have demonstrated partial regeneration of limbs in small test mammals, using the technique. The bone-healing techniques were finally approved by the FDA and are often used in some hospitals for treating otherwise intractable bone fractures.

Since then,other scientists have shown the directed formation of other types of body cells from cells from distant parts of the body (i.e., muscle-type cells from cells produced in the bone marrow, etc.). Such things are now well documented in the U.S. literature, in at least several hundred papers and in the leading journals including Nature, Science, etc.

The Present Threat Is Urgent, and Our Strategic Destruction is Still at Issue

Our own medical community, our science community, and our intelligence community are at least 20 years or more behind the KGB right now. We are also behind the Chinese. In many respects our scientists have simply missed the biggest scientific breakthrough of the century.

It is urgent that we find some way to counter and avoid future strategic energetics attacks sure to be scheduled. The eventual attack actually launched—if the little nation's QP weapons can be countered first—would destroy the U.S. in about 2 hours. It only takes about 10 minutes, it seems, for the QP weapons already deployed to negate almost all our strategic nuclear arsenal. Thereafter, the KGB and Yakuza/Aum Shinrikyo can simply attack us at will and utterly destroy the U.S. To any loyal American, that is an entirely unacceptable solution.

The most urgent requirement would seem to be immediate and strong contact at the highest level between the U.S. government and the leaders of the little foreign nation (and the other friendly nation) that presently is guarding the ramparts and saving our necks. A cooperative crash program to develop our own QP weapons would seem to be the order of the day, if it can in any fashion be negotiated. But to have any chance of success, the President and the Congress will have to use the utmost care in selecting the U.S. negotiators and scientists to explore this possibility.

Immediate transfer of the requisite capabilities to the U.S. would be desirable, at least from our own view. From their view, of course, we do not necessarily resemble a trustworthy scientific partner at all, based on our past scientific performance, and it is up to the U.S. scientific community to prove to them that the leopard really has changed its spots. That would all have to be negotiated and worked out.

If that is not possible, then it is of extreme urgency that our own country embarks upon a new Manhattan Project to develop strategic quantum potential weapons and defenses. It would be a great relief to discover that such had already been started, but I fear not.

Desperately Needed Defensive Capabilities Can be Provided by a QP Solution

We pose one more very, very useful QP capability prior to closing. As we stated, if a large U.S. city is hit with—say—an anthrax attack done in professional manner, we would expect 1-3 million casualties, according to a well-known major U.S. government study. With immune/regenerative spreading presently already ongoing here in our populace by KGB QP weapons, that figure may actually increase by about 5-fold. So the casualties (prompt and delayed) might well reach 5-15 million, in a single professional anthrax spray attack by two persons from one light plane on a calm night dispensing 100 kilograms of anthrax spores sprayed over the city with a simple agricultural sprayer. With the indicated Priore technology and treatment units in all emergency response hands, at least 70% or so of those casualties could be saved. Otherwise, presently almost all of them will die. That dramatic saving of lives is one desperately needed capability that could be met.

But there is a further capability of LW technology that nothing else presently known can do without serious impact upon the populace.

After the prompt and shortly delayed casualties are mostly cured and the remaining fraction dies, a terrible problem of BW contamination still remains. No one anywhere really knows how to clean up an entire city from anthrax spores. But unless harshly decontaminated, that contaminated city is going to be effectively uninhabitable for decades to come, if only the present technology and methods are available. Islands of the coast of Scotland, where anthrax was tested decades ago, are still "hot" and contaminated—and off limits.

The indications are that our nation has developed chemical sprays that can kill and neutralize the anthrax, including in the lungs of the populace breathing the spray. On the other hands, it is indicated that the spray is a high physical stress factor, and some of the more debilitated citizens will be injured or even killed by the spray itself. This includes babies and small children, the aged, those with lung and breathing difficulties, etc. As a matter of national survival, desperate diseases do deserve desperate remedies. So while spraying the zone might itself sicken and kill some thousands of our weaker citizens, at least—so the thinking would go—it saves millions. This of course is similar to the use of triage—reserving treatment and scarce medical capabilities and supplies for treating those most likely to live and recover with treatment, rather than treating those more seriously affected and less likely to survive. Sadly, presently triage will almost certainly be necessary because of very short supplies and treatment teams, etc. So most of those 1 to 3 million casualties will simply be dragged aside and left to die, and just made as comfortable as possible.

However, the QP technology can be adapted to produce systems that can indeed do complete decontamination, very quickly, and without harm to the citizens in zone. The anthrax can simply be modified by specialized spacetime curvature engines—specialized EM fields and waves carrying hidden inner "information content of the field" engines that are designed specifically to change and destroy anthrax and nothing else. Eventually one could develop the capability to do it similarly for any other major contaminant, including nuclear radioactive materials contamination of a major city.

Any strategic and tactical analyst can immediately see the tremendous value of such capabilities.

In Conclusion

I hope the above admittedly lengthy overview is of interest to the reader and useful. If we are to survive the debacle that now looms before us in this new asymmetrical war we shall be in for decades, it will require the efforts of leading and dedicated Lawmakers and Overwatch persons. Without firm prodding, the military, scientific, and intelligence communities are likely to just continue their present pace until many or most of us all die suddenly.

The KGB energetics threat is still real and imminent; Russia is not a monolith and Putin still does not have complete control over the KGB. Another full strategic attack is sure to be scheduled before very long by either that die-hard faction of the KGB, the Yakuza/Aum Shinrikyo, the Chinese (particularly if they move against Taiwan and we defend), or someone. And so our possible deaths also to be taken into account, if we just continue to do business as usual.

Along with other Americans, I love my country and served it to the best of my ability for 20 years of active duty. It is the survival of America itself that is now at stake, both in the asymmetrical war against terrorists and in the continuing war against energetics weapons. Our scientific, military, and intelligence communities simply must be jolted awake and into massive efforts in energetics.

We have the scientists with the required capability. We have the facilities. We have the leadership, and we can do it if we can put this thing under a Presidential Decision Directive, under an Executive Order and a Declaration of National Emergency (along with the several already in effect).

1986 FER DE LANCE INTRODUCTION & BRIEFING ON SOVIET SCALAR ELECTROMAGNETIC WEAPONS

This briefing presents the basic concepts of Soviet scalar electromagnetic weapons, some of the major types available, and evidence of their widespread testing.

Scalar Electromagnetics is Electrogravitation

Scalar electromagnetics is an extension of present electromagnetics (EM) to include gravitation. That is, it is a unified, and, what is more important, it is a unified engineering theory. Nikola Tesla initially discovered its basis.

In the scalar EM extension, EM field energy can be turned into gravitational field energy and vice versa. This exchange can be patterned and localized, in specific areas or objects. Such a controlled change of electromagnetics to gravitation is not possible in the normal EM or physics presently taught in Western textbooks. However, the bits and pieces of the theory have been scattered through the physics literature for some time, but no orthodox Western scientist seems to have realized that these anomalous portions could be integrated into a startling new physics. Unorthodox experimenters, inventors, and scientists have made discoveries in this arena for several decades, but again have not realized the exact implications or the precise manner in which their results could be combined with present electrical physics.

Fer-de-Lance

Such sluggishness is certainly not present in the Soviet Union. For over three decades, the Soviet Union has been developing electrogravitation and applying it to develop strange new secret weapons of incredible power and capability. They have sustained the largest weapons development program ever launched by any nation, and they have kept it effectively hidden from prying Western eyes. 1 have called this program "Fer-de-Lance," after the deadly South American pit viper of that name.

The dreaded fer-de-lance is a snake of great agility and lethal effect. It often ambushes its hapless prey, and strikes unexpectedly and without warning. Its first sudden strike is usually lethal to its victim, which promptly expires in writhing agony. Since the Soviet development of scalar EM weapons has been designed for the same purpose, the name seems appropriate.

The equivalent effort of about seven Manhattan projects has been poured into Fer-de-Lance by the Soviets, and the program has been successful almost beyond imagination. The eery weapons are now developed, deployed, and tested. The ambush has been completed; Fer-de-Lance is coiled and ready to strike.

Energetics and Directed-Energy Weapons (DEWs)

The ordinary Soviet name for this type of weapons science is energetics. In the West, that term is believed to be associated with conventional directed-energy weapons (DEWs) such as particle beam weapons, lasers, radio frequency (RF) directed-energy devices, etc. The Soviets do not limit the term in this way.

Western scientists are familiar only with directed-energy weapons where fragments, masses, photons, or particles travel through space and contact the target to deliver their effects. Hence in their thinking they limit the Soviet term "energetics" to the type of weapons they themselves understand - exotic but normal weapons using energy or mass traveling through space to impact a target.

However, it is possible to focus the potential for the effects of a weapon through spacetime itself, in a manner so that mass and energy do not "travel through space" from the transmitter to the target at all. Instead, ripples and patterns in the fabric of spacetime itself are manipulated to meet and interfere in and at the local spacetime of some distant target. There interference of these ripple patterns creates the desired energetic effect (hence the term energetics) directly in and through the target itself, emerging from the very spacetime (vacuum) in which the target is imbedded at its distant location. As used by the Soviets, energetics refers to these eerie new superweapons, as well as to the more mundane DEWs known to the West.

As a consequence of the Soviet breakthrough and decades of feverish development, monstrous strategic weapons undreamed of in the West are already in Soviet hands. A noose is slowly and steadily being tightened about our throats, and it is already the 11th hour.

The Soviets Use a Deception Plan

Concomitant with this supersecret development program, the Soviets developed and implemented an elaborate deception plan to conceal these startling weapons and their nature from Western eyes until it is too late. Soviet deception has been so successful that even when Western scientists are confronted with the actual Soviet tests of these weapons directly over their heads, they do not recognize the weaponry nor the nature of the effects produced.

As early as January 1960, Nikita Khrushchev announced the Soviet development of a new, fantastic weapon. On May 1, 1960 Soviet defensive radars - rigged as prototype weapons of this new kind - probably downed Francis Gary Powers's high-flying U-2 reconnaissance plane over the Soviet Union, precipitating a major diplomatic incident.

On April 10, 1963 one of the first new superweapons operationally deployed was used to destroy the U.S.S. Thresher atomic submarine underwater, off the east coast of the U.S. The next day, April 11, 1963 the same deployed superweapon was utilized in a different mode to produce a giant underwater explosion in the ocean over the Puerto Rican Trench, 100 miles north of Puerto Rico.

Over the years, various aircraft were interfered with or downed as tests of these Soviet weapons. A particular case involved the mysterious loss of F-111s in the Vietnam conflict. At least one downed F-l11 crew was recovered in the subsequent prisoner-of-war exchange. On that aircraft, all electrical systems suddenly were in difficulty simultaneously. All emergency indicator lamps were lit up, "like a Christmas tree." This was probably due to special Soviet teams converting some North Vietnamese SA-2 missile system radars to the scalar EM mode, and employing "scalar beam" interference to produce spurious EM noise throughout the electrical and electronic systems of the aircraft.

In late April/early May of 1985, the entire armada of Soviet strategic scalar EM superweapons was activated as a special celebration of the 40th anniversary of the end of WWII. Activation of this armada (which probably contained over 100 giant weapons), together with 27 giant power systems and a large number of command and control transmissions, was monitored on an advanced, proprietary detection system by Frank Golden. After the giant strategic exercise, which lasted several days, most of the weapons and power sources were once again stood down to "standby."

The NASA shuttle launches provided a convenient opportunity for Soviet testing of these superweapons in a Launch Phase ABM mode, where a launched missile can be detected and destroyed shortly after liftoff. At first, electromagnetic pulse (EMP) bursts on the early shuttle trajectory were deliberately delayed in time, to prevent actual destruction of the target and avoid alerting the U.S. that something unusual was happening.

The shuttle launch of November 26, 1985 saw a particularly significant-test of this kind. In this case, a very loud "sonic boom" or explosion occurred over the launch site 12 minutes after shuttle liftoff, when the shuttle was already away and downrange. At least two previous shuttle launches had also been used as pseudotargets, with delayed booms occurring over the launch site well behind the vehicles.

After the lack of U.S. reaction to these three tests showed that the U.S. still had no knowledge of the new technology and did not even recognize its employment, the Soviets apparently decided to proceed with tests where the target vehicles would actually be destroyed.

On December 12, 1985 the same Soviet weapon tested against the NASA shuttle launches may have deliberately interfered with the controls of an Arrow DC-8 taking off from Gander Air Force Base, Newfoundland. At an altitude of 100 feet, the aircraft - carrying over 250 U.S. soldiers and civilian crew members - lost power and sank into the ground tail-low, killing everyone on board. Three Canadian witnesses to the crash were interviewed over the Canadian Broadcast Corporation's television news on April 8, 1986 at 10 p.m. No flame or smoke issued from the plane before its descent and crash. However, the aircraft was seen to be mysteriously glowing with a yellow glow. That is a signature of the use of a scalar howitzer in the "continuous EM emergence" mode, similar to the manner in which the F-111s were downed in Vietnam. In short, the DC-8's electrical systems were interfered with by electromagnetic noise created throughout each increment of spacetime occupied by the aircraft. The powerful charge created in and on the aircraft also apparently caused the loss of two engines, one after the other. With its controls ineffective and power drastically reduced, the aircraft sank to earth, still in its "tail down" configuration from takeoff, and crashed and burned. The "yellow glow" was a corona due to the acquisition of a high electrical charge by the skin of the aircraft.

Other factors contributing to the crash may have been reduced lift due to poor engine maintenance, increased weight of the aircraft due to icing, and heavy loading. Still, no one has recognized the significance of the "yellow glow" or what it implies, or the possible connection between loss of the aircraft and previous Soviet testing of-a Launch Phase ABM system against U.S. shuttle launches.

As this book goes to press, the last two U.S. Air Force Titan 34-D missiles fired from Vandenberg Air Force Base in California have blown up shortly after launch. The first one blew up on Aug. 28, 1985 just after lift-off. That loss has been attributed to failure of a high-powered fuel pump, causing a massive oxidizer leak and a smaller fuel leak. The second Titan loss occurred on April 18, 1986 when the missile blew up 5 seconds after lift-off. Its loss is still under investigation and no determination of cause has been made. Apparently the shuttle and the Titan presently provide the only viable launch vehicles for launching U.S. "spy" satellites. The loss of these sensitive satellites - if indeed they constituted the payloads - cannot help but be damaging to our strategic surveillance capability. According to the Los Angeles Times, the single remaining KH-11 satellite was launched in December 1984 and, with an expected life of two to three years, it could stop functioning later this year.

Whether or not significant Woodpecker grid activity existed in the vicinity of the Titan launch of August 1985 is unknown at this time. However, significant activity in the grid definitely occurred before the April 18 Titan disaster and on the same day.

On Easter Sunday, Mar. 30, 1986 engineer Ron Cole observed significant cloud signatures of grid pattern activity, correlated with Soviet Woodpecker measurements. On April 18, the present author observed traces of a cloud radial over Huntsville, Alabama and took photographs of it. Preliminary reports from Thousand Oaks, California indicate extensive grid activity again on April 18, the day the second Titan exploded.

At least the second of these two missile destructions shortly after launch is suspicious, since the grid positively was active during that time. Also, a clear trail of Launch Phase A8M system indicators exists back to the massive scalar exercise of April/May 1985. The first Titan explosion in Aug. 1985 thus falls within the Soviets' "now let's test them against U.S. launch vehicles" period. The second Titan loss follows highly suspicious losses of the Arrow DC-8 on Dec -T7 1985 and the Challenger on Jan. 28, 1986. The same Soviet weapon system that destroyed those targets may also have destroyed one or both of the critical Titans.

The Soviets have also been able to significantly engineer the weather over North America for more than a decade without being found out. They have tested a fantastic range of anti-ballistic missile (ABM) defense weapons for over two decades, and no one is the wiser in the West.

As previously stated, prior to the end of November, 1985, at least three "wet-run" tests of a Soviet "launch phase ABM system" against actual U.S. shuttle launches were made directly over Cape Canaveral itself, and still no one recognized what was happening or what sort of weapon was being tested. On December 12, destruction of the Arrow DC-8 in Newfoundland produced no indications that the Americans and Canadians knew anything about the nature of the weapon possibly used.

Accordingly, after a sufficient wait to test our reactions (if any), the Soviets prepared to actually destroy a shuttle after its launch.

Destruction of the Challenger in January 1986

As the whole world knows, on January 28, 1986 the shuttle Challenger was launched from Cape Canaveral, Florida after exposure to undesirable weather conditions, and disastrously exploded shortly after launch. The evidence seems to indicate that, as the rising vehicle was stressed, one end of its right booster broke loose, twisting away and into the main fuel tank, causing rupture, spillage of the fuel and catastrophic explosion. Several other anomalies still exist, however, and it is clear that a problem existed with at least one of the booster scals. All seven astronauts aboard the flight were killed in the fiery destruction of the vehicle.

Of course no one had recognized that the Soviets had already tested a launch-phase anti-ballistic missile (LPABM) system against three of our previous shuttle launches. These "wet-runs" used a deliberate "time offset" to delay the explosive emergence of electromagnetic energy in a launched shuttle's location along its trajectory. The delayed test shots resulted in very large "booms" above the Iaunch site after the shuttle was safely out of the area, but did not destroy the shuttle vehicles themselves. For example, the delayed-shot boom occurred 12 minutes after the evening launch of Nov. 26, 1985. Even a marker beacon (large light in the sky) was utilized on that launch shortly after lift-off. The marker beacon was photographed. In addition, another photograph taken in a time sequence shows another sudden streak of light coming down and ending in a burst of light. This was probably a spatially-offset test of the "pulse" mode for destroying the shuttle. The "light burst" would have been detected in the Soviet Union and scored against its intended offset position. However, another mechanism may have been used to cause destruction of the shuttle itself.

On Jan. 1, 1986 the presence of a metal-softening signal added on to the Soviet LPABM system's scalar EM transmissions was detected by a surprised Frank Golden. The metal-softening ability of the detected signal was experimentally verified by him. Golden also locally nullified the action of the scalar EM signal in a test, rather conclusively establishing (1) that it existed and (2) what it was. The signal was apparently being prepared for use against an upcoming U.S. shuttle launch.

Just prior to the launch of the shuttle in late January, 1986, the Soviets accomplished significant weather engineering over the U.S. The jet stream was severely bent southward in the middle of the U.S., bending rightward again to move across the Florida panhandle. Icy cold air from Canada was drawn far down, into Florida and onto the Challenger sitting on its launch pad. This exposure to cold outside its tested range was probably an additional factor contributing to the Challenger's failure. Positive signatures of the Soviet weather engineering and jet stream manipulation were observed and photographed by several persons, particularly in Alabama and California.

On January 28, 1986, the Soviet scalar EM weapon system effects were sharply localized in the launch zone. Localization involved higher frequencies being present; these are quite painful to small brains - whose hemispheres act as a scalar interferometer and detector - such as in birds. As commented upon by national news commentators, strangely the birds were not flying that morning. Indeed, they were staying down on the ground or avoiding the area, since the sky over the area was painful to them.

As the Challenger rose, the metal-softening signal would have been experienced in and around the boosters shortly after ignition, since the booster flame acts as a special "ion-plasma" turner/detector for the scalar signal. (Certain plasmas have a unique characteristic: they transform an input transverse wave to a longitudinal wave, or an input longitudinal wave to a transverse wave.) The effect of such a local signal is to "change mass in the immediate vicinity" with the particular scalar resonance signal. (Mass acts as a capacitance or accumulator for scalar resonance).

The ill-fated Challenger was doomed. After ignition, the booster flame acted as a ionic plasma detector/amplifier for the scalar metal-softening signal on the Soviet Woodpecker grid. The metal in and around the booster flame was slowly and steadily weakening due to charge-up with the metal-softening pattern. This attributed to booster leakage from the already cold-damaged seal. The leaking booster poured out smoke and later flame, contributing to the impending disaster.

Substantial winds and air turbulence over the site increased the stress on the Challenger as it rose through this region. This also contributed to the impending disaster and may have been deliberately created there by Soviet weather engineering.

As the Challenger stressed, eventually one or more weakened metal mounts gave way, partially freeing the end of the right booster. The booster oscillated, rotating into the tank and rupturing it. Contact of the escaping liquid fuel and the flame resulted in a fiery explosion, destroying the vehicle.

Even so another anomalous flame or light was observed on the vehicle, and may have represented a very small additional "pulse mode energy form" produced by the Soviet weapon that was attacking the Challenger. The shock of the explosion probably killed the astronauts instantly, although the cabin appears to have remained essentially intact while it plunged several miles to the ocean below.

By treating excess cold exposure to the shuttle, inducing metal-softening in and around the ignited booster, and possible adding a deliberate "intensely hot spot", the Soviets caused the Challenger to weaken and destroy itself shortly after launch, in so subtle a fashion that NASA scientists would not suspect what had actually caused the mishap. The Soviets also had previously withdrawn all their trawlers and ships which normally shadow a shuttle launch, to prevent any suggestion of Soviet presence near or involvement in the catastrophic accident.

A few days later, sporadically intense "high frequency localization signals" were still present on the grid, at least at one hinge-point at Birmingham, Alabama. From 1-4 February 1986, many birds inadvertently flew into the zone when an intense breakout of these components occurred, and dead birds fell from the sky in substantial numbers.

* According to an Urgentgram sent out by General D. Graham, on the evening of the Challenger's loss, KGB headquarters held a party to celebrate "success of their active measure against the shuttle." Note that all Soviet scalar EM weapons - development, testing, deployment, and usage - is under command and control of the KGB.

Among other things, this briefing details the bizarre series of indicators that showed the Soviet intention to destroy the vehicle, and documents the accidental discovery of the signal with which they intended to cause the shuttle to fail and destroy itself.

Technological Surprise and a New Hiroshima

Sadly, the bureaucratic smugness of orthodox Western scientists has materially assisted the Soviet deception process. Most Western managerial scientists - particularly in weapons development activities — have continued to view the Soviets as ignorant peasants, still trying to clean the mud off their boots. This view, of course, is totally untrue and unwarranted.

It takes only a few examples to refute this attitude. In nonlinear mathematics, engineering and science, the Soviets have led their Western counterparts since the beginning. The electromagnetic pulse (EMP) effect of a nuclear explosion appeared in the ordinary Soviet scientific literature before Western scientists were even aware that the effect existed. The Soviets continue to lead the world in explosive welding, titanium forming and welding, etc. While the Soviet scientists exhibit little inclination to build good washing machines, they certainly do produce state-of-the-art technology — and beyond — in any area in which they focus their main efforts. (We do lead the Soviets in some areas such as computers, computer software, miniaturization, etc.)

Once before, a modern nation - the United States - developed a mighty weapon in secrecy and used it to force a powerful foe - Japan — to its knees. The mindbending atomic blows to Hiroshima, and shortly after to Nagasaki, showed once and for all that in the modern age technological surprise can prove instantly disastrous. Yet in our scientific arrogance, we have assumed that no one else will ever do such a thing. We have assumed that it certainly could never happen to us, and that the "secret weapon" scenario will never be repeated. On the contrary, it has happened again, someone else has done it, and it has happened to us.

It has also become fashionable in the West to believe that all the laws of physics are already discovered. We assume we already know all of them. While we have been pridefully crowing this tune, the Soviets have been steadily discovering new laws in secret, as well as new ways to circumvent the old laws.

We Have Given Up Defense in the Larger Sense

Meanwhile, to defend ourselves strategically, we have chosen to forego "defense" and rely almost totally on building a powerful strategic offense that is capable (we think!) of destroying our would-be enemies anywhere in the world. Our offensive striking power is based mostly on a triad of deterrent forces - land-based ballistic missiles, submarine-launched ballistic missiles, and strategic bombers. The cruise missile is presently being added to the triad. If this 4-part offense were nullified or destroyed by Soviet secret weapons, we would be powerless to prevent our own destruction and Soviet domination of the world.

We have been viewing ourselves as Samson, confident in the strength of our locks.

Yet literally our locks have been secretly shorn and the Philistines are already upon us. Indeed, Soviet energetics weapons are now capable of destroying our triad shield, our homeland, our armed forces in the field, and our population, quickly and efficiently. We have a new "gap" of monumental proportions: not a missile gap, not a submarine or bomber gap, and not even a particle beam or laser gap. We have a scalar electromagnetics or electrogravitation gap.

In this briefing, it is my purpose to show a portion of the Soviet weapons developments that have lead me to such dire conclusions. The Fer-de-Lance briefing is also an attempt to galvanize our leaders and scientists into action, for our present total vulnerability to the Soviet Fer-de-Lance weapons is intolerable and unacceptable.

Unless we achieve defenses — and quickly — our own demise in a fashion similar to the Hiroshima-Nagasaki scenario is inevitable and imminent.

Slide 001: Characterization

We point out at the beginning that this briefing and its interpretation are the result of 22 years of analysis and effort by a single analyst. It is entirely unofficial. It is not approved or disapproved by any corporation, company, or government agency. It has been prepared by this analyst at nights, on weekends, on holidays, and during off-duty time.

It has been prepared mostly at personal expense, though several grants and support have been received from R. J. Reynolds III, Peter Kelly, Mike Bearden, Interdimensional Sciences, Association of Distinguished American Scientists, and others. Very valuable assistance has been received from the U.S. Psychotronics Association and the Planetary Association for Clean Energy. These contributions are deeply appreciated and most gratefully acknowledged.

Graphics and artwork support by Hal Crawford, Margaret Wilson, Tommy Neumann, Ron Cole, and Lee Giles has been invaluable. My sincere thanks go to these artists who have made the presentation vivid and imaginative. A great deal of background support was given by Joe Gambill, Frank Golden, Tom Herold, Ken Moore, Pete Kelly, Eike Mueller and Mel Bartlett and is deeply appreciated.

Finally, the help of many other persons and colleagues too numerous to enumerate is also gratefully acknowledged.

If the U.S. bureaucracy ever moves and develops defenses against scalar EM weapons, it will largely be due to the support of the persons and organizations who have freely given of their talents and resources to further this effort.

Slide 002: Outline

This presentation does not attempt to cover the complete field of energetics weapons developed by the Soviet Union. Instead, it concentrates on the major areas necessary to understand the type of weapons likely to be unleashed on our strategic and tactical installations and our troops and their equipment. It does not attempt to present the frightful bio-electromagnetic weapons the Soviets have developed to be unleashed on our populace at large and on our troops in the field. Also, the briefing does not dwell on the historical progression, but on the types of weapons themselves.

Of necessity, it presents several shortcomings in classical EM, and presents three differing views of electromagnetics and what can be done with them. The briefing particularly stresses the Aharanov-Bohm (AB) effect. This mesoscopic effect, which produces action at a distance by pure EM flux and not EM force fields, has been extended by the Soviet weapons developers into the macroscopic world around us.

In addition, we develop the basic concepts of scalar electromagnetics and how electrogravitation is achieved. The basic concepts of scalar interferometry and scalar resonance are briefly advanced, and a few of the major kill and damage mechanisms are presented. The nearly total vulnerability of our present electronic equipment, personnel, communications, vehicles, aircraft, ships, missiles, submarines, nuclear weapons, and materiel is stressed.

Finally, a short summary is given to highlight the main points of the briefing.

Slide 003: Elements of the Emerging Theory

Specifically, we will point out some flaws in vector mathematics itself, particularly with the concept of the zero force vector. The zero force vector is a system of forces that sum to a zero resultant. Hence the components of the summation represent a patterned stress in the medium to which they are applied, or in which they are imbedded. This includes the vacuum (spacetime) medium. In classical electromagnetics, this vacuum stress due to a zero-vector summation of EM force fields has been totally omitted and ignored.

As such, the EM "zero" force-vector summation produces a "trapped internal EM flux and flux pattern, without resultant (external) force field" condition - precisely as does the Aharonov-Bohm effect. The components of the artificially zeroed system, however, can be transmitted and still maintain their special relationship and coherence. While the AB effect has been shown to hold for the mesoscale (a few thousands of angstroms), the zero-vector scalar EM effect can hold for hundreds of thousands of kilometers.

To provide a unified electrogravitation, we adapt Kaluza-Klein 5-dimensional gravitational concepts to the idea of the zero-vector stress system in vacuum-spacetime. We also point out how simultaneously varying the magnitudes of the force components of a stress, all in phase, produces a stress wave or scalar EM wave. Scalar waves are almost always absorbed and emitted by the nucleus of the atom, not by the electrons in orbit.

The relationship of mass and vacuum, and the constitution of the vacuum, are pointed out from the viewpoint of modern quantum mechanics.

How a scalar wave resonance differs from conventional EM resonance is developed briefly. Mass and inertia are the direct result of - and are - trapped scalar resonance. The trapping mechanism is the spin of the particle.

Severely limiting assumptions in ordinary general relativity (OGR) are pointed out. In OGR, it is assumed that the local frame is always a Lorentz frame, and never curved. In other words, local spacetime is always assumed to be flat. This saves the conservation laws, simplifies relativity, and reduces "general" relativity to special relativity with distant perturbations and curvatures.

By removing this ad hoc assumption, a much richer local general relativity results. This local general relativity is readily engineered. Note that, in OGR, the physicist has actually assumed that he can never "engineer" local general relativity! Indeed, with the scalar EM approach, he can easily do so, in contradiction to what is taught in all Western universities.

By engineering a local general relativity (LGR), the individual conservation laws can be violated locally. This includes the conservation of energy/momentum, and the conservation of charge, for example.

The major implication of this startling new engineering physics is that one can engineer physical reality itself. For example, elements can be transmuted with minuscule energy input, free energy devices are possible, action at a distance is possible, communication faster than light speed is possible, etc.

By using the zero-vector approach, the virtual state can be organized and made largely deterministic, rather than statistical. This means that the probabilities of the states propagated forward by the Schroedinger equation can be engineered and changed. Whether or not a certain quantum change shall emerge or not can be determined or substantially influenced in advance. Bohm's hidden variable theory now becomes directly engineerable. This is a drastic change to quantum mechanics and physics in general.

Another implication is that this is the final engineering, for it allows the direct engineering of physical reality itself. Humans must now find a way to resolve their differences peacefully, or shortly Man will destroy himself and his biosphere by his own hand.

Slide 004: Three Kinds of Electromagnetics

There are actually three kinds - or three views - of EM. These are (1) the classical view, (2) the quantum mechanical view, and (3) the scalar EM or electrogravitational view.

In the classical view, the potentials are just mathematical conveniences and do not physically exist. The real causative agents are the force fields, and there is no longer any electromagnetics going on if the force fields reduce to zero. Further, the ideas of "charge" and "charged mass" have been made erroneously synonymous.

Of course the classical view was formed from the idea of a thin material ether, with electricity as a thin fluid, long before the discovery of the electron. Since most earlier scientists studied string waves and these are transverse, the EM wave was modeled as a transverse wave. Also, detection equipment actually detected transverse waves. The role of electron spin and drift velocity, which would have shown that force-field-causing EM waves in the vacuum could only be longitudinal, was not yet discovered. Maxwell's equations and the classical approach became so engrained that the basic derivations were never corrected for more modern discoveries.

The quantum mechanical view, on the other hand, regards the potentials as the real physical actants, and the force fields are just effects derived from the potentials by differentiating operators. Classically oriented physicists have adamantly opposed this foundations requirement of QM because it would require nearly a complete redo of EM theory. It would also rather drastically change our ideas of physical reality. For years a controversy has raged around the Aharonov-Bohm effect (which demonstrates the reality of the potentials, among other things). Only this year - 1986 - have most physicists finally accepted the AB effect with its implications (see Physics Today, Jan. 86). However, no changes have yet been made to EM theory and the basic classical approach to electrical physics and engineering.

Yet even the QM view is flawed, since it has not examined the structure of EM forces which sum to a vector zero. Such a system produces stress, and if the summation is in the vacuum itself, it produces stress of vacuum/spacetime. Rigorously, this is a gravitational effect, and the energies of the various EM components in the local region are locked into an artificial potential. From general relativity, this type of potential where the energy density of vacuum is altered is a gravitational potential. From Kaluza-Klein unified theory, it is at least a 5-dimensional gravitational potential.

If the individual force vector components of the vector zero are varying in magnitude - say, all in phase - then they produce a gravitational wave. The energy density of the local vacuum is being rhythmically varied. Call such an EM wave a scalar EM wave, where, by "scalar" we imply that, to an external observer, the EM force vector resultants are identically zero, but the local gravitational potential of the wave is varying. Thus this is an electrogravitational wave, and vector zeroing of EM force fields constitutes a means of changing EM field energy into G-field energy. On the other hand, by breaking up the coherence of the zero-vector summation of the EM forces, nonzero EM resultants are recovered, constituting the change of gravitational energy into EM energy.

A simple means to break zero-summed coherence is by interference of two or more such zero-vector waves.

In this, third view of EM, action at a distance is easily possible, and is the norm rather than the exception. In addition, a new kind of resonance - scalar resonance - exists. The scalar EM wave does not interact with orbital electrons, but rather with the interior of the nuclei of atoms. Thus the new scalar EM resonance is between nuclei and within nuclei.

Slide 005: Bohm-Aharonov Effect

In 1959, Aharonov and Bohm published a fundamental paper in Physical Review, which pointed out the QM implications of potentials as the real entities, while force fields were derived effects. They showed that, even in the presence of zero EM force fields, the potentials may still exist and produce real effects in physical systems. They also suggested experiments to prove these predictions.

Interference of the potentials is the key mechanism producing real effects in charged particle systems, even in the presence of zero E-field and zero B-field. Unfortunately the AB paper did not address the issue of zero-summed systems of EM force fields as one way of producing artificial potentials having unique characteristics

At any rate, the "AB effect," as it came to be called, was rather hotly resisted and debated over the years, until finally it has generally been accepted as proven in 1986. The principle represents a violation of both classical mechanics and classical electromagnetics. It is required, however, by quantum mechanics and quantum electrodynamics. And experiment has proved it.

Slide 006: A-Field is Real

In classical EM, the vector magnetic potential (the A-field) had been defined as a mathematical convenience by the equation

$$\nabla \mathrm{x} A = B \qquad [1j$$

But if the potentials are real, then conceivably the A field can be loosed from its enchainment to the $\nabla \mathrm{x}$ operator. In that case, it becomes a free, new, and independent field of nature with potentially unique characteristics. For example, its defining equation shows that magnetic force field can be made from it, and the rightmost term of the equation shows that its time rate of change makes an electric field.

Let us explain this in more simple terms, and somewhat more precisely than conventional theory. We will use the Kaluza unified G-EM interpretation and electron flow in our explanation.

In the A-field, we have a certain kind of 5-dimensional G-potential which can bleed-off as EM force fields in two ways: (1) in a swirl fashion, where the vortex producing the swirl moves parallel to electron movement, and the swirling is a torque or spin, and (2) in a linear fashion, where the time rate of change of the A-potential produces a linear E-field on the electrons.

The first bleed-off as given by equation [1] constitutes the magnetic B-field, and the second bleed-off as given by the rightmost term of equation [2] creates a component of the overall electrical E-field. (Bleed-off of the electrostatic scalar potential produces the other component of the E-field).

Now in general relativity (GR) theory, "the" G-potential is just a conglomerate of many things, each of which has the characteristic of curving spacetime. "The" gravitational field is not a single thing at all, but is composed of a collection of many things.

Thus if we realize that both the electrostatic scalar potential (Ø-field) and the magnetic vector potential (A-field) are components of the 5-d G-potential, then we see immediately that bleed-off of these two components of the 5-d G-potential creates all normal EM force fields.

It follows that, if we produce a zero-vector summation of the two or more EM bleed-offs, we are actually "putting as much back in" to the 5-d G-potential through its A and Ø components as we are taking out electromagnetically. In that case, the 5-potential is in a state of equilibrium with respect to EM bleed-off. It is now forced to bleed-off in the only other way it can: as ordinary 4-dimensional gravitational field. Thus by vector-zeroing EM force fields, we turn EM field energy into G-field energy and vice versa, via the intermediary of the 5-potential.

At any rate, soon after publication of the Aharonov-Bohm paper, experiments showed that, if the magnetic field is trapped inside a long solenoid, a phase shift still is induced in the two-slit electron experiment, even though - classically - no contact of the enclosed magnetic field and the moving electrons occurs. This phase shift is explained by the fact that the freed A-field exists outside the trapping solenoid, even though the B-field does not. Consequently, interaction of this free A-field with the electrons produces a phase shift of the QM interference detection pattern.

This proves that A-field is real and causes physical effects.

It also proves that a form of action at a distance is real, just as required by quantum mechanics.

Years ago, Frank Golden and this author - together with Dr. William Tiller - experimented with "free A-field" devices. Golden went on to develop prototype transmitters and receivers and a prototype underwater communication system.

Since that time, Gelinas has patented several curl-free magnetic vector potential (free A-field) devices: see U.S. patent no. 4,447,779, May 8, 1984; 4,429,288. Jan. 31, 1984; 4,429,280, Jan. 31, 1984; and 4,432,098, Feb. 14, 1984. These patents are assigned to Honeywell.

QUANTUM NON-LOCALITY

"The non-local aspect of quantum systems is ... a general property of nature, and not just a freak situation manufactured in the laboratory."

PAUL DAVIES, SUPERFORCE
1984 (PAGE 48)

Slide 007: Quantum Non-Locality

Indeed, quantum systems exhibit nonlocal effects that are general properties of nature. These effects are not just freak situations manufactured in subtle laboratory experiments.

However, if spatial coherence in such microscopic effects can be induced and sustained, then action-at-a-distance can be obtained in large macroscopic systems. This is the engineering aspect of the scalar EM approach.

It is also the aspect that the Soviets have secretly weaponized for over three decades.

The zero-vector EM force-field summation of multiple EM waves is used to transport specific time-phased patterns of EM polarization of vacuum to a distance. There interference of two or more such patterns results in the interference of the internal patterns, breaking of the phase relations, and appearance of positive (added) or negative (extracted) EM energy in the intersection region.

VECTOR MATHEMATICS HAS A FUNDAMENTAL PROBLEM

IN ITS AXIOM FOR THE ZERO VECTOR, VECTOR ANALYSIS DISCARDS ZERO VECTOR
SUMMATIONS OF ACTIVE SYSTEMS OF VECTORS.

VECTOR ZERO IS MADE THE ABSENCE OF ALL VECTORS

(IT CAN ALSO BE THE PRESENCE OF REAL VECTORS WHOSE VECTOR SUM IS 0ī.)

Slide 008: Vector Mathematics has a Fundamental Problem

In its concept of the zero vector, vector mathematics discards zero-vector summations of active systems of vectors. It replaces such a summation with a zero vector. This is fine for mathematics as an abstract system, but it is in error when applied to real electromagnetic force fields of nature.

In the abstract mathematics, a vector zero summation is made the "absence of all finite vectors". Further, all vector zeros are made equal. No concept of the "internal stress" of the zero vector exists in abstract vector mathematics.

However, physically the zero summation or "balancing" of vector forces in a medium represents stress in that medium. In the physical case, a vector zero summation system of non-zero vectors has a dynamic substructure, and this substructure is an individual.

Obviously, in the physical case vector zero summations may materially differ, both in the pattern of stress and the magnitude of stress. They cannot all be equated. Further, they are not the absence of vectors, but represent the presence of vectors in a special manner. Such a zero summation of EM vector forces directly stresses the "medium" - which may be the vacuum itself.

In the physical case, several changes to the axioms of abstract vector mathematics are required. (1) the "potential" of a vector zero must be taken into account, such as is represented by the sum of the squares of the magnitudes of its vector components. (2) the specific deterministic pattern of the vector components comprising the zero must be taken into account. (3) The dynamic variation in both the deterministic directions and deterministic magnitudes of the components and of the overall pattern must be taken into account. (4) Frequencies of the changes in the direction, magnitude, and actual makeup of the vector zero must now be accounted for. That is, time and wavelengths are rigorously aspects of the vector zero, and these may be deterministic variables. Since time itself is now a variable aspect of the vector, the vector zero system can affect its "rate of time flow" in the observer's system. (5) Since a "reference vector zero" can be established at any point of a vector magnitude, then individual vectors themselves may have dynamic substructures inside a special "zero reference" in and on the vector. The patterned potential of a vector is a reality.

This leads to a system of "vectors nested inside vectors" ad infinitum. In other words, it leads to an infinite-dimensional system, and the "opening" of every finite closed vector system through its vector zeroes.

For application to physical electrogravitational systems, at least 5 dimensions are required, four of space and one of time.

Here we still are considering only a special case where all vector zero summations represent EM force field energy locked in a gravitational potential, or gravitational force field energy locked inside the EM potentials. That is, we are prescribing a system where the only intertranslation of energy is among mass, EM field, gravitational field, and vacuum virtual energy (anenergy).

$$\bar{V} + \bar{O} = \bar{O} + \bar{V}"$$

$$O_i = O_j$$

- THIS MAKES ALL O_i EQUAL BY ASSUMPTION, SINCE THERE IS ASSUMED TO BE ONLY A SINGLE TYPE O WITHOUT REAL COMPONENTS

Slide 009: The Zero-Vector Axiom

This slide shows a standard mathematical statement of the zero-vector axiom, used in many texts.

As can be seen, all zero-vectors are made identical, and no substructure is considered.

Such an abstract system of vector mathematics does not fit physical reality. However, when all one's EM foundations concepts are strongly conditioned in this fashion, the gravitational aspects of EM are discarded.

Further, EM theory, experiments, and equipments will be developed along these limiting lines. In that case, EM engineering of gravitational effects will not be developed. One will assume that it is impossible to have a locally curved spacetime, and hence all local frames will be Lorentz frames. Therefore the conservation laws will rigorously apply.

Further, the nonlocal quantum effects will stay firmly in the microscopic world where they belong. Physical macro-reality will stay stable and predictable in a classical manner.

General relativity (in curved spacetimes) will be restricted to the special case of the local special relativistic (uncurved) spacetime, with only distant perturbations (spacetime curvatures).

The world will stay sane and "normal", and the totally variable insanity of physical reality will remain bottled up in the minute microworld or the distant maelstrom of suns, stars, black holes, etc.

The Aharonov-Bohm heresy will stay kaput in the real world and will not be unleashed beyond mesoscopic reality — a few thousand angstroms or so.

With such an error in the application of vector mathematics to physical science, we become "flatland physicists," so to speak. We become like skimmer bugs on the surface of a pond; we have no appreciation of the dynamics of the depths below or of the heavens above.

Worse, we condition our development of instruments according to the fixed notions in our heads. Then we use these "biased" instruments to do experiments that reaffirm our notions. Any deviation suggested to this is considered heresy and nonsense.

And as Max Planck once pointed out, you will get a new physics only when the old physicists — who so adamantly oppose it — die off.

Slide 010: Are These Systems Equal?

Shown here are some representations of various very simple zero-vector systems. As can be seen, the stress magnitudes and the spin and dynamics of all of these systems are very different.

Further, their "stress potential" substructures are not composed of a huge collection of little random force vectors. Instead, their substructures are deterministic. If the components being put into the zeros are varied in direction and magnitude, but always sum to a zero resultant, then highly complex substructure dynamics may be created and utilized, infolded (Bohm's term) inside the zero vector.

In theory one can establish "channels" of communication and power (magnitude) transmission without ever surfacing a nonzero EM force field. In practice one can do this with very little EM spillout. Thus one can establish electrogravitational channels and energy transmission inside normal EM potentials and/or ordinary EM carrier waves.

One can use a conventional system of EM potentials, force fields, and waves as a special kind of "wiring circuit" in and through which to transmit and produce electrogravitational effects. By distant interference, EM effects at a great distance can be accomplished, yet no "ordinary EM energy" has passed between the transmitters and the distant interference zone.

Unfortunately, these infolded dynamic zero-vector systems have been eliminated from physics.

They are omitted in classical EM, ordinary general relativity (OGR), and quantum mechanics.

That is, they have been omitted in Western physics.

They have not been omitted in secret Soviet weapons labs and weapons development programs.

Slide 012: Kaluza Geometry

In 1921, Theordor Kaluza, a Polish physicist, published a unified theory of electromagnetics and gravitation. Albert Einstein, who had had the paper for two years, recommended his paper for publication. In that theory, five dimensions - four space and one time - are utilized in the basic model. This gives a 5-dimensional spacetime.

In the model, electromagnetics and ordinary gravity are two aspects of a single more fundamental field: the 5-space gravity field. Electromagnetism is that part of the 5-field that operates (bleeds-off) in the fifth dimension.

The ordinary 4-space G-field is the small residue that spills over into our ordinary 4-space, and doesn't slide around into the fifth dimension and bleed-off there as electromagnetics.

Implicit in the theory, but not explicitly stated, is the fact that the 5-space G-potential bleeds-off in two fashions: (1) in the 5th dimension nearly unopposed, to produce what we see as EM force fields, and (2) in the ordinary 4-space we live in, which we see as ordinary gravitational field.

Normally almost all the force field bleed-off is in the fifth dimension as EM; only a minuscule bit bleeds off as 4-gravity.

Just as one example, between two electrons the 5-space G-potential bleeds-off into electric force field about 10^{42} times as much as it bleeds-off into 4-space G-field.

A POTENTIAL IS A CHANGE IN THE STRESS OF VACUUM LINEAR REGION
SPACETIME CURVATURE
VACUUM SPACETIME

Slide 013: A Potential is a Change in the Stress of Vacuum

In physics, the idea of a "potential" is very poorly defined, if at all. The normal "definition" for the electrostatic scalar potential, for example, is not a definition at all. Instead, it's an abstract operation that tells how to mathematically calculate the magnitude of the potential, by pushing a unit charge in from infinity, against the potential field.

Now ultimately a definition must be an identity statement, not an operational statement about something.

Since I could find hardly anyone who actually understood what a potential was, and how or of what it was composed, I simply took quantum mechanics at face value and constructed this model.

First, the modern view of the vacuum is that it is not an emptiness, but a plenum. It's teeming with an incredible amount of raw energy, existing totally as the temporary bits of energy of virtual particles. That is, the vacuum "energy" exists as the nonintegrated energies of little particles which appear from nothing fare spontaneously created) and disappear into nothing (are spontaneously annihilated) almost instantly. This happens so fast that the little particle and its energy cannot individually be detected; it doesn't hang around long enough.

Hence the fleeting little booger is called a "virtual" particle. Like, "We had 'im there man, for just a moment, but he was gone before we could grab 'im!"

This kind of ghostly particle, however, is very real in modern physics. All observable forces are theorized to be due to the integration or collection of a large number of virtual forces created by exchange of these little particles.

However, this implies a peculiar thing about the vacuum "energy." Actually it's vacuum energies, for each little bit of energy only exists momentarily, then returns to the nothingness from which it came. That is, vacuum virtual energies are totally unintegrated. Each "bit" of virtual energy exists individually. These virtual energies cannot be "added up" to compute the "available energy" unless some collector or integrating mechanism puts them together.

That is, unless some kind of "zipper" is there to "zip them together" into macroscopic, observable energy. The usual "zipper" is a spinning, observable particle of mass. We say that the vacuum energy is unzipped and hence unobservable in that state. We say that "observable energy" is just zipped-together vacuum energies - integrated by and on a spinning, observable particle of mass.

So the vacuum can be visualized as a special sort of violent, unzipped plasma, where the particles of the plasma are fleeting and do not last. We can speak of it also as a sort of special unzipped gas, in the same manner.

The "pressure" of the vacuum gas we refer to as "stress." Due to its violent boiling activity, the vacuum gas is always under very high stress.

This "stressed virtual plasma" identically IS the vacuum and identically IS spacetime. Length, time, frame, mass, etc. - all arise by zipping operations (or understood zipping operations) in and of this raw vacuum/spacetime. When one uses the vacuum notion in this manner, one now uses the term "ether" again. However, this is not the old "thin material ether that hangs around"; this is an entirely new kind. It's a virtual flux and a virtual plasma.

The ether is also what we call "spacetime" in relativity. As can be seen, spacetime is stressed. Further, spacetime has a substructure.

By an uncurved spacetime, we mean one in which the stress of these virtual particles (the "pressure in the ethereal gas," so to speak) is constant from one place to another and from one time to another. Indeed, we also should mean that the stresses of the individual components of the entire plasma are constant from one place to another and from one time to another.

By definition, when we determine the lengths between every two points, we determine a frame. (Actually, we have prescribed a universal "length zipping" operation/mechanism as well as its characteristics.). A "linear frame" or "Lorentz frame" is one in which the pressure or stress remains constant. It may be higher than ambient vacuum, however, due to a particle's or an object's motion through the observer's ether. In the case of constant velocity, the particle/object encounters a higher level of virtual particle flux in the observer's ether, like a vehicle moving through raindrops. It encounters a constant rate of flux, however. In such constant velocity case, the moving object's frame is said to be "rotated," but not curved, with respect to the laboratory frame of the observer.

In a "curved" spacetime, we mean one in which the stress of vacuum increases or decreases from one place to another, or from one time to another, or both. At one fixed location, if spacetime is curved, then the stress is increasing or decreasing as a function of time. That is, the flux density of that area is changing. We may visualize the local frame as undergoing angular acceleration, rotating more or rotating less. This is a non-Lorentz frame, or curved spacetime. It is also a nonlinear vacuum.

In such a vacuum, local gradients exist in the flux of virtual particles. If affected by (coupled to) one or more of these gradients by a nonzero coefficient, a local object experiences effects (forces and actions) "without observable cause." Observably, conservation laws may be locally violated by these "virtual rivers" of vacuum by coupling, just as a paddlewheel dipped in a river violates its own local "conservation of energy" due to the river providing an energy source to it.

One must be very careful with the "pressure" analogy, however, when one utilizes unified theory (Kaluza theory). We now have a virtual plasma vacuum in five dimensions, not four. But the basic notions to enable our visualization and understanding still apply.

TYPE OF POTENTIAL DEPENDS ON THE PARTICLE(S)

ELECTROSTATIC
SCALAR POTENTIAL
VIRTUAL PHOTONS
VACUUM SPACETIME

Slide 014: Type of Potential Depends on the Particle(s)

Now one can see that, by choosing the type or class of virtual particle, and looking at its potential or stress in the vacuum, one can have many kinds of "potentials" existing in the overall "gravitational potential" of vacuum spacetime.

For example, the stress of the virtual photon flux (which is what causes electrical charge) is called "electrostatic scalar potential."*

We can choose any other class of virtual particle we wish, and there exists a potential (and "change") for it. There are quark potentials, neutrinic potentials, etc.

Indeed, one of the reasons for ignoring Kaluza unified theory for so long was that it predicts a great many types of potentials and fields which have never been observed and which are unknown. Approximations, which neglected all these mysterious, and unknown fields, gave erroneous results. Perplexed physicists, seeking to simplify matters, simply turned away from it in frustration. They returned to it in the mid-70's when it appeared that 11-dimensional Kaluza-Klein theory possibly offered a complete unified theory.

Actually, the diversity of new fields in Kaluza theory was its strength not its weakness. That they are presently unobservable and undetectable is beside the point. Neither is time directly observable; however, we have worked out handy procedures and measurements of spatial quantities, which allow us to infer time. We have not just tried to drop it from physics!

And indeed the Kaluza theory is consistent with experiment when the higher fields are included. The message is, we must work out "clocks" for these new potentials and fields, so that they can be inferred with at least some degree of precision

- The character of movement also determines the type of potential. The longitudinal (radial) movement of the virtual photon flux is implied in electrostatic scalar potential. The swirl (tangential) component of this flux might be taken as the magnetostatic scalar potential - a magnetic pole - when the cw and ccw components of the swirl balance, but the sum of their absolute values differs from the sum of the absolute values of the corresponding tangential components in the swirl flux of the local ambient vacuum. If this swirl stress is higher than the vacuum swirl stress, this constitutes a north magnetic pole. If lower, it constitutes a south magnetic pole. If there is a prevalence of direction (cw or ccw) in the swirl (i.e., one component exceeds the other), this corresponds to the magnetic vector potential (the A-field) when the A-field is freed from the magnetic force field (B-field) — i.e., when A-field is freed from its $\nabla \mathrm{x}$ operator in the equation $\nabla \mathrm{x} A = B$. The bleed-off of the excess swirl stress from the north magnetic pole to the deficient swirl stress of the south magnetic pole constitutes the magnetic force field, B — usually referred to simply as the "magnetic field."

Slide 015: A Potential Extends to Infinity & Involves the Entire Universe

As shown on this slide, the change in the stress of vacuum due to a potential tapers off to infinity. Its magnitude normally does not reduce to zero until infinity.

Some types of potentials reduce much faster or slower than others, however, and so - at some distance away from a common origin of the potentials, one or more may be neglected in its (their) overall effects on an experiment or system.

Also, the speed of propagation of potential is highly dependent upon (1) what type of virtual particle or particles produce its stress, (2) its magnitude, (3) its composition, and (4) the presence or absence of coupling objects and other interacting potentials.

Fundamental observable particles are like little spray pumps and little vacuum cleaners at the same time.

Each is emitting virtual particles into the vacuum in a spray or flux, and at the same time it is absorbing virtual particles from the vacuum spray or flux. It's a little dynamo, and nature furnishes its driving energy unceasingly.

However, each little virtual particle it emits is itself such a little simultaneous pump and vacuum cleaner. That is, it's also emitting an even finer (and faster) flux of smaller virtual particles, and at the same time it's also absorbing flux al this time finer level.

"Bigger fleas have smaller fleas to bite em;

And so on ad infinitum".

We may consider the vacuum to be made of an infinite number of virtual state layers or levels.

It is not too difficult to show that each of these successively deeper, nested "layers" of virtual state corresponds to a successively higher dimension being added to our 4-space basic spacetime. So hyperdimensions and deeper levels of virtual state are one and the same thing.

The basic "speed" of the first layer is c, the speed of light.

The basic "speed" of the second layer is c^2.

And so on.

This is interesting. We may directly engineer the virtual state by means of the vector zero (scalar electromagnetics) approach. By nesting vector zeros inside other vector zeros, we may directly engineer the deeper layers of virtual state, and consequently hyperdimensions.

Scalar electromagnetics thus is virtual state engineering and hyperspatial engineering at one and the same time.

Superluminal communications systems, hyperspace drive, and materialization and dematerialization are all hypothetically possible, using scalar electromagnetics. As the technology develops, we should see the development of many of the systems long thought impossible except in science fiction.

A NATURAL POTENTIAL
POTENTIAL
DIRECTIONS OF PARTICLES ARE RANDOM
VACUUM SPACETIME

Slide 016: A Natural Potential

There are two broad categories of EM potentials, depending upon the way in which they are formed.

The two categories of potential formation are: (1) natural, and (2) artificial.

The difference is in the virtual particle flux substructure that comprises the potential.

If the substructure of emerging and vanishing virtual particles is random and without deliberate order (polarization) except in one broad, overall sense, then that is a natural potential. As such, there is no deterministic functioning going on inside the substructure of the potential itself. The potential can only act "as a whole" on a charged particle system.

Natural potentials have substructures of random virtual vector components. Any small amount of coherence as a function of distance vanishes quickly (on the order of a few thousand angstroms at most, according to present Aharonov-Bohm experiments).

AN ARTIFICIAL POTENTIAL

POTENTIAL
Ø
DIRECTIONS OF PARTICLES ARE PARTIALLY ORDERED (POLARIZED)
VACUUM SPACETIME

Slide 017: An Artificial Potential

An artificial potential by definition has a substructure composed of deterministic observable vector components, summed to an overall zero vector. Coherence as a function of distance can be maintained over enormous macroscopic distances - even hundreds of thousand of kilometers - by simultaneous transmission of the entire cluster of substructure components as a coherent "zero" group.

To the conventional linear EM detector, at any point along its transmission path, this substructure is detected as a zero-E vector and a zero-H vector. Hence the conventional detector does not see the artificial potential, even if its "stress magnitude" (a function of the magnitudes of all summed components) changes.

Action at a great distance is possible with this artificial potential, however, if a highly nonlinear situation is met so that the phasing of the components is broken or significantly altered. In that case, the components do not sum to zero after their dephasing, and real EM force fields emerge. This "dephasing" can be made to occur at the distant nonlinearity.

Action at a great distance is not possible with the natural potential, but is possible with the artificial potential.

Further, with the transmitted artificial potential, VO must be applied from the transmitter to the distant interruption zone, as if there were no intervening space between.

Note that VO may be positive or negative. Thus energy may emerge at the distant disruption, or be extracted from there. In the first case, energy is input to the transmitter, to re-emerge at the distant dephasing zone. In the latter case, energy is extracted (disappears) from the distant dephasing zone and is received (reappears) back at the transmitter

Slide 018: Producing an Artificial Potential

AN artificial potential is deterministically patterned spacetime stress, made by opposing E-fields and/or B-fields so that they sum to vector zeros in a special pattern.

The resulting zero-summed envelope has no EM force field, to an external observer/detector.

However, the infolded E-field and B-field vector components still exist and act. They may dynamically vary, so long as their summation is always kept to zero.

The simplest variation is to vary all their magnitudes at once, by the same degree. In that case, each one comprises an "EM wave." However, the summations of this cluster or "locked group" of waves still exhibit a zero-E and zero-B field to any external observer/detector. In other-words, to an external observer, one now has a varying wave of pure spatiotemporal stress, but one that has a deterministic structure. This is a scalar EM wave, or electrogravitational wave. It is also an alternating current of specific scalar pattern.

Varying the stress of spacetime locally, curves it locally. This violates the conventional assumption of restricted general relativity that local spacetime is uncurved (is a Lorentz frame).

By use of scalar EM waves with deliberate substructures, one can engineer Bohm's "hidden variables" so that quantum mechanics becomes deterministic rather than statistical. This is a drastic change to the common (Bohr) interpretation of quantum mechanics.

And Einstein's intuition that God does not play dice with the universe turns out to be correct after all.

Since physicists haven't seen where the real game was being played, it has all seemed bewilderingly statistical to them.

Ø
VACUUM SPACETIME

Slide 019: If No Observable Mass Flows:

Since there are no observable mass particles flowing in vacuum, there are no observable force fields produced. Only virtual force fields can be produced in the virtual particle medium that is vacuum itself.

Thus (here is no observable E-field in the vacuum surrounding a charged point. There is, however, a virtual E-field there. When an observable charged particle such as an electron is introduced in the surrounding vacuum and "couples to" (integrates, zips together) the virtual E-field, an observable E-vector force is produced on and of the observable charged particle.

(For the classically trained electrical engineer or electrical physicist, the statement that no E or B fields as such exist in vacuum, is usually bewildering. Let me point out that any so-called "vector field" (such as the assumed E and B vacuum fields) can mathematically be replaced with two scalar fields. See E. T. Whittaker, Proc. Lond. Math. Soc.l, 366, 1903. What we are saying here is that the definition of an E field is in terms of force per unit charged mass. The scalar fields - which are actually what exist in vacuum - provide only a virtual or unzipped E field, until an observable spinning particle couples to both of them by virtue of its "dynamo flux pump" action. The ensemble, then, of two electrostatic scalar potentials coupled to a spinning observable particle, constitutes and is the so-called "E-field.")

When detecting these "vacuum E-fields," it is the free electrons in the electron gas in our probe or antenna which couple to the two "Whittaker scalar fields". These electrons produce ensembles that interact with each other collectively.

Charges in this electron-gas coupled medium is what we actually detect - not "what is in the vacuum."

To repeat this again for emphasis: The usual detector is an "electron-wiggle" detector. It detects changes in its own conduction electron gas, not in the vacuum itself. That is, the disturbance in the virtual-particle vacuum interacts with the observable particles of the electron gas, if (and only if) the spins of these observable particles couple the vacuum disturbance to the electrons and integrate their virtual components. After integration, an observable disturbance of the integrating object - say, the electron - results. It is this electron gas disturbance that is "detected" by almost all orthodox EM detectors.

If the spin of the observable conduction electrons cannot couple the electron to the vacuum flux disturbance, then the normal "simple" detector will not detect the disturbance. (By a "simple" detector we mean one in which the electrons are able to couple to the vacuum disturbance! Little circular definition here!)

Now most potentials reach to infinity before reducing to zero. The change in the virtual particle flux intensity of vacuum - which comprises the potential - decreases with distance from the potential. The magnitude of the change tails off" toward zero as one approaches infinity.

To any finite distance, then, there exists a decreased gradient in the change of the virtual flux intensity of vacuum, from a potential. Therefore virtual particles are flowing in the direction of the decrease of this gradient, just as gas molecules flow from a region of high pressure toward a region of lower pressure.

So there is a virtual particle "river" in the vacuum between any two separated points of different potential magnitude. The type of potential determines the type of virtual particle(s) in the river.

If the potential is natural, the gradient river does not carry any coherent substructure.

If the potential is artificial, the gradient river carries the coherent substructure everywhere within it. In this case, there is a flow or "river" of the virtual structure of this coherent pattern in the vacuum between two separated points of different "potential" in that pattern.

Slide 020: Gravitational Potential: A Conglomerate of Stress Types

Rigorously, all EM potentials are actually part of the overall 5-dimensional gravitational potential.

There is no such thing as "the" singular gravitational potential: instead, it is a conglomerate of different stress types and patterns, each of which is named for the type of action that produces it.

The movement of charged particles, for example, creates electromagnetic potentials. At any point in vacuum, the potential consists of a flux of virtual particles.

The vacuum contains a great variety of particle fluxes. There are virtual photons, virtual electrons, virtual positrons, virtual protons, virtual pions, virtual neutrinos, etc.

The conglomerate stress from all these virtual particle stresses constitutes the overall gravitational potential

¤ FLOWS CAN EXIST BETWEEN PAIRS, TRIADS, ETC. WITHOUT APPRECIABLE CHANGE OF THE OVERALL CONGLOMERATE POTENTIAL

¤ ALL FORCE FIELDS REPRESENT BLEED-OFFS OF ONE OR MORE COMPONENTS OF G-FIELD

Slide 021: What Gravitational Field Is

As previously stated, there is no such single thing as "the" gravitational field, as is assumed in the Newtonian sense.

G-field is a conglomerate of many component potentials and other entities.

Rigorously, anything that "curves spacetime" is a gravitational field.

In the modern view, all forces ultimately arise, by some means, from the curving of spacetime. Thus all forces and force fields are related to - and caused by, so to speak - gravitational field.

If the vacuum stress is uniform from one place to another in an observer's frame then the observer's spacetime is uncurved. The observer's frame, is said to be linear or uncurved; or a Lorentz, frame. In such a situation the conservation laws rigorously apply for macroscopic, closed systems.

If the vacuum stress is not uniform from one place to another, then the spacetime is curved. In such a situation the conservation laws may be violated for macroscopic systems, since they are "opened" to the vacuum stress, and vacuum virtual particle flux gradients exist across the system or portions of it.

Note that the overall stress magnitude may be constant across a region, but its composition may change. That is, two or more components may vary canonically. In that case, the spacetime is uncurved in the gross external sense, but contains specialized "internal" curvature patterns locally. Depending upon reaction to the canonical infolded curvature patterns, some macroscopic systems will still exhibit conservation, but certain other macroscopic systems may not.

An example is symmetry breaking. Here charge, parity, and time symmetry may be violated individually or in pairs, but not all three simultaneously. An overall conservation law is obeyed, but any two of the three conservation laws can be (und are) violated.

Slide 022: EM Force Fields are Releases of Gravitational Potential via Observable Mass Flows

In Kaluza theory, we may take EM force fields to be the 5th dimensional "bleeding-off" of a 5-G potential. However, in vacuum alone this bleeding-off is totally within the virtual state. That is, only virtual EM force fields exist in vacuum.

By the ordinary term "EM force fields," physics has chosen to imply measureable or observable E and B force fields.

That implies that the 5-G potential gradient flows of virtual particle flux must be coupled to observable charged particles - such as electrons, protons, ions, etc. - before observable E and B force fields exist.

Rigorously, E and B force fields consist of the virtual E and B force fields coupled to observable charged particles. They do not "cause" a particle to accelerate; they are the product of the particle and its acceleration.

As these observable particles are themselves "spray pumps" producing virtual particle flux, then a collection of them represents an increased or decreased flux (for negative or positive charge) vis-a-vis the ambient background flux of vacuum. Nature furnishes the continuous power to drive these "virtual flux" pumps.

Normally, EM potentials are formed in natural and manmade electrical circuits by collections of these observable particle "spray pumps." Such collections of increased or decreased "spray flux" density, of course, represent 5-potentials, gravitationally.

Release of these pumps in conductors or in the vacuum itself results in creating E-fields and B-fields on and of the moving observable charged particles. But release of the observable-particle spray-pumps from the collection (the potential "pressure head" or "source") reduces the potential or "pressure" at the source.

Thus the formation of E and B fields represents the release of the 5-potentials. Hence EM force fields are the bleed-off of 5-dimensional G-potential via observable mass flow.

Since classical EM always seeks to create the force fields, it always bleeds-off and discards the gravitational effects that could be otherwise achieved.

To allow orthodox EM flow is to dissipate the gravitational effects.

Strangle the orthodox EM flows, and you can keep and use the amplified gravitational effects.

Slide 023: Scalar O-Wave Production

We now visualize the formation of waves of pure stress in the spacetime medium (in the vacuum). These we call scalar EM waves, Tesla waves, electrogravitational waves, longitudinal EM waves, waves of pure potential, electrostatic/magnetostatic waves, and zero-vector EM waves. All these terms are synonymous. Each sheds its own particular light upon the nature of these waves or of their original discoverer, Nikola Tesla.

We use a gedanken experiment, or thought experiment, in which we can be "perfect."

Thus we have two single-frequency EM sine waves whose E-field componenls are shown on the slide. The two waves are of the same frequency, traveling together in the same direction, and superposed 180 degrees out of phase with each other.

In this case, at any spatial point, the summation E and B fields are vector zeros.

However, if we plot the spatiotemporal (vacuum) stress induced by the wave, wo see that it constitutes a sine wave, with compressive stress in one half cycle and tensile stress in the second half cycle.

Rigorously this defines a "longitudinal" EM wave - or what Tesla called a "sound wave in the nonmaterial ether."

Also, rigorously it is a gravitational wave, for it is a wave of the curvature of spacetime (nonlinearity of vacuum) itself. That is, what is changing in the wave is the vacuum stress, or intensity of the virtual particle flux of vacuum. That is identical to changing the curvature of spacetime. In one half-cycle, spacetime is curved positively. In the second half-cycle, spacetime is curved negatively.

Since the increase or decrease of the intensity of virtual particle flux (vis-a-vis the ambient vacuum's virtual flux intensity) represents electrical charge, then in one half-cycle negative charge is represented, and in the other half-cycle positive charge is represented. This directly explains the "positron-electron pair" representation of an electromagnetic photon - the "photon" being one wavelength.

In one half-cycle, time moves slower. In the second half-cycle, time moves faster. Thus scalar waves can also be considered to be "tempic" waves (to use Wilbur Smith's term), or oscillations of the rate of flow of time itself, about the ambient rate of time flow. Since these oscillations are variations in the curvature of spacetime, then they represent gravitational or force-generating waves, when coupled to a mass.

Variations in the rate of flow of time produce force, just as any other type of curvature in space-time does.

Slide 024: Scalar Electromagnetics

To rehash: scalar waves are zero-vector waves. Patterned E and B fields exist in a relationship where their summation equals vector zero. Electromagnetically, the zero EM "envelope" of a scalar EM wave is composed of a zero-summation of infolded finite EM force-vectors.

However, the internal (infolded) substructure is deliberate, macroscopic, and ordered. Vacuum is polarized deterministically by the wave, and macroscopic spacetime is locally curved by it.

These substructure components constitute Bohm's "hidden variables." They can be manipulated and varied at will. Phasing, beaming, frequency, superposition, interference, resonance, and Fourier expansion are the keys to scalar EM engineering.

To make a scalar beam, special modifications are made to the EM wave transmitter so that, effectively, the transmitter transmits multiple transmissions simultaneously, and these vectorially sum to zero. This is the same thing as transmitting multiple phase-locked EM force-field beams simultaneously, in the sum-zeroed fashion.

Standard beaming antennas and conventional circuits can readily be utilized with slight modifications.

Any radar can be converted to a scalar EM radar quite simply. Indeed, a modification kit to accomplish that can be developed and held until the scalar mode is desired. The modification kit can be quickly installed to provide the scalar capability.

Scalar radars, for example, cannot track "corner reflector" targets. However, they can magnificently track smoothly filleted corners; rounded, smoothly curved surfaces; and curved or flat metalized dielectrics. Against aerial targets using special construction to lower their cross-section to normal radars, the application of the scalar radar mode is immediately obvious.

Scalar waves pass through the electron shells of an atom and interact with the nucleus. They are continually absorbed and emitted by all nuclei in the universe.

BACKGROUND FOR THE BRIEFER.

Any large collection of nuclei - such as a star or a planet - is a strong absorber and radiator of scalar wave radiation.

The Sun is a particularly strong source of scalar radiation. This radiation penetrates the Earth deeply, interacting more and more with the deeper layers which, under greater mechanical stress, are more nonlinear. Most of the heat in the molten core of the Earth comes from the dephasing of a portion of this absorbed scalar radiation from the Sun, liberating ordinary EM energy as heat.

The Earth also re-radiates scalar wave radiation back to the Sun. The Sun and Earth are thus coupled into a "scalar" system in equilibrium or near-equilibrium. Each body in the couplet possesses both a feed-forward and a feedback loop.

The Earth also radiates scalar wave radiation to the Moon, and the Moon reradiates scalar radiation back to the Earth. The Earth and Moon also are coupled into a "scalar" system in equilibrium or near-equilibrium. Again, each body in the couplet possesses both a feed-forward and a feedback loop.

The Sun and Moon are correspondingly coupled into a scalar system in equilibrium or near-equilibrium, each with both a feed-forward and a feedback loop.

The Earth, Sun, and Noon thus form a triad-coupled system of special importance to the stability of our existence here on Earth, and the stability of our biosphere.

And so on with all the other planets in the solar system, and combinations thereof.

The solar system is thus a very sensitive scalar-coupled system, with strong subsystems within it.

ADDED FOR THE BRIEFER:

Actually this scalar coupling of the solar system provides a major check on unrestricted use of the large Soviet strategic scalar EM weapon systems. If significant scalar effects are produced on earth in a "pulse" mode, pulsed disturbance of the earth-sun and earth-moon systems results. Here a danger exists that one or more natural resonances of the coupled system may be excited. If the feedback stimulation of the Sun is not insignificant, for example, large sunspot activity may result sometime thereafter, say in a day or two. If too much or too sharp stimulation occurs on earth, the coupled resonant response from the sun could be disastrous. Indeed, a solar response could be stimulated so that the Sun would violently belch and destroy our biosphere, among other effects. The simplest doomsday stimulation would be for a violent expulsion of Solar EM energy and particles to occur. If this were due to resonance, the expulsion of Solar EM energy and particles would continue during some decay time. In that case, fiery destruction of the earth, strongly indicative of Biblical prophecy, would result. Particularly sensitive are the resonances of the sun-earth, sun-moon, and earth-moon systems.

Note the abnormal influence of the moon on tides - tides of both the tectonic plates and the oceans. One cannot help but point out that, if the earth-moon resonant system were overstimulated, one might expect violent earthquakes of extraordinary magnitude, and tremendous tidal waves hundreds of feet in height. (The potential connection to legends of earth-destroying floods, evidences of extreme water levels in mountains, and legends of ancient cataclysmic destruction of supposedly advanced technological oceanic cultures is obvious.)

Accordingly, use of huge scalar EM weapons is a double-edged sword. Unless carefully employed, use of the weapons could cause a terrible backlash to the user as well as the victim, and even accidentally cause the destruction of the earth itself. It is not accidental that in 1960 Khrushchev stated that his new fantastic weapon could - if unrestrainedly used - destroy all life on earth.

This appalling backlash potential is apparently what prompted Brezhnev in 1975 to make so strong an effort to get agreement to outlaw the development of "new weapons of mass destruction" more frightful than the mind of man had even dreamed of. Gromyko even introduced such a draft agreement into the proceedings of the United Nations. The first article of the draft agreement indicated that the nature of the weapons referred to would be negotiated. Sadly, the entire Western world did not even know what the Russians were talking about.

Slide 025: Rogers' Undersea & Underground Communications Systems

In an article in the March 1919 issue of the Electrical Experimenter, a real bombshell was released on an unsuspecting world.

In that issue, details of the Rogers'undersea and underground communication systems were released. These systems had been classified SECRET during WWI, and used to communicate with (1) U.S. submarines underwater around the world, and (2) U.S. Expeditionary Forces Headquarters overseas.

Subs at any submerged depth could be reached with transmitters of frequencies up to 30 kiloHertz. At reduced depths, frequencies above 30 kHz could be used.

At the headquarters of U.S. overseas forces, the signals were received through the earth. They were 5,000 times stronger than aerial signals through the atmosphere, and static-free.

The Rogers' systems were covered by a series of patents. They used special antennas implanted in the ground.

While the patents are somewhat confused, several of the diagrams in the Electrical Experimenter reveal that the antennas were producing scalar waves. Scalar waves can indeed travel through the earth and through the ocean. Indeed, if good quality scalar waves are made, then frequencies well above 30 kHz can be sent through the ocean. Multi-megahertz frequencies, for example, are easily achievable. (The problem, of course, is that these waves are pure zero-vector artificial potentials that do not move electrons in the conduction gas of a conventional antenna/receiver combination. Normal receivers and detectors do not see them. Special underwater detectors - such as those developed by Frank Golden - are required.).

With the startling declassification and revelation of the Rogers' systems, it was expected that all communications would be revolutionized, and that all surface antennas would be removed.

Strangely, this entire technology faded away quickly, as if it had never been. Certain powerful interests did not wish the extended electromagnetics to be discovered or taught. That, after all, would lead to free energy and loss of economic control of the citizens. That was precisely why Nikola Tesla had already been suppressed.

According to the important research of Dr. Robert Beck, the same scalar technology has been rediscovered and mysteriously "lost" at least three times after World War II!

Today the orthodox establishment is still suppressing it.

One wonders why no orthodox physicist - with the single exception of Dr. Hooper (see U.S. patents 3,610,971, Oct. 5, 1971 and 3,656,013, Apr. 11, 1972) - seems to have experimented with deliberately constructed zero-vector EM waves and devices, and published his results in the literature.

One would think that any university physics department would wish to explore such a gaping void with at least a few graduate student experiments, if for no other reason than scientific curiosity, particularly when the experiment is easily performed, it is totally different from anything else in the theory or literature, and the implications may be formidable. A true scientist in that related field ought to try it!

HOW DOES THE ROGERS SYSTEM WORK?

Slide 026: How does the Rogers System Work?

In the same March 1919 issue of Electrical Experimenter, Hugo Gernsback pointed out that no one as yet knew how the Rogers' system actually worked.

Rogers himself believed he was not using conventional Hertzian waves.

Nikola Tesla himself confirmed that the underground and undersea waves were not Hertzian waves.

If so, they could only have been scalar waves.

SCALAR EM WAVES ARE EMITTED & ABSORBED BY THE NUCLEUS

Slide 027: Scalar EM Waves are Emitted & Absorbed by the Nucleus

Normally scalar EM waves do not couple to orbital electrons. Entering into the atom, incoming scalar EM waves penetrate the electron shells without interaction. They continue, penetrating into the interior of the closely packed nucleus, where the extreme nonlinearity of the charged virtual particle flux that binds the nucleons together distorts the scalar wave, dephasing its summed EM vector components. This produces a nonzero EM resultant and polarized pattern directly inside the virtual particle charge flux of the nucleus.

The new EM resultant immediately couples the distorted scalar wave to the nucleus, resulting in absorption of the wave and incorporation of its polarization pattern into the nucleus' virtual flux. This in turn results in a slightly excited nucleus. Normally the excited nucleus will promptly decay by emitting another scalar wave, which passes through the orbital electron shells and radiates out into the universe.

However, as can be seen, if the same strong scalar pattern is constantly radiated into the nucleus and absorbed by it, the excitation of the nucleus "charges up," leading to decay by other modes. In this manner the nucleus can be engineered even transmuted - by rather minuscule power of the engineering radiation signal.

This is how living biological systems are able to transmute elements, as discovered by Louis Kervran. (Kervran was nominated for the 1977 Nobel Prize for this work.). The biosystem produces scalar EM waves. If the appropriate signal is employed into and on the appropriate nucleus, a changed element emerges. In this fashion chickens denied sufficient calcium in their diet, but allowed a surplus of potassium, are able to transmute some of the potassium into calcium. Note that one of the isotopes of potassium is an isomer of normal calcium. Transmutation of this potassium isomer to calcium is easiest.

NUCLEI OF THE UNIVERSE CONTINUALLY EXCHANGE SCALAR EM WAVES

Slide 028: Nuclei of the Universe Continually Exchange Scalar EM Waves

Thus scalar EM waves are continually exchanged by all nuclei of the universe, and the vacuum is - among other things - a seething cauldron of scalar radiation.

In fact, it is this seething scalar wave cauldron that creates the virtual particles and the virtual particle flux of vacuum itself. (Since the scalar EM wave represents an oscillation of the curvature of spacetime, and since everything - virtual or observable - is a curvature of spacetime, then scalar waves can be taken as the universal generatrix.

The intensity of the trapped scalar flux in the nucleus of an atom is responsible for the mass and inertia of the nucleus.

Mass is localized trapped scalar resonance.

The trapping agent is the spin of a particle.

The mass and inertia of the particle are due to the scalar resonance that is trapped. Increasing the amplitude of the trapped scalar resonance increases the mass and inertia; decreasing the amplitude decreases the mass and inertia.

CONVERTING EM FIELD ENERGY TO G-FIELD ENERGY & VICE-VERSA

5-D G-FIELD
EM FIELD
4-D G-FIELD
ZERO VECTOR EM SYSTEM

Slide 029: Converting EM Field Energy to G-Field Energy & Vice-Versa

According to Kaluza theory, there are no such things as a separate EM field and a separate gravity field. Instead, in five dimensions there is only one field: the 5-d gravitational field. The EM field is the 5th dimensional aspect, while our normal 4-dimensional G-field is the other aspect of the 5-field, in our normal 4-space.

Thus we may say that the 5-field is composed of two components: the 5th dimensional component (our normal EM field) and the component occupying our normal 4 dimensions (our normal G-field).

The 5-d "force" field, of course - or the 5-space analogy to a force field - would be due to a gradient or "bleed-off of the 5-d gravitational potential. This gradient in turn is composed of two components: the 5th dimensional "bleed-off" outside our normal 4-space (this outer bleed-off is our normal EM force field) and the bleed-off inside our normal 4-space (this inner bleed-off is our normal G-field).

Normally the 5-potential bleeds-off outside our 4-space as EM field, far greater than it bleeds-off inside our world as G-field. Between two electrons, for example, the electric field is about 10^{42} times as strong as the G-field. Since in the Kaluza view there is only one 5-d G-potential that is causing both force fields, this shows that there is an incredibly greater EM bleed-off of the 5-potential between the two electrons than there is a G-field bleed-off between them.

As shown on the diagram, the 5-d G-field is normally comprised almost entirely of the 5th dimensional EM field. Only a small 4-space G-field component exists.

However, suppose we were to "block" the bleed-off of the 5-potential in the EM mode. Then none of the 5-potential could bleed-off in the 5th dimensional EM field. Instead, it would be forced to bleed-off into the 4-space G-field. In our two-electron example, this "perfect case" would result in the disappearance of the E-field between the two electrons, and the G-field between them would increase to about 10^{42} times its normal strength.

The end result would be that, by blocking the EM force field bleed-off, EM field is converted to G-field. In addition, EM field energy is converted to G-field energy. With the extremely amplified gravitational and inertial effects that result, one can now accomplish direct engineering of gravitation, mass, and inertial effects.

We can effectively accomplish this "blocking the EM bleed-off by opposing EM force fields so that they sum to vector zero. This is the same as summing various 5th dimensional gradients of the 5-potential to a zero vector resultant. In that case, as much "EM bleed-back to 5-potential" occurs as there is "EM bleed-off from 5-potential." This places the 5-potential in equilibrium with respect to EM bleed-off.

Also, another nice thing results: Since we can readily vary the magnitudes of the EM force field components of the vector zero summation, we can actually form phased "zero vector waves" by increasing and decreasing the magnitudes of all the component EM vectors in phase, but retaining their vector summation always equal to zero.

In that case we have produced a very simple 5-space G-potential wave, which concomitantly forces phase-locked variations in the 4-space G-potential. In short, we have produced an electrogravitational (EG) wave, or scalar EM wave for short. This wave described is the simplest EG scalar wave we can produce; much more complex EG waves can be produced and used for highly specialized purposes.

The scalar EG wave changes EG potential energy into 4-gravity potential energy in one half-cycle, and changes 4-G potential energy into EG potential energy in the other half-cycle. However, the EG potential energy in the first half-cycle does not react electromagnetically in linear circumstances, since it is electromagnetically a linear vector zero.

So our scalar EG wave actually oscillates energy back and forth between a locked-in 5th dimensional EM potential and a 4-space G-potential. As can be seen, to the linear 4-space observer this scalar EG wave appears as a purely gravitational wave, with G-potential magnitude varying in a wavelike manner.

For easy visualization, we may regard the situation in the analogy shown on the slide.

The 5-potential of 5-space vacuum is like a high pressure in a big tank. The tank has a huge open door in the 5th dimension, leading to rapid bleed-off of the 5-presure through the big door; that is, as EM field. Only a very small hole in the tank normally exists in our own 4-space world, so only a very small amount of the pressure bleeds off as our G-field.

Slide 031: Scalar EM Forces 4-D G-Field

As can be seen however, if we shut the big door so that we have only a little bleed-off through the seals, then most of the pressure is forced to bleed-off through the small opening, greatly enlarging it. In that case, most of the 5-potential bleeds-off as 4-G force field.

The mass exposed to such increased 4-G bleed-off exhibits a much greater mass and inertia.

In fact, mass itself can act as an accumulator for the effect, and it can increase its ability to store trapped scalar resonance. This increases its inertia.

By the use of scalar EM (blocking the EM bleed-off), we can input normal EM energy and obtain powerful gravitational and inertial effects. Many other powerful effects can also be obtained.

DETECTION OF ELECTRO-GRAVITATION

- WHEN ORDINARY EM FORCE FIELDS ARE INTERFERED/SUMMED TO PRODUCE ZERO, AND ARE ALSO LOCKED TOGETHER, THEY PRODUCE STRESS OF VACUUM (GRAVITATIONAL POTENTIAL OF FIELD).
  THIS IS ELECTRO-GRAVITY.
- WHEN ELECTRO-GRAVITATIONAL FIELDS ARE INTERFERED/SUMMED TO PRODUCE ZERO, AND ARE LOCKED TOGETHER, THEY PRODUCE ORDINARY ELECTRO-MAGNETIC FORCE.

Slide 032: Detection of Electro-Gravitation

Here are two magic rules in the scalar electrogravitational business:

(1) When ordinary EM force fields are interfered or summed so that they produce vector zero, and the fields are locked together, they produce stress of vacuum (5-potential). One component of this 5-potential is the 4-space G-potential. Since bleed-off as a gradient of this 4-space G-potential is all that is allowed, then the EM destructive interference/zero summation bleeds-off to produce gravitational force field. This is because opposing equal forces, which sum to a vector zero force field resultant, actually produce a stress potential having stress energy of spacetime. And that is a curvature of spacetime, hence gravitational.

In short, total destructive interference of EM waves or force fields produces excess stress potential energy in spacetime, and therefore gravitational force field on detecting/coupled particles.

(2) When electrogravitational fields are interfered/summed to produce vector zero, this destructive interference/zero summation bleeds-off to produce ordinary electromagnetic force field.

In short, destructive interference of scalar EM waves or fields (electrogravitational waves or fields) produces electromagnetic force fields on detecting/coupled particles.

BACKGROUND FOR THE BRIEFER:

Mathematically we can summarize this as follows;

$$G_{(1-4)} = G_{(1-4)}(\mathrm{m}) + G_{(1-4)}(\mathrm{EM}) \qquad [3]$$

$$G_{(1-5)} = G_5 + G_{(1-4)} \qquad [4]$$

If $\mathbf{E} = \Sigma \mathbf{å}_i E_i = \mathbf{0},\ E_i \neq \mathbf{0};\ \mathbf{B} = \Sigma \mathbf{å}_i B_i = \mathbf{0},\ B_i \neq \mathbf{0}$ [5]

then $G_{(1-4)}(\mathrm{m}) = G_{(1-4)}(\mathrm{EM}) = G_5 = G_{(1-5)}$ [6]

and $G_5 = G_{(1-4)} = f[\Sigma(\mathbf{å}_i\,|\mathbf{E}_i|^2)] + g[\Sigma(\mathbf{å}_i\,|\mathbf{B}_i|^2)]$ [7] and $G_{(1-5)} = G_5 = G_{(1-4)}(\mathrm{m}) = G_{(1-4)}(\mathrm{EM}) = f(\phi) + g(\mathbf{A})$ [8]

Where:

$G_{(1-5)}$ is the 5-d G potential, or total G-stress on dimensions 1-5.

G_5 is the combined EM potential, or G-stress on dimension 5 only.

$G_{(1-4)}(\mathrm{m})$ is the normal 4-d G-potential of mass alone, or the G-stress due to mass-gravity.

$G_{(1-4)}(\mathrm{EM})$ is any extra 4-d G-potential of mass due to conversion from G_5 stress (normally zero).

E and B are the electric and magnetic force fields.

ϕ is the electrostatic scalar potential.

A is the magnetic vector potential.

Thus the age-old scientific dream of direct engineering of gravitational field — and of spacetime itself — can now become reality. To start, one simply makes an intense EM vector zero and varies its stress intensity and internal pattern of summed components. One also varies the reference potential at which the patterned EM stress zero is created, and the frequency of internal component variation.

BACKGROUND FOR THE BRIEFER.

He that has ears, let him hear.

Here is the secret of antigravity

The "electrical charge" of a charged particle — such as one of the orbital electrons of an atom or one of the protons of its nucleus — represents a difference in flux intensity (potential) between the local particle and its ambient vacuum.

It's the continual bleed-off of gravitational charge as electrical charge.

If that bleed-off is reversed or stopped, a drastic effect on the gravitational potential and charge ensues. The 5-potential and 5-charge have become 4-G-potential and 4-d-charge respectively.

Thus "charging" an object with its scalar EM pattern charges it gravitationally.

Now the only "bleed-off channel" is through the 4-G force field.

Further, in a nucleus the nucleons continually change back and forth between proton and neutron, so the electrical charge is "spread" throughout the nucleus and shared by all the nucleons.

Further, each element (actually each isotope) has its own unique "ensemble pattern" of Fourier expansion scalar frequencies, amplitudes, etc. This pattern, of course, can be reproduced artificially and transmitted by modified EM transmitters (i.e., by scalar EM transmitters). There is, however, a sort of "master key" scalar EM (EG) pattern for nucleons (protons and neutrons which are changing back and forth into each other by exchange of virtual charge currents).

If one "reverses the charge" by inverting this pattern, and then "charges up a mass with the inverted charge," to the external observer the charging mass just gets lighter and lighter, and its inertia gets less and less. Eventually it seems (to him) to acquire negative mass and negative inertia, and just accelerate away from the earth. The object "falls upward" instead of "falling downwards."

There are also some weird time effects. The object can be moving slower through time than the laboratory observer, or even be moving backwards through time with respect to the laboratory observer. (Don't believe everything they laught you in relativity; none of those professors had ever engineered a single general relativistic situation. Little that they teach in GR is based on direct experiment. Most of what they teach is already experimentally proven to be incomplete or in need of further extension.).

But back to our slide.

Inside the pattern itself, it's just a quite normal pattern. No change in or on the object seems to have occurred, to it, if the charge is evenly accomplished throughout the object. Indeed, to an internal observer it's the external environment that seems to have suddenly gotten very strange! This is what occasionally happens to a hapless aircraft or ship that experiences anomalous spatiotemporal difficulty in an occasionally scalar-active area such as the Bermuda triangle. Under the right conditions, the vehicle's gravitational charge is affected by anomalous changes in the scalar radiation from the earth in that area. To the passengers and crew, it is the external environment that suddenly seems weird. In addition, on-board EM and inertial instruments may be affected, and other electrogravitational effects may also occur, due to differing rates of charge in different parts of the vehicle.).

"Reversing or lowering the EG-charge" is controlled by means of biasing the ground potential on the ensemble pattern transmitters. These transmitters can even be on-board the vehicle itself. (Remember, in scalar EM to transmit is also to receive. A vehicle can change its own bias potential (with respect to local vacuum G-potential) by properly transmitting, which translates to "receiving potential charge." The charge current can either be negative or positive (its potential can be lowered or increased vis-a-vis that of the vacuum.) Think of this as handling positive and negative energy, which means positive and negative gravity.

By "fiddling" with this, you can float metal. Or a human body. Or a battleship. Or a high-speed vehicle containing a crew.

You can even "dematerialize it" or "teleport it."

The Philadelphia Experiment may have been real after all. If so, the test ship and its personnel were "blasted" into this strange realm, instead of making a gentle, controlled entry.

Suppose you materially lower or reverse (adjust) the gravitational charge (gravitation 5-potential with zero-summed EM to throttle EM bleed-off). At zero gravitational charge, to the external observer, such an assumed vehicle would seem to have no mass and no inertia. It is capable of extreme accelerations, right angle turns at full speed, etc. It is also right on the point of dematerialization, and may appear to be glowing or just a vehicle of light.

If the pilot wishes to "land," of course he must adjust the charge on the vehicle.

If the pilot wishes to "dematerialize" or "teleport," again he must adjust the charge on the vehicle.

If he wishes to go "hyperspatial," again he must adjust the charge on the vehicle and allow the proper bleed-off to produce a hyperspatial force. That's done with nested zero summations and nested patterns of scalar EM transmission.

That is, he can charge and bias the vehicle in multiple, nested zero-summations simultaneously.

That is necessary for hyperspatial control and travel.

Note that in lower hyperspace such a vehicle could do some very strange things. Such as "penetrate" solid matter (actually, it goes "around" the 3-space matter in a 4th Kaluza-Klein space).

We might expect to see such vehicles glowing. Their various surface features and mechanisms might appear to be glowing or revolving lights, etc.

They could exhibit incredible "aerodynamic performance," seemingly in the atmosphere. Actually they would not be moving "through" the atmosphere at all but through a higher space outside each particle of atmosphere.

They could seem to materialize and dematerialize.

They could seem to plunge into the ocean or rise out of it.

They could even seem to operate under the ocean or inside the earth itself.

Such anomalous vehicle performances have been seen all over the world, particularly since a few years after WWII.

Slide 033: Scalar Wave Detector

On this slide we show a concept for a detector for scalar EG waves. This is the Bedini scalar wave detector, adapted from an original concept by Dea and Faretto.

The idea is quite simple: install a very powerful bar magnet vertically inside a grounded Faraday cage. Then install an open-ended coil longitudinally above the magnet so that a line through the longitudinal axis of the magnet passes through the longitudinal axis of the coil above it. The open end of the coil does not touch the magnet.

Connect the other end of the coil to a variable tuning capacitor, so that the coil and capacitor form a tunable, series-LC-oscillatory circuit. The output of the capacitor is connected to a transistorized preamplifier inside the cage. A tuning shaft for the capacitor is very carefully passed through a small hole in the shield to allow tuning from outside.

The output of the preamp passes very carefully through a small hole in the shield, through a shielded cable, to an adjacent oscilloscope. The cable shield in also grounded to reference ground potential.

The theory is as follows: Suppose a normal EM wave appears inside the cage, above the magnet or closely adjacent thereto. In that case a coupled oscillation appears in the field of the magnet, and this oscillation is coupled to the coil immediately above it. If the oscillation is within the bandwidth of the tuned series LC circuit, detection occurs. This is amplified by the preamp and passed to the oscilloscope, where it is displayed on the scope.

Note that the detector detects normal EM wave. Now our problem is: how do we get an EG wave to be detected? And how do we assure that we do not detect ordinary EM waves from outside?

Actually this is simple. Ordinary waves (except for quite low frequency) will be grounded out by the Faraday shield, and will not penetrate the cage. Thus these normal EM waves cannot enter the cage and appear above the magnet. They will not be detected.

Scalar EG waves, on the other hand, will enter the cage since they do not couple to conduction electrons in the metal of the cage. Above the pole of the magnet, spacetime is locally bent. After all, a pole is a magnetostatic scalar potential, which is a part of the conglomerate called "G-potential." The pole represents an increase (or decrease, depending upon whether it is a north or a south pole) in the magnetostatic component of the local G-potential. This is a curvature of spacetime. An EG wave entering this region adds a varying component of magnetostatic G-potential, which bleeds-off in the coil as an ordinary EM wave.

Another way to view the detector is to model the EG wave as a longitudinal wave, and an ordinary EM wave as a transverse wave. When the EG wave enters the curved spacetime region above the magnet, to the coil (the "observer" in this case) the longitudinal aspect of the EG wave appears to be rotating back and forth, so that an oscillating transverse component is present. This transverse component appears to the coil as an ordinary EM field, and so the LC circuit detects it if it is in the proper frequency band.

Yet another way to view the situation is to realize that an EG wave entering the magnet results in an oscillation component added to the magnetostatic scalar potential (pole strength) of the magnet. Accordingly, the magnet is a receiver for scalar waves, which are detected to "bleed-off as an oscillation of the magnetic field strength of the magnet. Coupling of this oscillating magnetic field to the coil creates an oscillating current flow into the capacitor. This oscillates the voltage input to the preamp, which amplifies and feeds the signal to the oscilloscope for display.

In fact rather like the latter view! It is important to remember that a magnetostatic potential and an electrostatic potential can be oscillated by a scalar EG wave. By placing a magnetic material inside a Faraday cage, the oscillation of the magnetostatic scalar potential (pole strength of the magnet) can be used as the EG detecting mechanism. By placing a chargeable material inside a Faraday cage, the oscillation of the electrostatic scalar potential can be detected. (Possible examples of the latter type detectors are given by Hodowanec, Radio Electronics, April 1986.)

Note also that one may detect waves at one reference level and not at another. Changing the bias on the zero-reference ground of the Bedini detector affects the detection. To look inside a normal EM carrier (such as the Woodpecker) and see what scalar signals are riding upon it, the carrier may be used to bias the reference ground of the Bedini detector.

To produce a spectrum analyzer, simply use additional series resonant LC tuning circuits in parallel (put multiple taps on the coil, and wire each tap to a separate tuning capacitor of different capacitance). Again, varying the zero reference level is important, as is varying the strength of the magnet.

Golden also has invented an excellent series of scalar wave detectors based upon quite different proprietary principles.

The bottom line is: we can indeed rigorously detect and measure scalar EG waves. When one considers the large sums of money presently being spent to bury large aluminum cylinders etc. in an attempt to detect gravitational waves, one wonders why some funds could not be released to a few unorthodox researchers by the National Academy of Sciences to fund the proven creation and detection of electrogravitational waves!

Note from TEB: I understand that it took Bedini about 600 attempts before he got the device to work. It was then handed over to a different party to produce, who made some "improvements," and the device then failed to work.

Slide 034: Scalar Resonance

Here we explain a new kind of resonance: scalar EH resonance, or electrogravitational resonance.

First, imagine we have a standard resonant cavity, represented by the two walls in our diagram. In this cavity we have a resonant EM wave moving back and forth, represented by the forward-most plane. In accordance with convention, we show the E-field vector and the B-field vector at right angles in this moving wave front. As the wave front moves back and forth, the vectors vary back and forth; however, at any one point between the walls, the two vectors always have the same value. Thus our resonant EM wave forms a standing wave in the cavity.

Now imagine that a second wave front, precisely like the first and of the same frequency, is superposed over the first wave front and travels along with it. This second wave - the "antiwave" - has its force vectors 180 degrees out of phase with the force vectors of the reference wave. Hence the E-fields and B-fields of the two superposed waves always sum to vector zeros, anywhere in the cavity. To an external observer, the cavity contains no ordinary electromagnetic force fields, hence no ordinary EM energy.

However, the energy density of a single EM sine wave in vacuum is given by

$$[E^2+B^2]/8\pi \qquad [9]$$

This energy density is always positive. Hence the energy density of the two waves at any point x between the walls is equal to

$$[E^2+B^2]/4\pi \qquad [10]$$

where

$$E = E(x) \; ; \; B = B(x) \qquad [11]$$

Thus the energy density of vacuum varies with x. But, rigorously, since the resultant E and B fields are zero, this describes a standing gravitational wave. Hence we have a standing EG wave, existing in the resonant cavity. This is an example of scalar resonance. Rigorously the cavity has mass and inertia, to an outside observer, as a result of the two warps in spacetime it contains.

Note that in one half-cycle the energy density of vacuum is greater than ambient, and in the other half-cycle it is less. In the region of one half-cycle, time flows at a faster rate than to the ambient observer, and in the other half-cycle time flows at a slower rate than to the ambient observer.

One half-cycle appears to contain negative electrical charge, and the other appears to contain positive charge.

One half-cycle appears to contain a north pole (positive magnetostatic scalar potential), and the other half-cycle appears to contain a south pole (negative magnetostatic scalar potential).

Perhaps now one can begin to understand why a continuously accelerated orbital electron in the atom does not radiate EM energy, completely in violation of Maxwell's equations. The electron is naught but a complex aspect of a standing scalar resonance, existing between the nucleus and the orbit.

Slide 035: Scalar Resonance

Scalar resonance is not in the conventional textbook.

Scalar resonance is a particular zero-summed multi-resonance, electromagnetically, so that it does not act in an electromagnetic manner.

A scalar resonance is a standing electrogravitational wave. It can be made electrically, but it is not electrical in behavior.

In any scalar resonance, spacetime is curved, and it is the magnitude (and direction; of this spacetime curvature that is oscillating in "standing wave" fashion. In respect to stress of the vacuum medium, one half of a standing sine wave of scalar resonance is tensile; the other half is compressive. However, this is with respect to the local ambient stress of vacuum.

"Mass" of a particle is just a characteristic exhibited by a trapped scalar resonance. Usually this trapping is done by the "spin" of the individual particle.

The concept of "mass" may be compared to the concept of "capacitance." That is, a mass is an accumulator for scalar waves; that is, for scalar resonances. It is continually being "charged" and "discharged" by absorption and emission of scalar waves from and to the ambient vacuum scalar wave flux.

Indeed, the magnitude of a mass may be defined in terms of the absolute value of this "switching" (absorption = switch in; emission = switch out) rate. In a very early paper I defined the mass of an object as proportional to the absolute value of the sum of the input and output switching rates, where each "switch" represents a change of action of h/(4). (Bearden, Quiton/Perceptron Physics: A Theory of Existence, Perception, and Physical Phenomena, Mar. 1973, AD 763210, available through NTIS.) In that scheme, one kilogram of mass equals a switch rate of 17.053 x 10^{50} switches per second. An object is in a Lorentz frame when the switch-in and switch-out rates are equal in a given direction. If, in addition, the in-out rates in all directions are constant, the object is "stationary" with respect to a Lorentz observer. If not constant in all directions, the object is in a curved spacetime with respect to a Lorentz observer. In that case either the object's local spacetime is warped or the object is in a generalized, accelerated frame.

In the normal linear spacetime, the "charging" and "discharging" are equal in all directions; hence the "mass" exhibited in any direction is the same.

With respect to an "external observer's" equilibrium flux, a moving object encounters an increased amount of flux rate along its line of motion, just as a moving object in a rainstorm encounters more raindrops per second in the direction of its path, than does a stationary object. Encountering increased scalar wave flux (with respect to the external observer) forces the moving object to absorb and emit scalar waves at a higher rate along its direction of motion than when it is not moving. Thus to the external observer, the mass of the object has increased, insofar as any disturbing force along its line of motion is concerned.

At right angles to its line of motion, however, the flux rate is precisely the same as when the object is at rest. Therefore the "mass" of the moving object with respect to any disturbing force at right angles to its line of motion has not changed, as seen by the external Lorentz observer.

Thus is explained both parts of one of the alltime great mysteries of special relativity: (1) how the mass of an object increases with respect to its motion, and (2) why the mass only increases with respect to its line of motion, and not at right angles to it.

The inertia of a particle is due to its mass, i.e., to the total magnitude of its trapped scalar resonance.

The gravitational attraction between two masses is due to their spacetime curvature. Further, mass is like a capacitance. It can trap additional scalar waves as trapped resonance; hence increase its magnitude or "inertial charge." Or, it can discharge more scalar waves than it absorbs; hence decrease its magnitude or "inertial charge."

Those scalar waves emitted from resonance are emitted as a pattern ensemble of the resonance. Hence they may be regarded as constituting a current of scalar resonance leaving the mass-accumulator-object. Scalar waves absorbed into trapped resonance may be regarded as constituting a current of scalar resonance into the mass-accumulator-object. Thus it is proper to speak of scalar resonance as being able to "flow."

Further, it is possible to increase the mass of an object directly, by transmitting scalar EM waves to it so that it absorbs them. (By "absorbing" scalar waves one means that more enter the object than leave it, so the object acts as an inertial accumulator charging up with inertial charge. This is done by insuring that the reference potential of the scalar wave transmitter is higher than the reference potential of the irradiated object.)

It is also possible to decrease the mass of an object directly, by transmitting scalar EM waves to it so that it emits more than it absorbs. (By "emitting" scalar waves one means that more leave the object than enter it, so the object acts as if it were an inertial accumulator that is discharging its inertial charge. This is done by insuring that the reference potential of the scalar wave transmitter is lower than the reference potential of the irradiated object.)

As can be seen, the scalar wave "transmitter" is actually somewhat comparable to a heat pump; it can either act as an "energy transmitter" or as an "energy extractor," depending upon the difference in potential between "transmitter" and "receiver."

Finally, scalar resonance can have a specific pattern: both in frequency and in spatial curvature aspects, as well as "rate of flow of time" aspects. Indeed, scalar-wise every object has its individual "scalar pattern" which is a unique fingerprint. Since that print is spatiotemporal, it is a product of the object's entire past history. Thus - scalar-wise - no two objects are identical.

This brings up another rather amazing potential: If a reasonably precise scalar pattern of an object can be "irradiated" and resonated with scalar waves, energy may be created in or extracted from the distant object, just as stimulating one tunning fork can excite another at a distance by sympathetic resonance. We leave it as an exercise for the reader to ascertain the relevance of this statement to clairvoyance, radionics, remote viewing, etc.

For the skeptic, however, we must point out that - rigorously - quantum mechanics requires that, continually, in any localized region of spacetime, the "pattern" of any object in the universe appears momentarily in the virtual state, purely from statistical considerations alone. So long as the situation remains statistical, any place in the universe can continue to have the "ghosts" of everything present there, in an ethereally thin pattern, and the observable world will not be affected by it. However, if one can discriminate and scalarly "charge" or "discharge" individual patterns in this "ghost-realm," action-at-a-distance is directly possible, as is materialization and dematerialization. If one accepts that even thought itself produces such virtual "ghost-patterns" in the virtual particle flux of vacuum, then it is at least theoretically possible to even materialize thoughts and thought images.

We have entered a new kind of reality where the old rules and the old limitations do not necessarily apply.

Slide 036: Scalar Resonance Currents

As we pointed out, we can often greatly simplify matters by considering currents of scalar resonance. These currents flow from higher potential to lower potential, regardless of whether we are considering "transmission" or "reception."

Indeed, to "transmit at lower potential" is to receive, and to "receive at higher potential" is to transmit.

Thus the "transmitter-receiver" is a special system where simply biasing the two nodes differently determines which way the scalar resonance current will flow.

We may increase or decrease an object's inertia and mass, simply by properly biasing the transmitter-receiver system's two nodes.

In one accidental experiment of some hours in duration, Golden charged up an area so that, locally, all clocks became erratic. This included electrical clocks, battery-driven watches, wind-up kitchen clocks, and a pendulum-operated grandfather's clock. The rate of flow of time itself was apparently altered in the local area by the accumulated charge, which took some four days to drain off and discharge. At the end of the four days of discharge, all clocks and watches had returned to normal.

Slide 037: Transverse Wave Interference

On this slide we show the orthodox representation of EM wave interference.

The chart is stylized since we assume two single-frequency EM waves that intersect and interfere in the indicated region.

In the interference zone, in-phase wave amplitudes add (constructive interference) while out-of-phase wave amplitudes subtract (destructive interference). In our stylized mode, we show the zero-summed locations as lines.

Conventionally, these interfering waves are considered to be transverse waves in vacuum.

The point is, in this scheme we think of "putting in the waves of finite amplitude, and creating the zero-amplitude regions by destructive interference." We create additional waves of increased-amplitude regions by constructive iterference.

Note that this view is only half correct. It addresses the electromagnetics, but not the gravitational aspects. Actually the regions of destructive EM interference are regions of constructive G-interference, and the regions of constructive EM interference are regions of destructive G-interference.

Slide 038: Transverse Wave Interference

Here we show the same interference situation, only now we think of transmitting scalar EM waves, which we model as longitudinal waves.

Again we assume two single-frequency scalar EM waves that intersect and interfere in the indicated region.

However, to an external observer, each of these waves individually appears to have zero E and H fields, hence to contain zero EM energy. That is, conventionally we seem to be transmitting waves of "pure potential," without any "force field" amplitudes whatsoever. We say we are transmitting waves of "artificial potential," since we deliberately constructed the zero-vector-summation scalar waves in the first place.

In the interference zone, a strange thing now happens. The relative magnitudes of the artificial potential of one wave with respect to the artificial potential of the other depend upon the phase relationship between the two. Further, whether the "gradient" so established appears negative or positive also depends upon the phase relationship between the two.

What results is most interesting: the out-of-phase condition now produces an EM gradient whose sign and magnitude are functions of the location within the interference zone.

Thus one now has real, non-zero EM potential gradients, both electrical and magnetic. And so real EM energy has emerged in an interference pattern within the area.

Ironically, we get essentially what we had before! Only now we have "put in the zero-reference lines, and produced the non-zero gradient (energy) zones."

In other words, we have recreated ordinary EM energy at a distance, directly from the interference of gravitational potential energy (anenergy).

And, to the laboratory observer, there has been no "EM wave" energy flow through the intervening space.

This was Tesla's secret of "wireless transmission of energy to a distance without losses."

Further, in a hypothetically perfect case, the interference represents a sort of "energybottle."

But now recall our need to take the sign of the scalar current into account. In this energy bottle, then, EM energy emerges and stabilizes - if and only if our transmitters are at higher reference potential than the ambient interference zone. If our transmitters are biased at lower potential, then energy is extracted from the energy bottle and re-emerges back at the transmitters, where it must be extracted and disposed of, if the transmitters are not to be burned out.

BACKGROUND FOR THE BRIEFER:

If we interfere two transmitters in a region of great energy -such as the molten core of the earth itself- and bias the transmitters negatively, we can extract enormous energy directly from that distant source!

Indeed, a slight variation of this effect is precisely how the Soviet Union obtains the enormous energy with which to power its incredibly powerful strategic "continent-buster" scalar EM weapons. Scalar frequency pairs - 12 kiloHertz apart - are transmitted into the earth itself on some portion of the earth's "giant scalar resonance" frequency curve. Biasing the two transmitters differently with respect to each other produces a high potential difference (voltage) between them. At the same time, biasing them both negative with respect to the earth's molten core produces a scalar resonance current from the core to the two transmitters. In the "outer loop" between the two scalar transmitters, there appears a gigantic voltage and gigantic electrical current that can be captured by appropriate means. This electrical power is tapped off and transmitted to incredibly powerful scalar EM weapon systems. There special accumulators and switchers are are utilized to provide the power of many Niagaras to each weapon.

Just before May 1, 1985 the Soviet Union performed a "full-up" operational test of their entire strategic scalar EM weapons complex. This test was detected and monitored periodically by Frank Golden. Some 27 of these giant Soviet "power taps" were locked into the molten core of the earth, producing forced (entrained) scalar resonance of the entire planet on 54 controlled frequencies under our very feet. The remainder of the scalar frequency spectrum was ablaze with literally hundreds of Soviet scalar transmitters: probably the entire strategic scalar command and control system to underwater submarines, higher command centers, distant commands, etc. was activated in the giant exercise.

For several days, the system was exercised on a mind-boggling scale, apparently as part of the Soviet Union's highly accentuated 40th anniversary celebration of the end of World War II.

Ironically, not a single U.S. intelligence agency, laboratory, or scientist detected this monstrous exercise for the new Soviet leader, Gorbachev. Not a one of them had a detector for scalar EM radiation, and not a one of them officially believes the exercise ever happened.

Slide 039: Creating Energy at a Distance

A most useful device is obtained if one uses a scalar interferometer where the two transmitters transmit beams that intersect at a distance.

In the interference zone, an energy bottle is created.

By biasing the transmitter reference potentials well above that of the distant energy bottle, EM energy emerges in that zone. In that case the interferometer is operating in the exothermic mode.

By biasing the transmitter reference potentials well below that of the distant energy bottle, EM energy is extracted from the distant zone and emerges from the transmitter. In that case the interferometer is operating in the endothermic mode.

If the transmitters transmit continuously, the effect in the distant zone is continuous.

If each transmitter transmits a pulse, and the two pulses meet in the distant intersection zone, then an explosive emergence or extraction of energy occurs at the distant interference zone, depending upon whether the interferometer is operating in the exothermic or the endothermic mode.

Slide 040: Exothermic Mode (Scalar Interferometer)

For a scalar interferometer, "del phi" (the gradient of the potential) applies between the transmitter site and the distant intersection site, not to the intervening space in between. Thus one speaks of "energy flow" as being between transmitter and intersection, without any "in between." In the intervening space, all the energy exists as locked-in artificial potential, not EM force field energy (gradient bleed-off of potential).

In the exothermic mode, the ground potential of the transmitter is biased well above the ground potential of ambient vacuum. Energy enters the transmitter and "disappears", to "reappear" in the distant interference zone.

If continuous wave transmission is used, the energy continuously appears in the distant zone.

If pulse transmission is used and timed so that the two scalar pulses meet in the distant zone, energy explosively appears there.

If multiple frequencies are transmitted in the manner of a Fourier expansion of a particular geometric form, then a 3-dimensional energy form appears at the distant intersection. In this manner, a spherical or hemispherical shell (a globe of "dome" of EM energy) can be created at a distance. If pulse transmission is used, this will be an impulsive or explosive emergence of that energy form. If continuous transmission is used, this will be a continuous glowing form.

By feeding incredibly powerful transmitters with large amounts of energy extracted from the earth's molten core by "energy taps," very large spherical globes and hemispherical domes of EM energy can be created. The energy in the interference "shell" of such a sphere or hemisphere is sufficiently dense to lift Dirac matter from the Dirac sea of the vacuum. Thus the shell contains a glowing plasma.

Many such scalar howitzer signatures have been seen over the oceans, particularly over the North Pacific by jet airliners flying into and out of Japan. Also, such globes and domes of light have been seen deep within the Soviet Union, by observers in Afghanistan and by pilots of aircraft landing in Iran.

In the impulsive exothermic mode, a large visible flash will occur if EM energy in the visible spectrum is produced. "Flashes" in the infrared may similarly occur, if the emerging energy is in that spectral band. In September 1979 our Vela satellites detected such a large "nuclear flash" over the South Atlantic, off the southern coast of Africa. A second "nuclear flash" detected by the Vela satellites in 1980 was in the infrared only. Some years ago, a series of Momalous "flashes" and "booms" occurred off the east coast of the United States. These were due to the orientation and alignment -and registration - of one or more Soviet "scalar howitzers" - scalar EM interferometers in the exothermic mode.

Large "booms" occurred over the shuttle launch site at Cape Canaveral, associated with three shuttle launches prior to the end of November 1985. These were tests of such exothermic scalar EM howitzers, being tested as part of the Soviet Launch Phase ABM system. In that mode, the scalar pulses from the two transmitters are injected into special zero-reference scalar EM "channels" established in the EM carriers of the Woodpecker over-the-horizon radars. The scalar pulses travel through these channels, traveling in the ordinary EM beam of the transmitter and following it in its curvature around the earth in the earth-ionospheric waveguide. The scalar pulses are timed, phased, and oriented so as to meet the rising shuttle. In these tests the transmissions were offset in time so the shuttle would not actually be destroyed, but the system could be tested against actual shuttle launches in the U.S.

The specific uses of these various exothermic modes will be covered in later parts of the briefing.

Slide 041: Endothermic Mode (Scalar Interferometer)

In the endothermic mode, the bias on the transmitters is such that energy is extracted from the distant intersection zone, to re-emerge at the transmitters. There the energy must be caught and disposed of if it is not to burn out the transmitters. When very large amounts of energy are extracted from distant points, the Soviets often use a "dump" method of temporarily capturing, and storing in an accumulator, the heat energy emerging at the transmitters. A "scalar energy tap" established into the accumulator then feeds a second howitzer in the exothermic mode. This howitzer is focused on a distant dumpsite - often Bennett Island, where U.S. weather satellites continually observe exhausts.

In the impulsive endothermic mode, energy is impulsively extracted from the distant intersection zone. In the atmosphere this results in a very sharp cooling, or a "cold explosion." It also results in the type of boom and rumble often associated with thunder after a lightning bolt.

On April 9, 1984 the Soviet Union tested such a "cold explosion" off the coast of Japan, near the Kuril Islands. In the suddenly induced low pressure "cold zone" above the ocean, ocean water was sharply sucked up from the ocean, forming a dense cloud. Then air rushing in to the low pressure zone forced the cloud upward, forming a mushroom much like that of an atomic explosion in visual appearance, except for the absence of a flash and the absence of a giant shock wave moving out away from the site of the explosion. (In this case the Soviets controlled the rise time of the pulse so that no "giant atmospheric boom" occurred.).

As the cloud rises, it expands by mixing - very similar to a giant thunderhead buildup, except much faster. In this case the cloud rose to 60,000 feet in about 2 minutes, spreading out until it reached a diameter of about 200 miles. The pilots and crews of several Boeing 747 jet airliners in the general vicinity saw the incident. Sometime after that, a U.S. weather satellite photo of the area occurred. The cloud in that photo has an anomalous density distribution, differing from that of all other clouds in the area.

Nikola Tesla also planned a very special use for his endothermic scalar interferometer. He planned to produce what he called his "big eye to see at a distance."

This is accomplished as shown on the diagram. First, the system is only weakly endothermic, so that only a small amount of energy is extracted from the distant target. Also, the beams are "scanned" by an open receiver, timewise, from side to side and top to bottom. By scanning yet another single beam through the intersection zone and phasing its pulses, an even better representation can be obtained. Thus the receiver produces a representation of the energy extracted from various locations within the distant endothermic zone. By displaying the received signals on an appropriately scanned screen, a representation of the distant scene in the intersection zone can be created. Indeed this is a special kind of "microwave interferometry," and - with modern techniques - the imagery obtained might be surprisingly good. With development, it might even become as good as the image presently obtained by side-looking acquisition radars.

Interestingly enough, since scalar EM beams will easily penetrate the earth or the ocean, one can also look beneath the earth or beneath the ocean with this type of scanning scalar interferometer.

The importance of this capability to strategic and tactical reconnaissance is obvious. Camouflage, cover, and concealment have no effect on such a system. One can easily look inside buildings and into underground facilities. With a small system such as this, the U.S. Marines at Khe Sahn would have had little difficulty locating the tunnels continually dug under the perimeter by the Viet Cong. And targets under jungle canopies are directly visible.

BACKGROUND FOR THE BRIEFER:

It requires little imagination to see that this system is easily adapted to produce an "underwater radar." With such devices, the problem posed by the underwater nuclear submarine is solved. For example, an entire area can be continually searched, much like acquisition radar systems do now. A submarine can be detected and tracked, and none of its ordinary detectors will detect anything out of the ordinary. By using a separate pair of beams in the exothermic mode, powerful scalar pulses can be fired at the distant sub, intersecting at the submarine in a violent EMP throughout the sub and its armament. Thus the sub and all its missiles are destroyed instantly.

Or, continuous exothermic transmission can be used by the targeting weapon at lesser power, gradually interfering with the sub's electrical systems and causing it to lose control. The sub then sinks to crush depth and implodes.

Precisely that scenario seems to be what happened on April 10, 1963 to the U.S.S. Thresher nuclear submarine. It left a signature: the sub's surface companion, the nearby U.S.S. Skylark, was in the "splatter zone" of the underwater scalar interference. That is, spurious EM noise was being generated In all the Skylark's electrical systems, some of which were actually disabled. So intense was the "electronic jamming" that it required over an hour and a half for the Skylark to transmit an emergency message back to its headquarters that the Thresher was in serious trouble and contact with it had been lost. Some of the Skylark's communication systems actually failed, but later resumed operation inexplicably, once the jamming was gone. That type of "jamming" of multiple bands and multiple electronic equipments, of course, together with the anomalous failure of electronic equipment and its later mysterious recovery, were direct signatures of the use of the exothermic scalar interferometer against the undersea target area in the vicinity of the Skylark.

The very next day, Apr. 11, 1963, the same Soviet scalar EM howitzer system was tested in the "destroy submarine" pulse mode. A huge underwater EM blast occured off the coast of Puerto Rico, about 100 miles north of the island. The underwater explosion caused a huge boiling of the surface of the ocean, followed by the rising up of a giant mushroom of water about a third of a mile high. The mushroom of water then fell back into the ocean, completing the signuture.

Fortunately the startled crew of a passing U.S. jetliner that was just passing its checkpoint in that area saw the entire incident. (See Robert J. Durant, "An Underwater Explosion - or What?", Pursuit, 5(2), April 1972, p. 30-31.)

These two incidents were full-up operational tests of Khrushchev's newly deployed superweapons. He probably staged this dramatic one-two punch in a desperate effort to recover face with the Communist Party after his disastrous facedown by Kennedy in the Cuban Missile Crisis a few short months previously. Apparently the attempt was successful, since he remained in power another year before being deposed.

A short time before, the Soviets had hastily announced missile tests would be conducted into a zone some distance away from the cold explosion site. This may have been intended as deception to cover this incident, should any foreign nation indicate they understood what was going on.

It also was a direct "stimulus" to the Japanese and the rest of the world: That is, stimulate the system and see if the scientists recognize what happened. If they do, then they know about scalar EM weapons. If they don't, then their countries know nothing of scalar EM weapons, and those countries are defenseless against them.

At any rate, at about 5:14 a.m. Pacific Standard Time on April 9, 1984, a giant mushroom cloud erupted above the ocean south of the Kuril Islands. The mushroom rose rapidly, expanding as it rose. In two minutes it had reached an altitude of 60,000 feet and a diameter of about 200 miles.

One pilot of a Boeing 747 who observed the cloud was a former B-52 bomber pilot. He described the cloud as very similar to a mushroom cloud from a gigantic nuclear explosion, except there was no flash of visible light. Taking evasive action, he turned off course away from the blast, and braced for a blast shock wave, which never came.

Slide 045: Mushroom Cloud Rising from Sea

Indeed, this highly anomalous cloud was due to a cold explosion - a test of a Soviet scalar EM howitzer in the pulsed endothermic mode.

In the weapon's targeted interference zone, EM energy (heat) was rapidly withdrawn when the biased endothermic extraction occurred. Above the ocean an intense low-pressure zone was created. Water from the ocean was sucked up, as if by a giant vacuum cleaner. The water was violently broken into droplets, forming a dense cloud, with a strong upward momentum.

The surrounding higher-pressure air rushed into the low-pressure zone, pushing the rising dense cloud of water vapor upward as its upward momentum continued. Mixing caused rapid expansion of the rising cloud, causing its density to thin measurably as it rose and expanded. An effect very similar to the formation of a strong thunderhead resulted, except much faster.

The mixing cloud also resembled the mushroom cloud from a giant nuclear explosion, just as an emerging thunderhead does.

But no outward blast wave resulted as does from a nuclear explosion. Also, no visible flash occurred, probably as a result of deliberate design by the Russians.

Thus a beautiful "stimulus" and test was conducted: quite a few airliners were "pinged," providing a high-level stimulus to competent observers. The news was sure to be reported by them to several nations. The press was sure to pick up the story. This was a high order stimulus to see whether the U.S., Japan, or other potential adversaries of the Soviet Union recognized the testing of a cold explosion weapon.

By our reaction, we assured them (with high confidence) that we still knew nothing of scalar EM interferometry or cold explosions.

Five Boeing 747's flew through or near the cloud on their way to Anchorage, Alaska. The aircraft were checked at Anchorage for radioactive contamination, but nothing was found. This showed that the huge "explosion" had been non-nuclear.

The ocean in the area is also about 21,000 feet deep. That is really too deep for a submarine volcano to have erupted and caused the cloud. (Besides, a volcano would have continued to snort at least a bit, and so that appears to be out of the question as a possible cause of the incident.)

In short, a manmade phenomenon is indicated.

Indeed, we know it was a cold explosion. As I've stated previously, a colleague has in fact produced the basic effect over a dish of water in the laboratory, using a small scalar interferometer in the endothermic mode.

Further, the story does not end there.

A geophysicist at the University of Hawaii, Dr. Daniel A. Walker, together with his colleagues monitor an array of hydrophones on the ocean bottom, recording signals such as seismic incidents, volcano eruptions, etc.

Dr. Walker and his colleagues performed a comprehensive analysis of the data recorded by the hydrophones in and around the time of the incident in question. The data shows the absence of any natural seismic or volcanic event that could have caused the April 9th phenomenon off the coast of Japan.

He and his colleagues concluded that it was either an as yet unknown natural phenomenon, or a man-made phenomenon.

Their report is published in Science. (Walker et al, "Kaitoku Seamount and the Mystery Cloud of 9 April 1984," Science, 227(4687), Feb. 8, 1985, p. 607-611.)

EXPLOSIVE EVENTS SEEN ON SOVIET ISLAND

Slide 048: Explosive Events seen on Soviet Island

Here are two U.S. weather satellite photos of the anomalous exhausts on Bennett Island we previously referred to.

The exhaust in the left picture is about 150 miles long, and is nearly horizontal (about 1.5 degrees above the horizontal). It is entirely consistent with the continuous exhaust from a "dumping transfer" scalar EM howitzer in the continuous exothermic mode. (The primary howitzer, of course, was activated in the endothermic mode.)

I think any open-minded investigator must admit that that is indeed a very powerful jet-like exhaust, and not like anything one ever sees from a natural volcano or geological gas vent. If anyone knows of such an anomalous volcanic or geological exhaust, I would be most delighted to see a photo or report. To my knowledge, no such natural photo exists, and no such natural exhaust has ever been reported.

The right picture shows the "puff of an explosive emergence of the exhaust. In other words, this one is the exhaust from a "dumping transfer" howitzer used in the pulsed exothermic mode. Since it did not have so much energy to dump, it could dump it in a pulse. Again, the primary howitzer, of course, was activated in the endothermic mode.

Over 100 weather satellite photos of these anomalous exhausts have been taken since 1974.

One or more U.S. aircraft have even been vectored through the exhausts, and samples of the exhaust taken and analyzed. The exhaust is made up of a little clay and mud and water, and is colder than the surrounding air.

EXPLOSIVE EVENTS SEEN ON SOVIET ISLAND

Slide 049: Explosive Events seen on Soviet Island

U.S. weather analysts euphemistically call these exhausts from Bennett Island plumes.

Here is another U.S. weather satellite photo, showing the twin emergence of multiple puffs.

One might expect such exhausts if the secondary "dumping transfer" howitzer is operated in the continuous mode, with continuous extraction by "power tapping" the accumulator of the primary howitzer. In that case, the signature of the exhaust would expose the operation of the primary howitzer. For example, this exhaust would indicate multiple puffs, hence probably multiple frequencies and multiple primary transmitters, each phased in a controlled manner. That of course indicates the production of Fourier expansion forms - of 3-dimensional geometrical forms - by the primary howitzer(s). Since these are puffs, it may indicate the explosive formation of distant spherical balls of energy by the primary howitzer. This in turn indicates the use of a howitzer system in the "pulse firing" mode, which can be used against missiles, ships, aircraft, ground targets, armored vehicles, underwater targets, etc.

Slide 050: Explosive Events seen on Soviet Islands

This slide shows the location of three areas of interest relative to Soviet scalar EM weapons testing.

Wrangel Island, north of the northeastern portion of the Soviet mainland, is associate with tests of these weapons in large circular breakups of the ocean's ice cover. This of course could aid submarines that wished to surface and fire cruise missiles, or submarines that wished to fire from underwater and needed the ice broken up.

Strangely enough, Wrangel Island has a most peculiar history: legally it still belongs to the U.S., but has been "given" to the Soviet Union without permission of the U.S. Senate, which is illegal.

Bennett Island, a little farther to the west and still north of the Soviet mainland, is noted for its phenomenal number of anomalous exhausts as previously discussed.

North of the Soviet mainland and near its middle lies the large island of Novaya Zemlya. Weather satellites have taken pictures of anomalous circulations over this island, which are further candidates for exhausts from scalar EM howitzer operations.

NOTE:
INTERFERENCE OF TWO SUCH SCALAR HEMISPHERES CREATES A "GLOWING HEMISPHERICAL SHELL"

Slide 051: Creating a Spatial 0-Field Pattern

On this slide we show that a hemispherical dome (or other regular shape) can be composed from scalar waves by 3-dimensional Fourier expansion. By truncating the expansion - say after 10 or 12 frequency terms - a good representation of the desired form can be obtained with a practical number of frequencies, and in turn a practical number of transmitters. A computer is used to compute the multiplying functions for each frequency, and the entire complex of frequencies is then transmitted to produce the scalar form. By interfering two such scalar forms, a 3-dimensional shell of locked-in, ordinary EM energy is formed in space.

Interference of two such scalar hemispherical surfaces creates a "glowing hemispherical shell or dome of energy."

Interference of two such scalar spherical surfaces creates a "glowing spherical shell or globe of energy."

Both such geometric forms have been repeatedly seen.

TESLA SHIELD

3–D SCALAR
INTERFEROMETRY
(HEMISPHERICAL SHELL)

Slide 052: Tesla Shield

Of particular interest is the hemispherical shell of energy, which years ago I dubbed the "Tesla shield."

As shown on this slide, two scalar hemispherical surfaces are created, using multiple frequency transmitters and truncated Fourier series expansions. Interference of the two scalar hemispheres creates a great, glowing hemispherical shell of ordinary electro-magnetic energy. In the shell, the energy density is sufficient to lift Dirac matter from the Dirac Sea of vacuum. The shell is thus filled with a glowing plasma.

Such a shell may be several hundred miles in diameter at the base. The enormous energy required to form such a defense shell is obtained by a "scalar power tap" into the molten core of the earth itself, as previously explained. In late April/early May of 1985, 27 such "power taps" were placed in the earth by the Soviets. If each tap is capable of powering four to six large scalar EM weapons, then the Soviet strategic scalar EM arsenal contains over 100 monstrous superweapons capable of generating exothermic explosions, endothermic explosions, engineering the weather, locating and destroying underwater submarines, detecting and destroying ballistic missiles shortly after launch, detecting and destroying long range strategic bombers as soon as they are airborne, etc.

At any rate, the giant Tesla shield is useful against any penetrating vehicle. If the shell is not so large, its energy density may be very high. In that case, the intense plasma heating will fuse and even vaporize metallic bodies. In addition, any vehicle encountering the shell is subjected to an extremely intense EMP arising everywhere inside its circuitry. EM shielding is of no use against the creation of energy throughout the spacetime of the circuits; such shielding only helps against energy flow through space in the conventional sense.

Thus the electronics of any vehicle encountering the shield are instantly dudded, whether or not they are shielded against ordinary electromagnetic interference (EMI). This includes the electronics operating a nuclear warhead, carried by a re-entry vehicle. Electrically everything penetrating the shell is totally dudded. Further, explosive materials are exploded when such an EMP is encountered, and combustible materials are fiercely consumed or set afire. Ablative shielding suffers an interesting catastrophe: since energy does not try to "flow into" the shielding but "arises everywhere in it simultaneously", "ablation" occurs everywhere throughout the ablative material, simply exploding it instantly. In addition, for smaller Tesla shells (say of 50 miles diameter) the energy density is sufficient to melt or vaporize metals such as in missile structures.

With such a Tesla shield, there is no need to discriminate true warhead-bearing re-entry vehicles from decoys, chaff, etc. The entire "mess" entering the shield is simply "cleaned up" and "sterilized" or destroyed. The shield can take care of ICBMs/IRBMs and their nuclear warheads, strategic bombers and their nuclear bombs, cruise missiles and their nuclear warheads, re-entry vehicles and their warheads, decoys, chaff, etc.

EXPANDING DOME-LIKE PHENOMENON

Slide 053: Expanding Dome-like Phenomenon

Here we show one instance of apparent Soviet testing of the Tesla shield (hemispherical shell of energy) over the ocean. This incident occurred in the Caribbean and Western North Atlantic Ocean on Mar. 20, 1969 and is reported in the Marine Observer, Vol. 40, 1970, p. 17. A semicircle of milky white light, quite intense at first, was sighted on the horizon. The semicircle enlarged, dimming as it expanded. The incident lasted for about 10 minutes. Seen from a passing ship, the top of the hemisphere reached a sighting elevation angle of about 50 degrees, while the base of the hemisphere of light subtended an arc of about 70 degrees. This is directly indicative of a test of the Tesla shield, first as a small, more intense shield and then expanding to greater size for a less intense shield whose primary destructive mechanism is EMP. Note that the EMP in a Tesla shield is locally contained in the energy-bottle shell. It is not an ordinary EMP of energy radiated out of the shell.

Slide 054: Hemisphere & Globes 1977

Here is a second instance of apparent Soviet testing of the hemispherical Tesla shield over the ocean. This time it is combined with simultaneous testing of two smaller scalar interferometers creating Tesla globes of EM energy.
This incident occurred at 23 degrees 5 minutes north, 17 degrees 25 minutes west. It was sighted and reported by a British ship, H.M.V. Kinpurnie Castle, on Mar. 24, 1977. The report is in the Marine Observer. Vol. 48, 1978, p. 21-22.

First a large, moderately luminous hemisphere of light formed, requiring about 3 minutes to do so. Seen from the ship, the top of the hemisphere was at a sighting elevation angle of about 30 degrees, while the base subtended an arc of about 40 degrees. This was the basic Tesla shield.

Then two other luminous globes or patches of light, each of about 1 degree diameter as seen from the ship, formed in the same area; one inside the shield and one outside it. From the glowing globe inside the shield, a light beam similar to a giant searchlight shone down to the ocean's surface for about 10 seconds.

Again the phenomena lasted about 10 minutes and then disappeared.

The luminous globe or patch inside the hemisphere might be the test of a second weapon deployed from a Soviet aircraft in the area. If so, the aircraft has placed a strong spherical shield around itself. In addition, the aircraft is utilizing some sort of scalar interferometer beam weapon in an underwater mode. Probably this would imply a "shot" at a hostile nuclear submarine inside the shielded zone. Thus this aircraft would have the scalar EM equipment to search for the underwater sub and detect it, and also to concentrate interference energy upon it underwater, destroying it quickly.

Suffice it to say that it is possible to perform scalar interferometry by means of a single beam, in a proprietary process discovered by a close colleague. Thus the "glowing beam to the ocean" resembling a searchlight makes very good sense in the anti-submarine role. The same weapon, of course, could also attack any hostile surface vessel that might have been inside the shielded area at its formation.

The second luminous globe or patch, outside the hemisphere, is probably from a second scalar interferometer from the naval task force, simulating the continuous attack of a certain target (missile or aircraft) outside the protective dome.

As can be seen, this phenomenon is directly indicative of the types of operations one would expect from the testing of Soviet scalar EM weapons at sea, possibly to protect a Soviet naval task force during simulated combat operations.

ARTIST'S CONCEPT

SARYSHAGAN DIRECTION, SEPTEMBER 1979 (SEEN FROM AFGHANISTAN)

MULTIPLE EVENTS SEEN IN SEPTEMBER 1979 FROM AFGHANISTAN

STRANGE LURID GLOW THAT FLARED SILENTLY OVER THE HINDU KUSH; AS DESCRIBED BY NICK DOWNEY.

THE SUNDAY TIMES AUGUST 17, 1980

WITNESS TO A SUPER-WEAPON?

Slide 055: Saryshagan Direction, September 1979

The London Sunday Times of 17 August 1980 contained information and a photo-sketch of incidents of sighting of the testing of very large Tesla globes deep within the Soviet Union. British war cameraman Nick Downie made the sightings from Afghanistan. The phenomena seen were in the direction of the Saryshagan Missile Test Range, which - according to the U.S. Defense Department's Soviet Military Power, 1986 - contains one or more large directed energy weapons (DEWs).

Even though Downie was seeing the giant globe of light from a great distance, it flared silently over the Hindu Kush and expanded to subtend an arc of about 20 degrees, dimming as it expanded. (An arc of 20 degrees subtended by an object many hundreds of miles distant indicates an object of well over a hundred miles in diameter. This gives some idea of the enormous energy being controlled and manipulated by these Soviet weapons.).

Downie saw the sight on more than one occasion in September 1979.

BACKGROUND FOR THE BRIEFER:

In the same month - September 1979 - a stationary luminous globe containing a vertical stripe of black in the center was seen in the sky off Saint Petersburg, Florida. This particular type of sighting in that area has been previously correlated with times of known activity at Saryshagan.

Further, in the same month U.S. nuclear-warning Vela satellites detected a mysterious "nuclear flash" over the South Atlantic, off the coast of Africa. Controversy has raged in U.S. intelligence and scientific circles to this day as to whether a nuclear explosion or some other mechanism produced the flash.

Indeed, the flash may have been produced by a scalar EM howitzer from Saryshagan as one more "ping" of the U.S. intelligence system, to ascertain whether or not it knew anything about scalar EM howitzers. Again, the negative response told them with high confidence that (1) we still didn't know about scalar EM stuff, and (2) we were still absolutely defenseless against the Soviet scalar EM weaponry.

In 1980, a second "Vela flash" was reported. This time it occurred in the infrared region only, which positively rules out any sort of nuclear explosion. Even this increased stimulus still evoked a U.S. action that revealed total ignorance of scalar EM weaponry.

An alternate possibility for the September 1979 Vela flash also exists: countries not hostile to the U.S. may have tested a scalar EM weapon that produced the flash.

At any rate, from Downie's sightings, it is highly probably that the DEW weaponry at Saryshagan Missile Test Range was active in September 1979, and was producing huge Tesla globes. If the DEWs at Saryshagan can produce the giant luminous Tesla globe, they almost certainly are scalar EM interferometers and can produce the giant Tesla shields as well. Downie reported other earlier sightings of similar phenomena seen by Afghans deep within the Soviet Union in the same direction toward Saryshagan.

Briefly let us cover the uses of such a "giant globe" or spherical shell of glowing EM energy and plasma.

By placing such a "giant globe" thousands of kilometers out away from the defended heartland, an entire arc of the sky can be defended against long-range ballistic missile attack in midcourse. During their midcourse trajectory, the attacking missiles would have to penetrate the globular shell twice, exposing them to giant internal EMPs twice. A very high probability thus exists that all missiles entering the space occupied by the globe are dudded upon entry and/or exit. This includes the electronics inside the nuclear warheads themselves. Also, this is particularly effective against MIRV and MARV missile carriers, since the multiple re-entry vehicles are normally still on the main vehicle during most of midcourse. The use of this midcourse ABM globe defense greatly reduces the number of vehicles arriving at the latter part of midcourse and at the terminal phase of their trajectory.

By using a smaller, more intense globe and placing it on incoming clusters of objects or single objects, both EMP and intense local heating are used against the objects. This is suitable in the latter part of midcourse and in the terminal phase of ICBM's, IRBM's, SLBM's, and cruise missiles. It is also useful against incoming strategic bombers and their air-to-surface missiles, both ballistic and cruise.

Two modes of the globes - especially the small ones - can be used. First, the continuous mode can be used to "fry" or vaporize incoming objects in a relatively small volume (say two or three tens of kilometers in diameter). Second, the "pulse" mode can be used to "service" all incoming objects, whether or not they have passed through the "large globe" midcourse defense. This provides an additional guarantee of killing the objects; discrimination is not required, just service all of them. The exposure of all incoming objects to multiple attacks raises the probability of kill to essentially 100%, or as close to that as one wishes. Of course the incoming vehicle may still encounter a terminal defense consisting of the Tesla shield and associated roving "quickshot" small intense globes.

In short, with these systems an essentially 100% ABM and anti-bomber defense is possible. Further, the Soviets have possessed such an effective defense for two decades, just as they have openly stated.

CONTINUOUS TESLA EMP GLOBE

TEHERAN, IRAN
JUNE 17, 1966

SEEN FROM NEAR MEHRABAD AIRPORT

OBSERVED BETWEEN 4 TO 5 MINUTES

SEEN BY TWO AIRCRAFT

ARTIST'S CONCEPT

Slide 056: Continuous Tesla EMP Globe

Here is another verified incident of a gigantic test of a Soviet scalar EM howitzer deep within the Soviet Union.

This is a CIA report, released under the Freedom of Information Act. One can be quite sure that the incident occurred as stated.

The phenomenon was seen from two aircraft approaching Mehrabad Airport in Teheran, Iran on June 17, 1966 and reported by their pilots.

On the far horizon deep within the Soviet Union, an intense spherical ball of light appeared, "sitting on the horizon" so to speak. The globe of light increased to enormous size, dimming as it did so, literally filling an arc of the distant sky as it expanded. The sighting was shielded from most ground observers' view at the airport itself due to an intervening mountain range that masked most of tin-phenomenon from the ground.

The silent, expanding globe was observed for four or five minutes before it faded away.

BACKGROUND FOR THE BRIEFER:

Again, this is positive evidence of the testing of a giant scalar EM interferometer, in the "midcourse ABM globe" type of action.

However, note the date - mid 1966! The Soviets have therefore been testing such scalar weapons of enormous size and power for at least two decades. This implies that development must have started at least a decade earlier, or in the mid '50s.

Still earlier in January 1960 Nikita Khrushchev had announced the development of a "fantastic" Soviet weapon, one that could even destroy all life on earth if unrestrainedly used. In 1962 the ebullient Khrushchev was forced to back down and lose face before John Kennedy in the Cuban Missile Crisis. Khrushchev's missiles and bombers were in woeful shape, as Kennedy well knew (by courtesy of the Soviet spy, Colonel Oleg Penkovsky). Kennedy did not know that Khrushchev's new superweapons were nearing deployment, but were not yet quite ready.

To save face and prevent his immediate ouster, Khrushchev apparently conducted a startling two-strike demonstration of his new weapons as soon as they became operationally ready. On April 10, 1963 he detected and destroyed the U.S.S. Thresher nuclear submarine using a scalar EM howitzer in the underwater "continuous" mode.

The next day he demonstrated the "pulsed" underwater destruction mode for nuclear subs by producing a giant underwater EM explosion underneath the ocean 100 miles north of Puerto Rico. Ironically, just as the Atlantic was coming alive with U.S. naval vessels searching for the lost Thresher, a second test of the weapons that had finished off the sub occurred to the south of them, unnoticed and disregarded, even though seen and reported (to the FBI and the U.S. Coast Guard) by a passing U.S. jetliner's pilot and crew, who observed the underwater explosion.

We thus can peg the development of these weapons by the Soviets as starting well before 1960. The first operational deployment of the giant strategic weaponry occurred in early 1963.

Note that the 1966 testing observed here is completely consistent with this estimated development schedule.

Thus large Soviet strategic scalar EM weapons have been operational on site for 23 years! This implies that at least three additional generations of the scalar EM weapons have been developed and deployed by now.

Slide 057: Mysterious Light over North Pacific

Incidents of Soviet testing of the Tesla shield and the Tesla globe weapons are routinely observed by airline pilots flying over the North Pacific into and out of Japan.

This is one typical example. Two jetliners, Japan Air Line flights 403 and 421, sighted and reported a large glowing globe of light sitting just beyond the horizon and extending well above it. The aircraft were in the vicinity of 42 degrees N latitude and 153 degrees longitude at the time. The sighting was thus about 700 miles east of Kushiro.

The pilots estimated the diameter of the ball as at least 18-27 kilometers. Depending upon the actual distance to the sphere, it may have been of much larger size.

This incident is reported in the Asahi Evening News, Tokyo, June 22, 1982.

The jet airliner pilots flying over these waters have reported many other similar sightings.

Here is another sighting closer to home.

This incident was observed from a passing ship on June 22, 1976 in the North Atlantic, at about 2113-2140 hours. It is reported in the Marine Observer, Vol. 47. 1977, p. 66.

First, an orange glow was sighted behind some distant clouds. A couple of minutes later, a glowing white sphere of light was observed to the left of the orange glow, just above the clouds. The white sphere then slowly expanded to a much larger sphere, dimming as it expanded. At its maximum size, the top of the white sphere reached about 24 degrees 30 minutes elevation angle to the observer. Development to maximum size required about 10 minutes.

By 2140 hrs the sphere had faded and disappeared. The sphere was sufficiently thin that the stars could be seen through it at all times.

Again this incident strongly fits the large Tesla globe mode of a Soviet scalar EM interferometer.

The significance and role of the orange glow are not known at this time.

CONTINUOUS TESLA FIREBALL

BRITISH EUROPEAN AIRWAYS
FLIGHT 831

CIA REPORT
RELEASED UNDER FOIA

Slide 059: Continuous Tesla Fireball

Here is another incident that represents a stimulus to the British government, to see if the British are aware of scalar electromagnetics.

Again, this is a CIA report released under the Freedom of Information Act, so the details are reliable.

On Sep. 10, 1976 British European Airways flight 831, flying between Moscow and London and over Lithuania at the time, observed an intense ball of light above the clouds below the aircraft. The light was so intense that it lit up the sky in the entire vicinity.

The concerned pilot reported the glowing object to the Soviet ground authorities with whom he was in contact. He received the harsh instructions to ignore the light, and essentially to continue on his way out of there.

Here we see an incident involving a small, intense Tesla globe, of the kind with which the defense could "service" objects that had already penetrated a large midcourse globe, or aircraft approaching the defended area.

Obviously the Soviet authorities were tracking the aircraft, and knew it was in the vicinity. It seems logical, then, that they deliberately placed the brightly glowing ball beneath the aircraft so that the pilot and crew could not fail to observe it.

The strange message to the pilot was simply designed to increase the intensity of the stimulus. The stimulus was to be something like, "The Soviets are doing something in research and development that allows them to create intense balls of glowing light at a distance, and place these objects in the air in and around aircraft, possibly to intercept them." The purpose, of course, was to observe the British government's reaction after the incident was reported by the pilot upon his arrival at London.

Again the reaction of the British - and the U.S. as well - was as predicted. Again we showed that we knew nothing of scalar electromagnetic weapons, and did not recognize one when we encountered its effects.

Very neat things can be done if one nests several Tesla shields - say three or four - concentrically, one inside the other. In that case even the nuclear radiation (such as gamma rays) from a defense-suppressive high altitude nuclear burst can be handled.

For example, suppose three such concentric shields are placed over a large vital area. Further, suppose a high altitude nuclear burst is placed up above the outer shield. Gamma radiation almost instantly strikes the plasma in the outer shell, where it is absorbed, scattered, and re-radiated at lower temperature. (That, after all, is what plasmas do.)

Inside the first shell, the scattered radiation is now in the x-ray and ultra-violet region. Let us track the most lethal component, the x-rays.

The scattered x-rays then strike the second plasma shell, and are absorbed, scattered, and re-radiated at lower temperature. Inside the second shell the scattered radiation is now in the visible and infrared region, with a little ultraviolet.

This optical radiation in turn strikes the third plasma shell, and is absorbed, scattered, and re-radiated at still lower temperature. Inside the third shell most of the energy is now in the form of radiofrequency (RF) energy, with a little IR and visible band spectral energy content.

At this point, ordinary electromagnetic interference (EMI) shielding of electronic equipments on the ground and inside the third shield can take care of any RF interference resulting from the emergent RF noise.

As can be seen, three shells are sufficient to convert the gamma and x-ray radiation (and ultraviolet and infrared) mostly to harmless RF energy before all three shells are penetrated. Thus the tactic of deliberate defense suppression by a preliminary high altitude nuclear burst can be countered by multiple Tesla shields.

In addition, of course, any ordinary vehicles penetrating all three shields are exposed to successive violent EMP's, and are almost certainly electrically dudded. The vehicles are also subjected to multiple periods of intense heating, so combustibles, fuels, explosives, and ablatives are destroyed. In addition, metal structures may be melted or vaporized.

Think of it this way: anything that hits one of these Tesla shields goes phht! Just like a bug hitting an electrified bugkiller screen.

For years passing ships have observed and reported such multiple-shield "light phenomena" over remote regions of the ocean. U.S. intelligence has routinely not paid any heed to reports of "lights at night" over remote ocean areas, and so Soviet tests in this manner have remained relatively unnoticed by officialdom.

Slide 061: Two Arcs in the Sky

Just to list one incident involving the testing of multiple concentric Tesla shields, here is an early test conducted in mid-1961 over the Indian Ocean.

The incident occurred at 1800 hrs. Greenwich mean Time (GMT) and was observed by a passing ship. The report is contained in Marine Observer, Vol. 32, 1962, p. 64.

First the ship's crew observed a gigantic, very bright arc of light on the horizon or beyond it, with both ends passing below the line of sight to the horizon. This was in fact probably a large Tesla shield, but of such low intensity that only its intersection arc could clearly be seen. The arc subtended an arc of about 150 degrees across its diameter at the bottom. After about 10 minutes, a second and dimmer arc appeared, concentrically inside the first one. The ship thus was observing what probably was the nesting of two giant hemispheres (of EM energy) to provide a multiple Tesla shield.

This was probably a test of an early research and development prototype, since Khrushchev had only announced his new "fantastic weaponry" in development in his January, 1960 speech to the Soviet Presidium. And apparently land-based weapons such as this prototype probably did not become deployed and operational until April 1963. However, even in 1961 the Soviets would have been developing and testing prototypes of the weapon adapted for naval task force protection and usage.

Several other similar phenomena involving nested hemispheres or giant concentric arcs of light have been seen by mariners at sea.

Slide 062: ABM Defenses

When the various capabilities of Tesla shields, globes, and scalar howitzers are integrated together into an ABM defense, a most formidable Soviet strategic defense capability is apparent.

On this slide we deal only with midcourse and terminal phase ABM defense. Later we shall cover the application of these weapons to launch phase ABM defense, primary phase bomber defense, underwater antisubmarine defense, etc.

Suppose the U.S. is provoked to desperately launch a missile attack toward Russia, as indicated on the slide.

First would come the launch phase destruction of the launched missiles, which we will cover shortly.

Any remaining missiles in midcourse would encounter extremely large, glowing spheres of light, where the EM energy density is contained and held in the spherical shell "energy bottle" of the glowing globes. Each globe might cover an are of up to about 20 degrees, as seen from the Soviet defended area. Missiles carrying MIRV and MARV payloads would not yet have deployed their re-entry vehicles.

As a missile and its payload encounter one of the globular shells, an intense EMP is suddenly experienced throughout the missile and all of its components. Again, EMI shielding is of no consequence since the EMP arises in each increment of spacetime throughout the vehicle volume. The result is instantaneous dudding of all electronic circuitry, including the electronics of the nuclear warheads themselves. The HE content of the nuclear warhead system is violently exploded, totally destroying the configuration of the warhead. A low-order nuclear detonation may occur, but more likely the warhead's nuclear material is just broken up, finely divided, and set afire.

In addition, all combustible materials are set fiercely afire or destroyed. Explosive materials such as booster propellants and HE explosives are violently exploded. Ablative and plastic materials literally explode into pieces, torn apart by sudden violent ablation and outgassing everywhere within. The remnants of the vehicle are now total duds, as is the payload, including re-entry vehicle, nuclear warhead electronics, nuclear materials from the disruption and explosion of the HE portion of the warhead system, etc.

Still, each piece of the debris must pass through the glowing shell once more before it exits. Thus a second "shot", precisely as effective as the first, still awaits each and every piece of the debris plunging along inside the shell as it exits.

As the debris continues on to the latter part of midcourse and early terminal phase, any portions large enough to track are subjected to small, intense Tesla globes where the energy density in the shell is many orders of magnitude greater than in the larger globe used in earlier midcourse. This part of the defense system simply services each incoming "blob" methodically, probably first in the pulse mode. Later, any blobs still remaining are given the maximum "continuous heating" mode with a small Tesla globe, to actually vaporize metals and materials.

In the unlikely event that anything active still remains, or that an object has managed to elude the large and small Tesla fireballs, a Tesla shield is still to bo encountered, towering over the protected area. For significant targets this shield will be concentric, and will contain three or more concentric Tesla shields. Again, the approaching vehicle will be subjected to multiple EMP's and severe heating throughout its volume. In addition, the concentric shields will "clean up and sterilize any gamma radiation and EMP resulting from any deliberate high altitude defense suppression nuclear burst that somehow (inconceivably!) gets through the launch phase ABM system, and the Tesla-globe midcourse and earl terminal phase defenses.

As can be seen, the system complex represents a most formidable defense that certainly approaches 100% effectiveness against the present triad, and even against the addition of cruise missiles.

In addition, since these weapons suffer from very strange constraints and limitations, the scalar transmitters are actually dual mode: they become conventional radars by simply switching into the ordinary EM mode. They arc part of the more conventional ABM defense system complexes we presently recognize in the Soviet Union. In this conventional role, backup ABM missile interceptors are available, to be employed in case the conventional role must be assumed.

Later we will address the reason for the strange limitations that must be placed upon unqualified use of the large scalar EM systems, particularly in the pulse or "burst" nodes.

NETWORK OF VIRTUAL TRANSMITTERS

Slide 063: Network of Virtual Transmitters

In July 1976 the U.S. received very special Bicentennial greetings from the Soviet Union.

At that time, communications systems of the world in the 3-30 megaHertz band suddenly met substantial interference from extremely powerful, chirped Soviet transmitters that were suddenly activated. These transmitters continue their transmissions to this day.

Estimates of the power of these enormous transmitters vary, but figures range as high as several hundred megawatts, with a nominal figure being 100 megawatts.

These powerful transmitters were promptly nicknamed "Woodpeckers" because of the characteristic sound of the chirped signal when received. That is, the received signal made a "pecking" sound much like a woodpecker's beak hitting a block of wood.

Several nations protested, but the powerful signals have continued, right down to this day. The only Soviet response was to add a "spread spectrum" capability, so that the transmitter did not dwell too long on one specific frequency, but shifted periodically to other frequencies.

These transmitters have apparently never been precisely located by U.S. intelligence, but their beams carry much of the characteristics of an over-the horizon (OTH) radar. They have been dubbed OTH-radars by U.S. intelligence, and can without question perform that mission, in addition to some very interesting missions which U.S. intelligence does not assess.

Soviet Military Power, Department of Defense, 1985, p. 45 shows the direct intersection over the United States of the Woodpecker radar beams used in an OTH-role. We show an illustration of that intersection on this slide.

In addition, we show an additional "scanner" beam that can be scanned across the intersection "grid" over the U.S., formed by waveform interference of two main Woodpecker beams.

These Woodpecker transmitters have a great many diverse functions.

First, they can be used in a conventional over-the-horizon radar node, since their beams follow the earth-ionosphere waveguide and curve around the earth. In this mode they can detect missiles at launch and thereafter, and strategic bombers when taking off and thereafter.

However, these scalar interference grid weapons have many other uses.

First, they can be used to biologically attack entire populations in a targeted area. This aspect is not covered in this briefing. Suffice it to say that phase-locked ELF modulation signals ot 10 Hz and less are often detected on multiple Woodpecker frequencies simultaneously. In a target area, this modulation - if sufficiently stronger than the Schumann resonance of the earth's magnetic field - will entrain a percentage of the brains into "forced entrainment." In that case, these human brains are "synchronized" to the Woodpecker signals so that multiple coherent frequencies are phase-locked into them. That is, multiple coherent EM channels directly into these entrained brains now exist. At that point, Fourier expansions may be used to attack specific portions of the brain geometrically.

In addition, scalar EM disease patterns can be modulated upon the carriers, again with Fourier expansions. Specific biological effects can be induced in the entrained populace at will, limited only by the state of the art of the Soviet technology used to attack them. Possible induced effects include instantaneous death, heart seizure, severe emotional disruption, loss of control of internal functions, diseases, disabling of the immune system, and even implantation of thoughts, emotions, and ideas which are interpreted by the targeted subjects as their own.

While further discussion of this area is beyond the scope of this briefing, the biological aspects of the Woodpecker transmitters are horrible. It suffices to say that, in thousands of experiments, Kaznacheyev demonstrated that almost any kind of cellular death and disease pattern could be electromagnetically transmitted. Kaznacheyev reported the effect in the near ultraviolet. Experimenters at the University of Marburg in West Germany duplicated the experiments in the infrared.

The bottom line is that photons themselves can carry death and disease patterns between cells. Scalar E*M* technology allows the synthesis of the actual potential pattern (which after all represents total control of charge and charge distribution, hence biochemistry in the cell) of a particular cellular disease or death mechanism. Symptoms (and cellular death from them!) of nuclear radiation, chemical poisoning, bacterial infection, and other mechanisms were successfully induced by the Kaznacheyev experiments.

Dr. Popp of West Germany has published an analysis of the virtual photon master control system of the cells. Since scalar EM represents the deliberate ordering of virtual particle flux into deterministic patterns, the master control system can readily be entered with scalar techniques to induce disease and disorder at will.

NETWORK OF VIRTUAL TRANSMITTERS

WOODPECKER INTERFERENCE GRID
(SCALAR COMPONENTS)

Slide 064: Network of Virtual Transmitters

On this slide we diagrammatically represent the Soviet woodpecker interference grid over the U.S. This grid can easily be used to influence and control the weather, and for over a decade the Soviets have manipulated the weather over the U.S. and other parts of the world.

By the peculiar title of this slide, we wish to call attention to the fact that, in the exothermic mode of scalar interferometry riding on the woodpecker radar signals, each of the woodpecker grid interference cells can act as a little "virtual transmitter." It's exactly as if the Soviets had been permitted to enter the U.S. and build thousands of EM transmitters at regular intervals all over the country!

And of course it's even worse. In the endothermic mode, it's as if the Soviets had been permitted to enter the U.S. and build thousands of "cold generators" all over the U.S. That is, in that mode, each of the "transmitters" can actually extract electromagnetic energy.

These two modes have enabled the Soviet Union to drastically manipulate the weather at will over the U.S. during the last decade (and similarly, for other places as well.)

(For a disclosure of the Soviet weather control operations over the U.S., see T.E. Bearden, Soviet Weather Engineering Over North America, 1-hr. videotape, 1985, available from The Tom Bearden Website www.cheniere.org. We will only summarize here.).

Briefly, inside various reference level zeros on the ordinary EM woodpecker carriers, scalar "channels" are established. Scalar beams, signals, and interferometer pulses and transmissions can be transmitted through these reference channels as if directly through a wire. Phasing, pulse shaping, and Fourier expansion formation of geometric forms are then the key to be used in scalar interferometry through the internal scalar channels of the Soviet woodpecker signals.

By choosing one or more grid cells and using scalar interference there in the exothermic continuous mode, local heating and expansion of the air, and formation of a high-pressure area, occurs.

By choosing one or more grid cells and using scalar interference there in the endothermic continuous mode, local cooling and shrinking of the air, and formation of a low-pressure area, occurs.

By electromagnetic "rotation" of the interfering scalar beams, the hotspots and coldspots can be moved along a desired path and at a desired speed.

By these methods the entire jetstream across the U.S. can be deviated and controlled to a large degree. Moisture can be drawn from the Pacific beyond Southern California and Mexico, and collided over the southern U.S. with extremely cold air brought down from Canada, producing ice storms such as those in and around February 1, 1985.

Violent thunderstorm activity can be induced and directed. By adding "spin", these same storms can be induced to form extensive tornados.

By sustained weather engineering operations, drought or excessive rain and flooding can be induced in areas of the U.S. as desired. Crops can be destroyed or heavily damaged by severe and unseasonal weather.

If the grid is placed in the ground on scalar EM carriers instead of normal EM carriers (and the woodpecker "radars," can switch to, or add, scalar carrier mode whenever they wish), it can be used as an anti-submarine weapon, as we shall see later. It can also be used to cause substantial ocean effects that have drastic consequences on the world's weather - such as the anomalous El Nino of 1982-83.

By localizing one spot of heating at the top of a thunderstorm anvil, and another spot of cooling at its side, a localized downburst can be created. Our weather satellites have detected just such an anomalous combination heating and cooling of thunderstorm anvils over the U.S. While there may exist natural mechanisms to cause this anomalous dual pattern, it may also be caused by Soviet weather engineering, which can cause either broad-area or highly localized effects.

All these types of weather engineering incidents have been deliberately created over the U.S. by the Soviet Union.

Perhaps the greatest weather effects can be induced by altering some of the large-scale normal mechanisms that influence and control our weather. Thus the artificially induced El Nino of 1982-83 was a case in point, causing drastic weather upsets worldwide for a year or more.

Thelast decade has seen weather so anomalous that it could only occur once in 1200 years by chance. It has not been due to normal chance, but by Soviet weather engineering, particularly since the advent of the Woodpecker transmitter complexes.

ADDITIONAL BACKGROUND FOR THE BRIEFER:

The Woodpecker transmitters can carry scalar components, which, in addition to biological strikes, can be used for many other purposes such as to

1. Influence and control the weather,
2. Deviate the giant jetstreams of the upper atmosphere,
3. Detect, track and destroy missiles shortly after launch,
4. Detect, track and destroy strategic bombers and other aircraft,
5. Attack land and ocean surface targets by large aerial electromagnetic explosions: the EM explosion produces the fireball, the thermal effects, and the blast wave of a nuclear explosion without the nuclear radiation and radioactive fallout contamination;
6. Attack surface land and ocean targets by large "cold explosions", where living things freeze almost instantly, leaving the surface facilities and equipment intact,
7. Attack land and ocean surface targets by severe internal electromagnetic disruption, so that all electronics are dudded,
8. Attack personnel on land and sea by direct destruction of their nervous systems with an internally induced strong EMP,
9. Disrupt the operation of distant facilities, equipment, and personnel or destroy food crops in large areas by severe cold or severe heating, or even startling oscillation between the two.

In addition, the scalar aspects of the Woodpecker transmitters can be beamed through the earth and ocean as surface waves or at a given depth to intersect at a distant region. This mode can be used to

10. Cause distant earthquakes in a distant fault zone by depositing energy in the rocks there, increasing the plate stress until slippage occurs at a fault zone,

11. Cause large, anomalous rocking of an entire plate or large area, by depositing and extracting energy from alternate areas, causing buckling of the large rock plate,
12. Set up an interference grid under the water, so that underwater submarines can be detected, tracked, and destroyed on station and with their missiles still unfired,
13. Attack naval vessels and task forces through the water and through their hulls, without warning,
14. Attack missile silos and nuclear storage sites "before launch", directly through the earth itself,
15. Initiate the full nuclear explosion of implosion-type nuclear warheads on-board missiles on station,
16. Initiate full nuclear explosion of implosion-type nuclear warheads in storage sites and ready reserve,
17. Destroy seaborne and ocean-bottom-mounted mines and underwater sensors, even including entire "fields" of them,
18. Detect and destroy hostile torpedoes, ship-to-underwater anti-submarine missiles, and dumped anti-submarine munitions and charges,
19. "Pump" the electrical grounding of distant electrical power distribution and generation systems so that the system catastrophically fails,
20. "Pump" the electrical grounding of distant electrical power systems so that radio and television transmitters, power grids, and wiring complexes in buildings and facilities radiate a desired scalar wave component or signal complex at equipment and personnel.

All in all, the woodpecker transmitter complexes and other associated scalar EM weaponry are most useful in the major missions required in war.

LAUNCH PHASE ABM SYSTEM

- "BIG EYE" SCANS GRID SQUARES, DETECTS PENETRATION
- COMPUTER TRIGGERS MULTIPLE TRANSMITTERS
- PULSES PHASED SO EMP PULSE OCCURS IN DESIRED SQUARE
- PENETRANT IS DUDDED OR DESTROYED

Slide 065: Launch Phase ABM System

On this slide we show the use of the Woodpecker grid in the Launch Phase ABM system role.

The scalar components establish an interference grid over the U.S., at some altitude above the earth. One or more separate scalar interferometers transmit through scalar channels established in the Woodpecker's normal EM carriers, scanning through the grid square cells one by one in the "just barely extract energy" endothermic mode.

Back in the Soviet Union, the energy extracted passes through a scanned receiver biased just so that the normal energy extracted from the distant atmosphere does not show on a scanning screen. Any substantial amount of additional energy appearing in the cell - such as from the jet engines of a large aircraft or the rocket exhaust of a large missile - will be detected.

The operation of this weapon is four-fold: (1) the scanning interferometer or "big eye" scans the grid squares, detects penetration, and tracks the rising missile. (2) A separate scalar EM interferometer (a howitzer) is controlled by a computer and fired through a separate scalar EM channel opened in the ordinary EM woodpecker carriers. (3) Two timed scalar pulses are fired so that they converge and meet in the grid cell containing the rising missile. This results in the sudden emergence of a violent EMP pulse throughout the missile and the surrounding vicinity. (4) All missile and warhead electrical and electronic systems are instantly dudded and destroyed. In addition, fuels, propellants, and explosives of the missile are immediately ignited, explosively destroying the penetrating missile.

That takes care of the missile target. (The same weapon, of course, can be used against airborne strategic bombers - including Stealth-type bombers. In fact, Gary Powers' high flying aircraft was probably shot down in 1960 by a "jury-rigged" scalar EM howitzer using modified radars and timed scalar pulses to provide an aerial explosion and EMP.)

The Woodpecker grid/howitzer weapon system can be placed over the ocean and used against cruise missiles, naval surface-to-air and surface-to-surface missiles, submarine-launched ballistic and cruise missiles, etc. Placed over a carrier task force, it can also take care of the aircraft launched by the carrier as fast as they are launched. It can also handily take care of the missiles launched by guided-missile cruisers of the accompanying task force.

Now let's take a look at the command and fire control end of this weapon system, way back in the Soviet Union.

SOVIET COMMAND & CONTROL CONCEPT

CCCP
• MARK • READY • FIRE • KILL

Slide 066: Soviet Command & Control Concept

On this slide we show a postulated Soviet fire control system for the grid weapon.

Two or more operators sit at a control console, facing a giant display (screen). The display contains a grid, which represents the distant interference grid of the Woodpecker carriers (or scalar EM carriers, if in the underground or underwater mode). A distant missile launched into the real interference grid overhead will cause a spot of light to appear in the appropriate grid square (cell) on the operators' screen. The operators will track the displayed target, select firing mode and type of action, engage the target, and assess whether or not the distant target is killed or missed by the firing.

When a missile is launched in the distant area over which the Woodpecker grid has been placed, it quickly rises through one of the scanned grid cells on its upward journey. As it penetrates the cell, additional energy is extracted (since part of the missile's exhaust energy is now extracted also). At the screen in the Soviet Union, the additional energy received rises above bias, causing a "bloom" or spot of light to appear on the screen at the appropriate grid cell representation.

The distant operator has now detected the missile launch and its location. He places a marker over the target track and activates the computer, also inputting the type of firing or action to be performed. In this case, let us say he wishes a burst of energy to emerge inside the distant launched missile, and has activated that mode of firing action.

The computer computes the necessary parameters for another scalar interferometer channel in the exothermic mode, and for firing at the location of the rising missile so that two scalar pulses will meet in the cell penetrated by the rising missile on the other side of the earth. As the channel is opened, the firing solution settled, and the interferometer howitzer readied, the computer activates indicators on the console notifying the operator. When all is ready, a "ready-to-fire" light is lit on the console.

Upon receiving the command to fire and destroy the missile, the operator presses the fire button. The computer fires the activated scalar EM howitzer in the pulse mode. The operator continues to watch his screen.

When the pulses meet in the distant grid cell, a violent EMP suddenly arises in and throughout the missile and its surrounding vicinity. This explodes the missile propellants and warheads, destroying the target.

On the distant screen, a sudden drastic "blossoming" of the target results from the sudden extraction of a great deal of additional energy by the scanning scalar interferometer. The operator thus knows he has made a "kill."

Should for some reason the target be missed, additional energy will still be extracted by the scanning interferometer from the grid cell/vicinity in which the EMP suddenly emerges. The distant operator will still see a bloom on his scope, but not nearly so great as when the missile explodes. He thus knows that the EMP effect of the firing has occurred, but the target has been missed (he will see the bloom in its offset location as well). In that case, the operator can quickly mark the EMP location, hit the switch, and the computer will automatically correct and fire again.

At any rate, for a miss a large "sonic boom" or blast still results in the EMP emergence zone from sudden heating of the air. These are precisely the type of booms that were associated with three NASA shuttle launches prior to the end of 1985. These were actual testing of this weapon system, using the shuttle launches to provide a target, and delaying the burst some minutes so the shuttle would not actually be destroyed. On Nov. 26, 1985 a "marker beacon" (glowing ball of light) was also created over the site. This was probably to orient satellites and other detection systems. Some 12 minutes after that nighttime launch, a large blast occurred over the site, heard for hundreds of miles up and down the coast. Shortly after, the light suddenly moved away very rapidly - faster than a jet aircraft.

If many missiles are being launched, the operator marks them rapidly, one after the other, and the howitzer fires burst after burst at them, decimating the launched missiles, one after the other. In this fashion most of the counterstrike missiles launched by the U.S. would be destroyed shortly after launch, greatly reducing the number of missiles that make it to midcourse.

However, apparently the loss of the shuttle launched on Jan. 28, 1986 was caused by the addition of a metal-softening pattern in the exothermic mode, in and around the booster, using the actual booster ionic flames as a receiver-amplifier. This led to the failure of one of the supports and the partial breakaway of the right booster. The booster rotated into the tank, causing damage and the resulting explosion when the venting main fuel hit the booster flame.

By spread spectrum techniques and proper timing and phasing, one system of Woodpecker transmitters can set up multiple interference grids, in various parts of the world. The scanners and howitzers can operate in the appropriate zones, again by spread spectrum techniques and proper timing and phasing.

In fact, the latest versions probably can operate in the "ordinary EM carrier" (atmospheric) mode and the "scalar EM carrier" (underwater and in the earth) mode simultaneously - again by timed switching between EM and scalar EM carriers, spread spectrum techniques, and timing and phasing of howitzers and Manners.

Thus a single system can operate in the earth, underwater, and atmospheric modes. It can operate against the very wide range of different targets previously mentioned. It can do all this "simultaneously," from a real-time practical viewpoint.

LAUNCH PHASE ABM SYSTEM (ANTI-SLBM)
CCCP

Slide 067: Launch Phase ABM System (Anti-SLBM)

Here we show the operation of the system in the atmosphere over the ocean, to destroy sub-launched ballistic missiles such as Poseidon and Polaris. The system operation shown uses the normal EM Woodpecker carrier frequencies, with scalar components to establish the interference grid, and scalar channels for the scanners and howitzers. The grid can be set up by this method anywhere in the world.

As can be seen, during their early launch phase, this mode will take care of the missiles launched from underwater U.S., British, and French nuclear submarines.

Remember, this is just one mode in which the system is operating. It can at the same time have other interference grids at other locations, and even in other modes, including underwater grids used against the submarines themselves, it can be engaging a multitude of targets of a wide variety of types, essentially all simultaneously.

DETECTING & MARKING MISSILE LAUNCH

Slide 068: Detecting & Marking Missile Launch

Here we show the missiles launched from the underwater submarines, when just detected in the atmosphere over the ocean. As each rising missile is detected, an operator at the screen places a cursor (a "marker") over the detected track spot on the scope.

The computer quickly computes the firing parameters and indicates when the system is "ready to fire."

By using additional scalar scanner frequencies in the multi-gigaHertz range and fine scanning, the operator is able to accomplish non-cooperative target identification.

After the operator places a cursor over a target, the advanced system fine-scans and identifies it as hostile, then continues the track in automatic.

When the operator presses the fire button for a designated target, the computer intiates fire by the appropriate scalar EM howitzer through established grid scalar firing channels.

DESTROYING THE LAUNCHED MISSILES

Slide 069: Destroying the Launched Missiles

On this slide we temporarily omit the interference grid and diagrammatically show the operation of the scalar EM howitzer. As shown, two pulses are fired so that they meet in the grid cell where the rising missile is located. A drastic EM pulse suddenly emerges everywhere throughout the missile and its vicinity causing instant missile destruction.

Of course, individual howitzers not in the Woodpecker carrier's scalar channel can also fire at the missiles in the purely scalar exothermic mode. Or they can utilize the large "Tesla globe" in the continuous mode, the small Tesla "ball of light" in the continuous or pulsed mode, etc.

Also, continuous EM energy can be caused to emerge in a broader, "defocused" interference area causing electronic dudding of circuits in vehicles over a wider area. This is a very useful mode to use against mass attacks by many aircraft and/or many missiles at the same time. That is, the entire formation can be attacked in the "dud electronics" mode, and then followed up by more intense servicing of each individual hapless target.

Again, in 1960 Gary Powers was probably downed by a crude prototype scalar interferometer "howitzer" obtained by modifying two ordinary radars. At least the Soviets had previously been unable to down a penetrating U-2 with missiles they possessed. We know the scalar howitzers were in development, for Khrushchev had announced to the Presidium in January 1960 that a new "fantastic weapon" was in development. A development prototype was probably used to down Powers' aircraft.

SHIFT TO ANTI-SUB MODE
(UNDERWATER)
CCCP

Slide 070: Shift to Anti-Sub Mode

In the underwater mode portrayed on this slide, the Woodpecker transmitters have been switched to "scalar carriers" mode and the carrier beams transmitted through the ground and into the ocean underwater. (Remember, an artificial EM potential that does not couple to charged particles or ions will travel through the ocean, but a force field will not.)

Thus a giant scalar interference grid is now established underwater. Additional scalar beams in the weakly endothermic mode scan this grid. When a submarine enters the grid, it substantially changes the potential in that cell, and the scanner picks this up. The distant screen now displays the sub as a "track" of light in the appropriate grid square cell. The computer switches in fine-scanning and non-cooperative target identification. It identifies the target as hostile and alerts the operator (by blinking the track and changing its color to red, for example).

As before, the operator marks the target and enters the firing mode and type of action desired. Again, let us assume the "EMP burst" mode of destruction is to be used. The computer computes the firing parameters and readies the howitzer, When the commander gives the command to fire, the operator presses the firing button. The computer fires the howitzer.

Two scalar pulses proceed through the howitzer scalar channel and meet in the submarine. Throughout the sub and its vicinity, a violent EMP is suddenly experienced, knocking out the electrical systems, electronic equipment, and igniting propellants and explosives in the on-board missiles and armament. This explodes the submarine, missiles, and torpedoes instantly.

At the distant command console, the scanners detect the violent eruption of energy from the exploding submarine. It appears on the screen as a sudden strong blossoming of the track. The operator assesses that the target has been destroyed. He immediately engages another target if one is present.

If the EMP is off-course and misses, the scanners still pick up a smaller blossoming in the offset location. The operator immediately knows he has missed the target. He marks the offset bloom, presses the switch for "Correct!" and the computer makes the firing correction. When the operator again gets a Ready-to-Fire light illuminated, he presses the firing button and fires again at the target, this time with corrections applied.

Again, the same Woodpecker system - using timing, phasing, scalar/EM switching and spread-spectrum techniques - may be involved in several grids and many types of targets. When in a target-rich environment, the firing operators may be very busy indeed.

As we shall later see, the same weapon system may also be firing in the "cold explosion" or pused endothermic mode, where intense bursts of instant and severe freezing are unleashed in the target zone.

SHIFTING TO EARTHQUAKE MODE

Slide 071: Shifting to Earthquake Mode

The uses of the complex grid, scanners, and scalar howitzers is limited only by human ingenuity and state-of-the-art of the technology developed.

By shifting to the scalar-carrier mode and transmitting in the surface layer of the earth, the interference zone can be established in a distant region of the earth, beneath the earth's surface.

Suppose we establish a very small interference grid in the earth at and around a distant fault zone. Then by steadily depositing energy in the zone in the continous exothermic mode, the stress in the fault area is steadily and gradually increased. Eventually the plates on each side of the fault will slip, and a "natural appearing earthquake" occurs. If the energy is deposited slowly and gently, a gentler quake can usually be effected. If the energy is deposited fairly rapidly, a higher peak stress can usually be reached before the rocks slip, and a larger, more destructive earthquake results.

By making a wider grid in the earth in a larger area, a strange kind of earthquake can be induced, whether or not a fault zone exists in the area. By pouring energy out of alternate cells and extracting energy from the others, a "wave-like" buckling tensile and compressive stress is created throughout the zone. As this continues, the entire plate area will try to oscillate, moving and causing an anomalous sort of "rocking, flat earthquake" throughout a large area.

Not too many days after the destruction of the Challenger on January 28, 1986, such an anomalous "flat earthquake" occurred in the U.S., near the Great Lakes, involving some 10 states. This was probably the subsequent testing of an additional weapons mode of the same Soviet scalar EM system that destroyed the shuttle.

SUPPRESSION ATTACK - MARV'S (WITHOUT DEFENSES)

DELIVERED BY ONE VEHICLE
(MARV'S)
MULTIPLE MANEUVERABLE
RE-ENTRY VEHICLES
EACH MANEUVERS AND ATTACKS A DIFFERENT TARGET

Slide 072: Suppression Attack—MARVs (without defenses)

Now to shift the emphasis a bit, and look at the impact on some "normal" strategic systems and concepts.

On this slide we show the basic idea of suppression attack against an enemy's ground based missile force in fixed-site silos. The attack uses multiple maneuverable re-entry vehicles (MARVs) delivered by a single carrier missile, which acts as a "bus." The bus ejects the MARVs at the appropriate time, and each of the MARVs heads toward its predesignated target, maneuvering as it re-enters the atmosphere and proceeds to the target. The maneuver makes conventional intercept of the MARV by conventional anti-ballistic missiles more difficult.

In this manner, missile silos without defenses may be caught by surprise and destroyed.

The "bus" concept actually multiplies the number of targets a single launched missile can attack, and the maneuvering of the MARV increases the difficulty of defending the target area by orthodox means.

SUPPRESSION ATTACK – MARVs WITH DEFENSES

(OVERKILL CAPABILITY MAXIMIZES P_k)

Slide 073: Suppression Attack—MARVs (with defenses)

Now suppose some of the scalar EM defenses we have discussed are added to the picture.

On this slide we show a similar missile field, defended by a Tesla dome and by multiple scalar howitzers.
The howitzers take the incoming buses under attack during the early midcourse phase, by means of very large spherical EMP globes. Many of the buses - and their entire payloads, including the nuclear warheads themselves - are dudded by these midcourse defenses.

Servicing of dudded vehicles that have penetrated the globe now occurs farther along in midcourse. Each dud vehicle may be serviced, for example, with a small globe in the continuous mode for an appreciable number of seconds. This causes vaporization or fusing of the physical structures of the vehicles.

Groupings of incoming vehicles may also be serviced by medium-sized globe in the pulse mode. This assures dudding, and is especially useful for clearing away chaff and debris with smaller ballistic coefficients. It also is useful to further insure that the nuclear warheads themselves are totally dudded.

An additional wrinkle is to place scalar signal patterns - that affect and transmute a nuclear warhead's radioactive nuclei - onto a continuous globe. In short, by the proper scalar signals it is possible to transmute plutonium and uranium into harmless elements, and it can be done at a distance. The 4th and 5th generation Soviet scalar EM technology is probably capable of doing this

This insures that, not only are the incoming nuclear warheads electromagnetically inert, but they are also nuclearly inert and incapable of generating nuclear explosions.

Still another wrinkle - particularly useful against implosion-type weapons - is to utilize a scalar signal pattern that causes sudden generation of neutrons in the active material (plutonium or uranium). This harmlessly explodes the nuclear warheads while they are far away from their intended targets and out in space. The burst mode is probably the most useful for this tactic.

Note that, if desired, this same tactic - exploding the nuclear weapons themselves - can also be utilized in the Launch Phase ABM system grid against the missiles after launch. This capability converts an adversary's intended nuclear attack against you to an actual attack against himself!

Also note that the adapted grid system in the surface of the earth can be used to explode the nuclear warheads in ICBMs while they are still in the silos, or to explode nuclear warheads in storage. In the underwater mode, the nuclear warheads in the Poseidon and Polaris missiles on-board the nuclear submarines can be exploded in a similar manner. In fact, the nuclear reactor used to furnish the power for the nuclear submarines can also be exploded or disabled in this manner, as can land-based and ship-based reactors.

Again, this actually turns an adversary's own nuclear weapons against him. His own weapons can be used to obliterate him. Without scalar defenses, possessing the capability of nuclear attack becomes a serious detriment!

But back to our slide. Just in case something gets through this formidable defense somehow, the Tesla Shield (dome) provides the final reiteration that takes care of any residue "leakage."

The sum total of these defenses fully justifies the 1968 Soviet statement in Military Strategy that the USSR has achieved a 100% defense, and the West has

RESPONSE TO COUNTERFORCE STRIKE – WITH NO DEFENSE (FIRST STRIKE)

Slide 074: Response to Counterforce Strike with No Defenst

Here we show the orthodox concept of response to a surprise counterforce nuclear strike when the surprised force has no defenses.

A great percentage of the attacked missile silos are destroyed. The surprised side thus is able to mount only a limited strike in retaliation. Perhaps he is able to launch some remaining silo-based missiles that escaped destruction. He is also able to launch missiles from any of his underwater nuclear submarines that escaped. Some of his strategic bombers may have escaped destruction on the ground or while airborne on station; these surviving bombers can be directed to proceed with strategic reprisal against the enemy.

As can be appreciated, this entire concept is now totally obsoleted by the Soviet possession of scalar EM weapons.

The "mutual assured destruction" capability - or MAD concept as it was so aptly named! - is no longer mutual.

And for two reasons: (1) the Soviet surprise attack could destroy essentially all our Triad forces wherever they are, in the first attack. (2) Even if a very small number of our strategic forces survive, the puny strike we could attempt to launch could be repeatedly decimated from launch to terminal phase.

The restraint on the Soviets is not because of our Triad forces. The restraint is twofold: (1) a second nation has scalar EM weapons, and would undoubtedtly unleash them upon the Soviet Union with great violence if such a massive world-wide destruction of U.S. forces occurred or was threatened (is it really "accidental" that six major Soviet missile ammunition storage sites mysteriously exploded within seven months?); (2) the closed-loop scalar radiation exchange system of Earth-Sun could be inadvertently "tweaked" in the feedback loop from Earth to Sun, so that a large solar scalar resonance was stimulated. In that case the Sun could emit a mighty resonant "burp" that would simply wipe out all life on Earth in a fiery shower.

The "terror" in the "balance of terror" between nations has just increased by many, many orders of magnitude.

The biblical prophecy that the Earth will be wiped out by "fire and brimstone from heaven" is very near fulfillment now.

Put another way, the pucker factor - even on the Russians who may contemplate unleashing Armageddon - is higher than any Western strategic analyst has ever imagined, even in his wildest nightmares.

Truly these weapons are "more frightening than the mind of man has imagined," as Brezhnev put it in 1975.

The frightening scalar EM weapons can be used, but only very, very gingerly indeed. If a slight mistake is made, everybody loses everything.

RESPONSE TO COUNTERFORCE STRIKE – WITH DEFENSE

Slide 075: Response to Counterforce Strike with Defense

On this slide we show the impact of scalar defenses against an adversary who possesses only the orthodox nuclear weapons and delivery systems, and makes a "first strike" by surprise against his opponent.

In this case, the attacked opponent has scalar EM defenses.

With just the midcourse and terminal scalar EM howitzer defenses, almost all of the attacking missiles and re-entry vehicles are destroyed.

If for some reason (such as to prevent triggering the sun and destroying the world inadvertenly!) the attacked adversary does not wish to attack strategically with scalar EM weapons, he may now launch a massive retaliatory strike on his opponent.

And if that opponent has no ABM defenses, he's just bought the farm.

What a funny coincidence! Long ago, we crazy Americans chose to put all our eggs in the offensive basket. That is, we thought the Soviets cannot dare to strike us because we will have enough surviving missiles to penetrate any orthodox defense and destroy them in return. They would also have the same "mutual assured destructon (MAD)" capability, of course!

The MAD concept was aptly acronymmed - it was an insane idea from its inception. That is, the Soviets were not supposed to defend their cities and populace, and neither were we. That way, you see, we could destroy their citizenry at will, and they could destroy ours at will. We deliberately agreed to that, thinking - in our insanity - that the Soviets agreed also.

Of course the Soviets weren't playing the same lunatic's game at all. They simply fed our own garbage back to us, and we importantly thought we were negotiating something. Unknown to us, they were secretly building and deploying scalar EM defenses even then. Since we didn't know of any other defense, we assumed the Soviets could not defend their citizenry with ABMs any better than we could defend ours with ABMs. So we blithely scrapped our ABMs.

The high government officials of the United States of America grossly violated our constitution and their sworn oaths of office. Our constitution specifically charges the government of the United States to defend the people of the United States. That means our officials are specifically charged with defending our people. Yet they deliberately agreed not to do so, and they deliberately sacrificed us in advance.

They committed treason of the highest kind, by deliberately surrendering us to total destruction anytime the big balloon goes up.

The constitution doesn't charge the government with surrendering our citizens to destruction under any circumstances. It charges the government with defending us against destruction.

Ronald Reagan is the first U.S. president in some time to see through the MAD concept. At least he stands forthrightly for defense. It's just a shame that the government and scientific leaders under him aren't aware of the Soviet scalar weapon developments, so they could brief him on these startling developments.

Be sure you understand what the government leaders before Reagan have been saving. For years, our official policy has effectively said to the Russians: "We will allow each side a token defense only. We deliberately will not defend ourselves, so that anytime you decide to strike us you can destroy us. In return, however, we do not think you will want to strike us, for we believe that - before we become ashes from that strike - we can get enough away at you, to destroy you as well. Of course we believe you are in the same sort of boat."

Then we said, "There! That's settled! What a relief! Nobody can strike anybody anymore. Now can we talk about partial disarmament and on-site inspection?" The Soviets just kept their astonished amusement to themselves and kept building scalar defenses (and scalar offenses as well!). Their deception plan called for imbedding the scalar EM weapons in ordinary systems when possible, and hiding the scalar EM weapons tests in ordinary weapons tests when possible. Of course they had to be adamant in their opposition to on-site inspection; after all, even Western scientists, if allowed on site with the dual-mode weapons, might suspect something was different and possibly things were amiss.

The Soviet deception has worked like a charm. The U.S. MADmen who created and implemented the MAD doctrine have succeeded in prejudicing two generations of academicians and elected U.S. leaders against the need for effective defense. A vast wasteland of inane paper studies - learnedly dealing with ABM's, penetration tactics, leakage, force and counterforce, radar blackout, electronic warfare, etc. etc. - has been churned out by our military, industrial, and university "think tanks" to clog the minds, efforts, and literature of our defense and governmental establishments.

Our homeland has no effective ABM defense (and very little defense against aircraft or subsonic cruise missiles).

Our field army has no effective ABM defense (or air defense). Our naval forces have no effective ABM defense (although they are better defended against air attack than the field army). Yet ballistic missiles - and to some extent cruise missiles - have supposedly been our greatest threat for decades, followed closely by the secondary threat of massed aircraft attack.

A cynic might take the stand that, if our Defense Department hasn't been allowed to defend us (with deployed weapon systems, not by "paper studies") against what we ourselves have proclaimed is our biggest threat, then why is it called the Defense Department? Why not call it the No-defense Department'?

Understand, a great many fine, hard-working people in DoD have certainly tried to get adequate defenses developed and deployed. The sheer weight of the bureaucracy and its mind-numbing entanglements has prevented it.

But it's even worse. Our bureaucrats - both in government and in "big, organized science" - have been so caught up in the "Russians are really just ignorant peasants" syndrome and the "not-invented-here" (NIH) syndrome that they've not recognized the greatest scientific and technical breakthrough in history. Such a breakthrough - far greater in importance that the nuclear bomb has been made, developed, and deployed by the Soviet Union, all in secrecy and behind the smokescreen of a masterful deception plan.

We've totally missed the most incredible "secret superweapons" development program of all times, and the worldwide testing of the weapons themselves.

Hiroshima and Nagasaki should serve as object lessons in the price of ignorance of such technological breakthroughs.

History does repeat itself. But this time it's not we Americans who got the growl new superweapon first.

CLEAR COMMUNICATIONS

STANDARD COMPLETE JAMMING
CLEAR SCALAR COMMUNICATIONS

Slide 076: Clear Communications

Now let us rapidly give some unique capabilities that one can do with scalar EM in smaller things. Not only can scalar EM weapons be used in the big "continent burning" strategic weapons, but they can also be used for a variety of smaller defense tasks.

For example, one can establish a zero reference anywhere one wishes in an ordinary carrier. Inside that zero, one can establish as many independent "carriers" as one wishes, and hide them completely from ordinary detectors.

The way to do that is easy. Take as complex a signal as you wish. Subtract it from zero. That gives a "complement" which, when summed with the original signal, will produce the zero. Then only a scalar detector can go inside the zero and pullout the individual components.

So take a carrier wave. Let the enemy jam it completely, with gobs of power.

Your scalar communication channel stays serenely there, calm and unjammed. The enemy thinks you're jammed and can't communicate. Meanwhile, you continue to communicate just fine.

Or be real smart. Take one of those components inside the first zero. Pick a zero reference inside it. Hide still more carrier components inside the second zero. Do this as many times as you wish.

You can put all the telephone calls in the United States of America on one carrier. And you can keep them clear, right through total jamming.

UNIQUE COMMUNICATIONS
2-WAY HIGH DATA RATE SOVIET

Slide 077: Unique Communications

But that's still not all.

You can also communicate with your submarines underwater. High data rate. Chat away as you wish. You can scramble, frequency hop, encrypt, the works. They can also communicate back to you.

Remember. EM force fields of any appreciable frequency won't travel through the water. Natural EM potentials grab charged particles and ions, so they won't travel through the ocean either. But artificial potentials don't grab onto charged particles or ions, and they will go through the ocean quite nicely.

Everything - aircraft, ships, shore installations, submarines, etc. - can communicate like gangbusters if they possess scalar EM technology.

In fact, you can even build scalar EM underwater radar if you wish.

The airborne scalar EM radar can see under the ocean with a little adjustment. perhaps as well as a conventional side-looking radar sees distant targets today, The airborne scalar EM radar can detect and track the underwater submarine while tooling along.

In fact, the airborne scalar EM radar can then destroy the sub, by using a little scalar interferometry. And it's even possible to do scalar interferometry with a single transmitter! How, is proprietary to a friend.

In fact, you can even use your enemy's jamming transmission as a "wire" along which to establish your scalar EM channels. You can use these scalar channels In the "weakly endothermic mode" to locate his transmitter and "lock-in" on it. You can "walk" the lock-in right past his encryption function to the "clear" Input, and receive and record that in the clear. All this from a distance.

You can then destroy his equipment if you wish, or just continue to monitor him in the clear if it's important to do so. Perhaps now we can understand what the decades-long weak microwave radiation of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow is all about. Or why the Soviets are building a nice new Embassy, bristling with antennas, on the high ground in Washington, D.C.

MINE COUNTERMEASURES – ORTHODOX SYSTEM

MINE HUNTER
SONAR
SUBMERSIBLE
TV CAMERA CHARGE

Slide 078: Mine Countermeasures—Orthodox System

Take something like mine countermeasures, for example. Finding and destroying mines - particularly those placed on the bottom in relatively shallow areas such as ports and rivers - is a really tough problem.

Presently it's often done as portrayed on this slide.

Here a minehunter ship uses an underwater sonar to locate the mine, or what resembles a mine. Then it directs a submersible robot vehicle to proceed over to the object and examine it with an underwater television camera. If it's a mine, the submersible places a remotely operated charge beside it, then chugs away. When it reaches a safe distance away, the charge is exploded, causing the mine to detonate.

A very painful process. Very time consuming, and very difficult.

MINE COUNTERMEASURES – SCALAR EM SYSTEMS

MINE HUNTER
SCALAR ACQUISITION SYSTEM

Slide 079: Mine Countermeasures—Scalar EM Systems

Now try the same thing while using scalar EM underwater systems. The scalar EM acquisition system is really a sophisticated scalar radar. It scans a large area rapidly, locating moored mines, bottom-planted mines, and drifting mines.

The acquisition system is also a scanned "underwater eye." The operator in the surface vessel can tell whether or not it's a mine he's located.

Once the target mine is detected, a computer computes the firing parameters for a scalar interferometry pulse to hit it and destroy it. The operator fires the pulse, destroying the mine.

The same system that detects the mine at a distance identifies and destroys it at a distance. In this way large areas can be quickly scanned and swept clean of mines.

If a suspicious object is detected and one is still not quite sure it's a mine, shoot it anyway! If it's a mine, it explodes. If it's just a rock, nothing happens. So the same system can do "discrimination by fire."

The same system is useful to destroy midget submarines, bottom crawlers, etc.

It can also wipe out whole arrays of underwater sensors by electromagnetically dudding them.

It can take on a sub if it has to! Here it would just gently kindle EM energy inside the sub's controls, causing it to lose control of all its systems. The sub would then sink to crush depth and implode. The scalar EM mine sweeping system could, of course, simply "blow" the sub, but might itself get caught in the resulting explosion.

SCALAR ANTI-PERSONNEL WEAPON

Slide 080: Scalar Anti-Personnel Weapon

From a military viewpoint, these scalar EM weapons are really quite all-around weapons.

For example, they are very lethal against personnel.

Set in the "high intensity pulse mode," one blast and a person's nervous system is destroyed instantly. Total, instantaneous death results. One can blast away at entire groups of infantrymen, for example. It's the peak power that's important, not the average power. So the weapon doesn't require too much battery power.

Set on a lower intensity pulse mode, one zap can simply knock out a person, rendering him instantly unconscious.

Quite useful if one needs prisoners to interrogate. Also very silent, which is useful in operations employing stealth and surprise.

AFGHANISTAN
INSTANT DEATH
DEPLOYED ROCKET WITH DECOY GAS CHEMICALS
BODIES DO NOT DECAY FOR MORE THAN 30 DAYS

Slide 081: Afghanistan

The Soviets are employing just such a scalar "death ray" weapon in Afghanistan, apparently in the noses of some of their HIND helicopters.

These choppers usually fire gas rockets to camouflage the testing of the tactical scalar death ray. For example, they may fire rockets filled with nerve gas, and some persons will die convulsively from the chemical.

Those hit by the scalar EM weapon, however, have a most peculiar death mode,

Death comes instantly and totally. There is no convulsion, no response. The entire nervous system is destroyed instantly. Every living cell in the body is killed instantly, including all bacteria, germs, etc.

A body hit with this thing falls like a limp rag and lies where it falls. It doesn't decay in even 30-45 days. In a macabre fashion, it's been reduced to something like food irradiated with nuclear radiation; everything is killed, so the material is preserved for an extended period before any decay can set in.

Western military authorities have speculated that this strange death is due to some sort of eery new gas.

However, even with the most virulent gas, some seconds are required for a body to die. And while it's dying it goes into convulsions. Violent convulsions.

This eery, instant death that leaves a non-decaying corpse is not due to a gun, This is the signature of a high-powered pulse kill using a scalar EM weapon

The associated gas rockets are the disguise used to fool our intelligence analysts.

They're just part of the Soviet deception plan.

SCALAR ANTI-TANK WEAPON

ARMOR HAS NO EFFECT

Slide 082: Scalar Anti-Tank Weapon

Such weapons are also effective against armored vehicles, for example.

They can be carried by personnel, mounted on vehicles, mounted in helicopters, etc.

They are truly all-purpose weapons.

An infantryman with a bazooka-sized scalar EM pulse weapon can easily knock out a tank with one shot. The armor has no effect; scalar EM goes right through conductive shielding and Faraday cages.

And with the same weapon he can knock out another tank, and another, and another...

SCALAR ANTI-AIRCRAFT WEAPON

Slide 083: Scalar Anti-Aircraft Weapon

And, if a helicopter or a fixed-wing aircraft attacks him, he can bring the same weapon to bear on it.

He can knock down a chopper or a jet. With one shot.

And another. And another.

Also, it's a line-of-sight weapon. He doesn't have to compute lead angle and all that jazz. Just aim, get the target in his sights, and pull the trigger.

Slide 084: Scalar Anti-Aircraft Weapon

Another neat trick you can do with scalar EM is make an aircraft invisible to ordinary radar.

Just use multiple transmitters on the airplane to establish a spherical interference shell, in the bandwidth of the threatening radar, around the aircraft.

When the signal pulse (or continuous wave) from the ground-based radar strikes the "energy bottle" in the shell, it interferes with it and is diffracted, scattered, and partially absorbed.

The ground-based radar doesn't get any coherent return pulse or return signal reflected from the target.

Radars don't track aircraft; they track the reflection of their own signal bouncing off aircraft. No reflected signal, no aircraft - as far as a radar is concerned.

To shield against a passive radar (one which tracks emissions from the aircraft), just detect and complement your own emissions so that "near zeroes" result In the spectrum of interest.

Or do both, to protect against both.

It's even possible to cool the exhaust and heated surfaces of the aircraft by a scalar EM adaptation of electrostatic cooling. Theoretically it's even possible to cause the aircraft to "disappear" optically. Takes a bit of doing, but it's possible The basic scheme here is that, when a photon hits the target from a given direction, it's absorbed totally, and a corresponding or "matching" photon is emitted from the opposite side in the same direction the original photon was going. In that fashion, the light emitted from the target from one direction seems to have "passed through it" from the other direction.

Since that's what empty space does, then what a distant observer sees is "empty space," so far as he can tell.

Of course you can do the same thing for re-entry vehicles.

Use some multiple antennas on a vehicle. Or better yet, use satellite RV's to carry the extra transmitters necessary for scalar interferometry.

Deploy the interferometer RV's and activate the scalar EM transmitters. Place an energy bottle Fourier expansion interference shell around the ensemble in the bandwidth of interest.

Radars in that bandwidth now will be unable to detect the incoming ensemble. If nothing detects the threat, nothing is going to shoot at it or react to it.

This can also be used on a bus vehicle during midcourse, for example.

UNIQUE CAPABILITIES: ATM/AD/AARTY

Slide 086: Unique Capabilities: ATM/AD/AARTY

But the uniqueness of scalar EM devices and weapons doesn't end there.

You can hit lots of other threats that are presently difficult or impossible to effectively handle.

For example, on the tactical battlefield, the same scalar EM radar interferometer system can defend against tactical missiles (ATM role), aircraft (AD role), cruise missiles (ACM role), and even artillery and mortar shells (AARTY role).

How the devil, you might ask, can it defend against artillery and mortar shells?

Simple. Sweep the artillery or mortar barrage with closely spaced pulses. Sorta like a machinegun. Or more like a phased-array radar.

If the peak power in the sweeping pulses is sufficient, the explosives are sparked and detonated. Fuses are destroyed.

So even mortar and artillery rounds can be destroyed, by the same system providing air defense and anti-tactical missile defense.

HE EXPLODES

Slide 087: Unique Capabilities

That's still not all.

An incredible number of different types of targets can be attacked with scalar EM weapons.

For example, aircraft equipped with scalar EM weapons can attack targets such as loaded artillery pieces. The round in the chamber explodes, destroying the weapon.

It can also attack nearby stored ammunition. Again, the high explosive in the ammunition explodes, destroying the store.

Even underground missiles can be attacked. The scalar pulse will go right through the overhead cover and dud the electronics, including the nuclear warhead. It will also detonate the HE in the warhead and detonate the fuels and propellants.

A great variety of other targets can also be attacked, as we shall see.

Slide 088: Unique Capabilities

For example, suppose one attacks a tank.

With scalar EM pulse, the personnel die instantly. Total personnel kill is achieved.

All electronic systems of the tank are dudded. Total systems kill is achieved.

The ammunition in the tank explodes. Total kill is achieved.

The fuel explodes. This is another total kill mechanism.

That tank has been killed totally, by a variety of mechanisms, all simultaneously.

That's a k-kill in any analyst's book.

And don't worry about retrieval and repair. That tank is finished permanently.

Even the most modern tank is just as vulnerable as the most obsolete.

UNIQUE CAPABILITIES

ELECTRICAL SYSTEMS DUDDED PILOT DIES INSTANTLY ENGINE FLAMEOUT
FUEL EXPLODES
ELECTRONICS DUDDED

Slide 089: Unique Capabilities

Suppose one attacks a fighter-bomber aircraft.

Again, the kill is catastrophic from multiple simultaneous kill mechanisms.

The pilot and crew die instantly. Total destruction of their nervous systems.

The electrical systems are dudded.

The electronics in all avionics and ordnance is dudded.

The fuel explodes.

HE in on-board or out-board ordnance explodes.

The jet engine flames out if the pulse is powerful enough.

That aircraft is finished. Permanently.

And it's point-and-shoot, line-of-sight.

Even the most modern aircraft is just as vulnerable as the most obsolete.

POWER

Slide 090: Unique Capabilities: Penetrate Shielding

Shielding is ineffective.

The scalar pulse (or continuous wave) can go anywhere gravity can go.

It penetrates the steel hull of tanks and armored vehicles.

It penetrates underground shelters and bunkers.

It penetrates pillboxes and fortifications.

Foxholes are no protection. Just shoot through the earth into them.

There is no longer any place to hide.

MULTI-PURPOSE WEAPONRY

AMMO DUMP
GASOLINE DUMP
RADIOS AND COMMO GEAR
RADAR

Slide 091: Multi-Purpose Weaponry

These scalar EM weapons are all-purpose. Things such as ammunition dumps, radar systems, radios and communication gear, communications centers, gasoline dumps, etc. can easily be destroyed.

Not only that, but the weapons can be swept, giving area coverage.

You can hit both point targets and area targets.

MULTI-PURPOSE WEAPONRY

Slide 092: Multi-Purpose Weaponry

Look at what a weapon a helicopter becomes.

The same vehicle, equipped with scalar EM weapons, can engage and destroy jet aircraft, other helicopters, cruise missiles, personnel, and armored vehicles.

It can also hit all the other targets we've been talking about. Any vehicle equipped with scalar EM weapons becomes a formidable destroyer on the battlefield.

And "reconnaissance by fire" takes on a particularly lethal meaning.

For example, don't worry about the enemy in cover and concealment, or highly camouflaged.

Don't worry about decoys or dummy positions.

Just sweep the area with scalar EM fire. The actual targets will be discriminated by fire and destroyed.

MULTI-PURPOSE WEAPONRY

ATTACKS MOST TARGETS

Slide 093: Multi-Purpose Weaponry

As can be seen on this slide, most targets of interest can be attacked.

A single aircraft can sink an aircraft carrier or destroy a battle cruiser from afar.

It can also destroy aircraft, ground installations, artillery, personnel, nuclear weapons storage sites, tanks, vehicles, fuels, and combustibles.

UNIQUE CAPABILITIES: HEAT EXTRACTION

- IN A ZONE, INSULATION HAS NO EFFECT.
- EXTERNAL HEATING HAS NO EFFECT.

Slide 094: Unique Capabilities: Heat Extraction

Or one can get truly exotic.

To prevent destroying equipment and installations, the endothermic mode can be utilized.

Cold explosions can be used to freeze tanks, personnel, and equipment.

The equipment and tanks thaw out.

The personnel thaw out too, but they are dead when they do. Heaters and arctic clothing are no protection.

UNIQUE CAPABILITIES: COLD EXPLOSIONS

50 MILES
50 MILES
50 MILES
NEUTRALIZATION
WITHIN SECONDS

Slide 095: Unique Capabilities: Cold Explosions

For example, suppose three cold explosions, each 50 miles in diameter, are placed upon the front-line strength of NATO.

In seconds there is no longer any "front line strength" of NATO. Every living thing is frozen into a block of ice.

A few more of these things placed on selected rear area installations, and the battle is over before it gets started. Say in about one minute flat!

Suppose NATO is quickly defeated - say in two days. And then the Russians offer us a "Dunkirk." They agree to allow us to evacuate the beaten remnant of our forces.

Are we going to evoke a strategic nuclear exchange, or are we effectively "decoupled" from Europe? Particularly if the Soviets also offer sweeping accommodations to the Europeans, and they accept? If we punch the strategic button, we guarantee our own absolute destruction. (MAD doctrine and all that, old chap!)

Whether or not we could do anything to the Russians is a matter of conjecture.

For a demonstration, they could even invite us to launch a couple of missiles, and destroy them over our heads shortly after launch.

And they could take out a few submarines under the ocean, just to make it believable.

And destroy some SAC bombers that are orbiting on station.

Or take out a U.S. Naval Task Force, with a nuclear carrier, as a demonstration that they mean business.

Would a sane President go ahead and destroy us, or accept the Soviet's "Monroe Doctrine" and an "armistice"?

If the Soviets thought he was seriously contemplating ordering a nuclear strike, they could immediately destroy all our nuclear armaments where they sit. Our own weapons would obliterate us!

What would Congress do - after the Soviet Union had demonstrated its absolute power, offered a Dunkirk and armistice, and threatened our total destruction if we "reached for the holster," so to speak - when it realized the President might actually be contemplating evoking assured national suicide?

What would you do if you were a Congressman? If you were the President?

THE TRANSMITTER IS THE MAJOR WEAPON

Slide 096: The Transmitter is the Major Weapon

As shown on this slide, with scalar EM the transmitter becomes the major weapon on the battlefield.

Almost every type of target of any importance can be easily and effectively attacked and destroyed or nullified by scalar EM weapons.

Small wonder the Soviets do not discard their thousands of "old" radars!

How effective do you suppose some of their "old" transmitters on their "old" aircraft might be?

What chance do you think SAC bombers would have against thousands of "old" radar-directed gun sites and "obsolete" air defense missile sites?

Could it be that even something like the old SA-1 could be startlingly effective?

But what of our advanced concepts, such as the strategic defense initiative?

Here we show some of the expensive and complex components of that powerful system.

We have ground-based radars, endoatmospheric interceptors, exoatmospheric interceptors, airborne sensors, space-based sensors, chemically propelled interceptors, electromagnetic railguns, particle beam weapons, high energy lasers, etc. all tied together by a massive command and control system. This massive, expensive system is designed to detect and destroy missiles, including ICBMs, IRBMs, cruise missiles, SLBNs, etc.

*The s*ystem detects the missile launches and engages them from launch on in to the terminal phase.

Massive systems. Electromagnetic marvels. Nuclear-pumped lasers of staggering power. Perhaps even x-ray and gamma ray lasers. Directed energy RF weapons. Stupendous railguns. Sensors everywhere. Giant webs of communications. Banks of computers and control systems.

And it's totally vulnerable to scalar EM interferometer weapons. Giant scalar EM "radars" can simply sweep through all that like a scythe through standing hay.

As it stands, it's obsolete before its design is even finished.

It's obsolete to Soviet scalar EM weapons that are already deployed and operationally tested in place!

Without scalar EM weapons and defenses, all our present weapons and concepts are deadly vulnerable.

The war is over before it hardly gets started. It's not a war; it's more like a clay pigeon shoot.

Understand, if orthodox science was all the Russians possessed, the Strategic Defense Initiative would be the way to go.

But they do possess something else, and presently they have all the trump cards in the deck.

Slide 098: Comparison of EM Concepts (Chart)

On this slide and the three that follow, we show a comparison of some of the major characteristics of the three kinds of electromagnetics.

We compare the classical, the quantum mechanical, and the scalar EM (electrogravitational) views of electromagnetics

Notice the differences between the three in regards to vacuum spacetime, virtual substructure, force, whether or not force exists in vacuum, the effect of zero force fields, potentials, and what is to be regarded as causative agents.

Slide 101: Summary (1)

Now we examine the three views for whether or not electro-gravitational waves exist and what they interact with, the number of required spacetime dimensions the type of geometry, the nature of a zero-summed EM vector, local and distant relativity aspects, and whether or not the probability states propagated by the Schroedinger equation can be deterministically engineered.

As can be seen from the last four slides, the three views are quite different, and the scalar EM view is drastically different.

Slide 102: Summary (1)

In summary, we can now state unequivocally that the Aharonov-Bohm effect has been conclusively proven, at least for the mesoscopic scale over a few thousand Angstroms, and possibly over a few centimeters.

But in these experimental proofs; the "natural" type of potential has been used, it is basically incoherent in its substructure, dooming the effect to stay small.

By utilizing macroscopic EM force fields and waves to zero-sum and comprise artificial potentials, the coherence can be maintained over a macroscopic distance - even for hundreds of thousands of kilometers.

The weapons implications - only some of which we have set forth in this treatise - are mindboggling.

Slide 103: Summary (2)

Zero-vector (scalar) EM systems are the key to scalar EM waves, which are actually electrogravitational waves.
Scalar wave detectors nave been developed and are being improved. Further improvement is needed. This development is limited only by funds.

The initial theory has been begun. More work is needed. Again, this development is limited only by funds.

Preliminary experiments support the scalar EM concepts.

Equipment can be designed and made to work electro-gravitationally.

And it has been.

Slide 104: Summary (3)

Interference phenomena are key.

One can get action at a distance - even over hundreds of thousands of kilometers.

One can engineer gravitational and inertial effects.

One can engineer the nucleus, including transmute it, easily and cheaply. One could clean up all the nuclear wastes.

Electromagnetic energy can be produced at a distant target, or extracted from a distant target.

This is is not energy transmission through space in the form of EM force fields. Instead, it is transmission through spacetime in the form of electrogravitational potentials.

Conventional EM shielding is ineffective against scalar EM.

Slide 105: Summary (4)

Almost every weapon system we presently have - or are developing - is totally vulnerable to scalar EM weaponry.

This includes personnel, electronics (including fuzing and warhead), explosives, propellants, fuels, ordnance, ships, submarines, torpedoes, aircraft, helicopters, missiles, drones, rockets, tanks, armored vehicles, weapons carriers, self-propelled and towed artillery, communications, satellites, radars, command and control, directed energy weapon systems, surveillance and sensor systems, mines, artillery rounds and ammunition, nuclear warheads, etc.

We are in dire straits. We need a "Manhattan Project" of the highest priority. Now!

The Soviets have already had the equivalent of seven or eight Manhattan Projects in this area.

SOVIET DEFENSE AGAINST MISSILES

"In our country the problem of eliminating rockets in flight has been successfully solved by Soviet science and technology...

It is interesting to note that the problem of anti-missile defense is far from being solved in the West."

SOKOLOVSKIY
MILITARY STRATEGY
THIRD EDITION, 1968

Slide 106: Soviet Defense Against Missiles

Here is a significant statement by Sokolovskiy, contained in Military Strategy, 3rd edition, 1968.

This is not propaganda. The Soviets really do have an effective missile defense. We do not. At the present rate we're going, we may not have one in the year 2000 - if we live that long.

SURPRISE BY USING SECRET WEAPONS

"Each side secretly develops new means of warfare in order to employ them unexpectedly. History knows many examples how the employment of a new weapon initially gave considerable success because the enemy, caught unawares and not knowing the combat capabilities of this weapon, was for some time incapable of effective counteraction."

Slide 107: Surprise by Using Secret Weapons

The Soviets took to heart the lesson of our secret development of the atomic bomb. Thrust suddenly upon a fanatical nation, the atomic bomb brought the empire of Japan to its knees.

Other lesser examples - such as the impact of the German V-l and V-2 missiles and jet fighter - also were not lost on the Soviets.

SOMETHING RUSSIA DOESN'T WANT THE U.S. TO KNOW

"Of particular importance is basic research aimed at discovering still unknown attributes of matter, phenomena, and the laws of nature, and developing new methods for their study and use to reinforce the state's defense capability."

COMMENTS:

¤ PORTION OF A BOOK BY MARSHALL GRECHKO

¤ DELETED FROM ENGLISH TRANSLATION, BY SPECIFIC REQUEST OF THE U.S.S.R.

Slide 108: Something Russia Doesn't Want the U.S. to Know

But Marshall Grechko said it even plainer.

He made it clear that the Soviet Union has actively searched for great technical breakthrough areas, particularly in discovering new laws of nature, unknown attributes of matter, and new phenomena, and developing their use for defense.

He made it so clear that the Soviet Union formally requested the U.S. State Department to have deleted from its. English translation that portion of his book.

That is a positive signature that the statement is exceedingly sensitive to the Soviets. In other words, it's a real tipoff.

So of course the State Department leaned on the publisher and got that section eliminated.

In this article Tesla spoke of using standing waves to produce distant effects and locate objects such as ships. At this point he was thinking of a scalar radar locator, something more advanced than even our radar today. It was also capable of producing electrical effects at any part of the globe. To quote: "Stationary waves... mean something more than telegraphy without wires to any distance... For instance, by their use we may produce at will, from a sending station, an electrical effect in any particular region of the globe; we may determine the relative position or course of a moving object, such as a vessel at sea, the distance traversed by the same, or its speed..."

Dr. Popp has discovered, both theoretically and experimentally, that mitogenetic radiation from cells can be seen as a sort of "waste" from a virtual electromagnetic field with a high coherence. This field has a tendency to become stationary over the whole organism. In addition, it includes the storage of "virtual" coherent photons. (In other words, there is a master EM field with high coherence, stationary over the whole body. This is the cells' master control system. Storage of virtual photons -- i.e., scalar signals -- occurs in this field.).

19. For information on self-induced transparency with pulsated light, see E. L. Hahn, Scientific American, June 1967. This is a scalar EM effect. The phenomenon is observed only in insulators, not in conducting materials. A dielectric tends to stop the flow of electrons, thus stopping the bleed-off of the Kaluza-Klein 5-potential as EM force fields. Thus through the insulator or dielectric, an electrogravitational pulse is transmitted. When this pulse emerges from the other side of the dielectric, then electrons are free to move again and form ordinary EM fields, resulting in resumed EM bleed-off of the KK (Kaluza-Klein) 5-potential. Thus ordinary photons strike the dielectric, changing into electrogravitational waves which transit the opaque dielectric, and these EG waves transform back to EM waves on the far side of the dielectric. Advanced scalar EM application of this effect can make an object optically invisible.

20. For a lucid and profound presentation of the entire subject of elementary particle physics and quantum field theory, see T. D. Lee, Particle physics and introduction to field theory, Harwood Academic Publishers, New York, 1967. Subjects covered include those at the forefront of current research. Chapter 16, "Vacuum as the source of asymmetry," is particularly important. Here Lee concisely covers the idea of degenerate vacuum states, vacuum structuring, and vacuum effects causing symmetry breaking (violation of conservation laws). An excellent coverage of asymmetries and observables is given on p.181-188. For example, whenever symmetry is spontaneously broken, a nonobservable (virtual entity) has become observable. Thus there exist mechanisms for the direct translation between virtual and observable states.

Most engineers are unaware that physics has already rigorously proven (both theoretically and experimentally} that conservation of energy can be physically violated, even by excitation of the vacuum.

However, in the present assumption of a randomized virtual microstructure of a vacuum potential, these broken symmetry effects are individually confined to very small microlevels. For example, on p. 383, Lee points out that the microscopic structure of the scalar vacuum field (i.e., of vacuum charge or "potential") is not utilized.

This of course is reasonable if all vacuum potentials used in particle physics are treated as having a randomized microstructure of virtual particle flux vectors. Since any appreciable directional coherence in such a randomized microstructure could persist only over extremely tiny distances, then the microstructure of vacuum degenerate states has negligible local effects in ordinary macroscopic systems.

In other words, these conservation violation effects would be very difficult to coherently capture and utilize to provide "free energy, emerging from the vacuum."

The randomized momentary coherences, however, are responsible for the violent microfluctuations of the EM fields, well-known in classical electrodynamics. An approach such as taken by Yater or Moray would be necessary to achieve a vacuum energy tap under such conditions. To achieve usable macroeffects, a very large collection of charge or magnetic material, etc. would be required before the probability of usable coherences would become sufficiently large. Therefore this area is neglected in practical physics and engineering.

However, this is precisely where scalar EM is lost in conventional theory and engineering practice. In scalar EM, the coupling together of macroscopic EM force field vectors into a summed zero system means that the vacuum potential's microstructure is now macroscopically ordered by that system. Further, it is sustained during translation through space. In such case, one has produced directional gravitational potential gradients that have macroscopic range and form. Further, by coherently varying the amplitude of the individual components of the zero vector system, a gravitational wave -- a controlled oscillation of the degenerate states or vacuum -- is produced. By processing the EM components, this gravitational wave can be narrowed, formed into a beam, and projected. Two such beams can be interfered, even at a great distance, producing G-interference and causing EM effects to emerge in the distant interference zone. Thus scalar EM profoundly affects quantum mechanics, quantum field theory, particle physics, general relativity, and electromagnetics.

21. For some strong and pertinent critique of present scientific bias, see Ruggero Maria Santilli, Ethical probe on Einstein's followers in the U.S.A.: An insider's view, Alpha Publishing, POB 82, Newtonvllle, MA 02160. Santilli is a highly published physicist and the editor of a refereed scientific journal, the Hadronic Journal. After lengthy attempts to correct injustices within the Scientific system, to no avail, he finally has gone public with his specific charges. Santilli references senior Russian physicist G. Yu. Bogoslovsky, whose 1984 paper "Generalization of Einstein's relativity theory for the anisotropic spacetime," whose research would have been impossible in the U.S. Quoting Santilli: "He would have been discredited, humiliated, and chased out of these institutions [Harvard, M.I.T., and Yale] beyond any reasonable doubt by ample documentation on similar cases." Again to quote Santilli: "Papers bearing the title of 'Generalization of Einstein's relativity' are routinely permitted with human dignity at Moscow University in the U.S.S.R., but they are absolutely inconceivable today at the departments of physics of Harvard University, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, of Yale University and of other similar institutions in the U.S.A., as numerous senior scientists would readily testify."

You see, dear reader, there has been a deep scientific conspiracy in the U.S. to prevent any change in the severe restrictions placed on general relativity by Einstein. This has reduced GR to a sort of "special relativity, with only distant perturbations." Specifically, it has excluded scalar electromagnetics and branded as heresy the inconceivable idea that general relativity could be local, and engineerable.

Now you know why the Soviets have been able to develop these monstrous weapons for over three decades while our scientists slept at the wheel. Scientific arrogance and pride has been our greatest enemy.

Direct experiments on Einstein's second postulate, in the 1961 interplanetary radar contact with Venus, challenge whether relativity is correct. Variations of over 30,000% of the best possible general relativity fit the MIT Lincoln Lab could generate were measured. The variations were not random but contained diurnal, lunar, and synodic periodic components. See also Bryan G. Wallace, Spectrosc. Lett. 4, 1971, p. 79 for an analysis of published 1961 data on the interplanetary radar contact with Venus that concludes that the data showed a component that was relativistic in the Galilean c+v sense. See also Wallace, "The Unified Quantum electrodynamic ether," Foundations of Physics, 3, 1973, p. 381. which details Measurements strongly challenging the Einstein assumption of the constant velocity of light, and deals with the nature of the ether. 22. For a sample of Soviet scientific freedom from narrow-minded bias in general relativity, see V. I. Denisov and A. A. Logunov, "The inertial mass defined in the general theory of relativity has no physical meaning," Teor. i Matemat. Fizika, 51(2), May 1982, p. 163-170 (In Russian). See also A. A. Vlassov and V. I. Denisov, "Einstein's formula for gravitational radiation is not a consequence of the general theory of relativity," Teor. i. Matemat. Fizika, 53(3), Dec. 1982, p. 406-418. Here we find that the intensity of gravitational radiation and the total intensity determined in the general theory of relativity in accordance with Einstein's formulas depend on the choice of the coordinate system, so that they can be made to vanish or even become negative. [Note by T.E.B.: If local curvature is engineerable, as in scalar EM, the local choice of coordinate systems can itself be directly engineered. This clearly implies that scalar EM can thus produce either "positive" intensity radiation or "negative" intensity radiation; thus it can "produce energy at a distance" or "extract energy from a distance.]

Continuing with Denisov: This result is a particular consequence of the general assertion to the effect that in general relativity there are no energy-momentum conservation laws for a system consisting of matter and the gravitational field. [Note by T.E.B.: Thus we can have an energy source or energy sink appear in the distant interference region, where matter has been lifted from the Dirac sea and exposed to the highly nonlinear interfering EG fields.]. See also V. I. Denisov and A. A. Logunov, "New theory of spacetime and gravitation, "Teor. and Matemat. Fizika, 50(1), July 1982, p. 3-76. Points out that ". . . the gravitational field in general relativity is completely different from other physical fields and is not a field in the spirit of Faraday and Maxwell." Misner, Kip S. Thorne and John Archibald Wheeler, Gravitation, W. H. Freeman and Co., San Francisco, CA, 1973, p. 19-21, 71-72, 367-369. Among other things, these arbitrary restrictions save the conservation laws. When they are removed. the conservation laws can be violated.

"Tesla cosmic ray motor may transmit power 'round the earth: Famed scientist, on eve of 76th birthday, says he has succeeded in harnessing 'penetrating rays' to operate small motive device." Brooklyn Eagle, July 10,1932. Tesla reported he had harnessed "cosmic rays" and caused them to operate a small motive device. Tesla's use of "cosmic rays," however, encompassed scalar EM radiation. Tesla later seems to have progressed to a simpler motive unit. In the Kansas City Journal-Post, Sep. 10, 1933, he stated: My power generator will be of the simplest kind -- just a big mass of steel, copper and aluminum, comprising a stationary and rotating part, peculiarly assembled." A similar type of "gravitational turbine" seems to have been invented by John Bedini.

28. To see just how arbitrary and postulational are present "definitions" of mass and force, see Robert Bruce Lindsay and Henry Margenau, Foundations of Physics, Dover Publications, New York, 1963, p. 283-287. Note on p. 283 that a "field of force" at any point is actually defined only for the case when a unit mass is present at that point. Also see Richard P. Feynman, Robert B. Leighton, and Matthew Sands, The Feynman Lectures on Physics, Addison-Wesley, New York, Vol. 1, 1963, p. 2-4 for a definition of the electric field in the context of its potentiality for producing a force. This problem did not exist for the original foundation of electromagnetic force fields in vacuum, since the vacuum was assumed to be a material ether. With the modern view a nonmaterial ether has emerged, yet the classical electromagnetic theory has not been made sufficiently rigorous in distinguishing "observable" and "virtual" electromagnetic force fields.

30. Some years ago, Dr. William Tiller produced very important "free A-field" theoretical work which showed waves which did not fall off as $1/r^2$. Interesting theoretical work in scalar wave theory has also been advanced by Dea. See Jack Dea, "Fundamental Fields and Phase Information," presented at the 1985 U.S. Psychotronics Association Conference, Bergamo Center, Dayton, Ohio, July 1985. Dea has formulated an important theory for vacuum EM scalar waves, derived from Maxwell's equations with zero E and B fields. He predicts waves whose intensity falls off with distance as $1/r$ instead of $1/r^2$, and detection of these waves by various means. He shows simple generators for the waves. Detection is quantum mechanically by electron interference, not by single electrons. Thus such scalar waves will pass through normal Faraday shields. In his theory Dea does not address the question of spin vortexes in vacuum scalar waves. It is the present author's view that all vacuum waves are scalar waves, and the primary distinction between the "transverse" EM wave and the longitudinal scalar wave is simply the presence or absence of spin-vortexes. Indeed, one may argue that the present "vector wave" EM theory can be replaced by a scalar wave theory. In 1903 Whittaker proved that any vector field can be replaced by two scalar fields. See E. T. Whittaker, Proc. Lond. Math. Soc.1, 367, 1903. By implication, since a vector wave is simply a moving vector field, it can be replaced by two moving scalar fields.

See also Jack Anderson and Dale Van Atta, United Press Syndicate, "CIA knew South African-Israeli nuclear test was coming," Birmingham Post-Herald, Apr. 26, 1985, p. A5. The latter article repeats the CIA/DIA argument that the Vela incidents represent concurrent South African-Israeli testing of atomic weapons. Taiwan is considered a possible third partner. According to Anderson and Van Atta, a South African navy contingent was "in the area" at the time of the 1979 Vela detection, and Israel and South Africa were cooperating on an atomic bomb project as early as 1966. Apparently U.S. announcement of an impending South African atomic test in the Kalahari Desert in 1977 led to such an outcry that the test was suspended. Anderson and Van Atta cite succeeding visits to South Africa by Israeli scientists, technicians, and defense officials. However, since the actual Vela detections showed some deviations from what would be expected from nuclear tests, one can speculate that Anderson and Van Atta have presented evidence for the development of scalar electromagnetic weapons by two additional countries. One may further speculate that this could reveal what has been checking the Soviets from simply moving against the West with scalar electromagnetic weapons.

Indeed, the mysterious destruction of six major Soviet missile ammunition storage areas within the space of seven months could have been a preemptive measure and warning to the Soviets if they had actually been considering moving against the West. Also, other incidents reported in the South Atlantic may possibly be associated with the program producing the "Vela flashes." For example, see N.W.C. Rutherford, "Unidentified Phenomena," Marine Observer, 51, 1981, p. 186 for a description of a great bluish-white flash and small bolt of lightning, indicating some sort of anomalous electrical discharge, on Dec. 23, 1980 at 2245 hours (10:45 p.m.). Many other anomalous flashes for which no known causative mechanism exists have been detected by satellites. For example, the OSO-2 and OSO-5 satellites have detected about one mysterious short (less than 0.1 sec) flash about every ten orbits, at times when the fields of view of the telescopes were well above the earth. As many as three of the satellite's photometers have detected a flash simultaneously. These flashes must be removed from any discussion of satellite-observed lightning; see J. G. Sparrow and E. P. Ney, "Lightning Observations by Satellite," Nature, 232, 1971, p. 540.

For a particularly significant combination of forms, see Marine Observer, "Unidentified Phenomenon," 48, 1978, p. 21-22. Also, on the night of July 26, 1984 the pilot and crew of a Boeing 747 (American carrier) flying from Tokyo to Fairbanks, near the Kuriel Islands, at 47 5'44" N: 161 00'05" E, noticed a slowly expanding hemisphere of white light off to their left above the horizon. The shell of light continued to expand over a 10-minute period until ahead of them and to the right. The crew braced for a shock wave which never arrived. Their weather radar saw nothing out of the ordinary. The shell of light had sharp edges and was semi-transparent so that stars became visible through it. (Richard F. Haines, private communication, Sept. 27, 1984). See also Richard Hall, "Aerial anomalies at sea," The Info Journal, 4(3), May 1975, p. 6-9 for an unusual light phenomenon seen in the Caribbean by the R.M.S. Carmania (British). The phenomenon occurred four times at precise hourly intervals, strongly suggesting an artificial origin. See also F. Shepherd, "Cloud: Strait of Gibraltar," Marine Observer, 51(273), July 1981, p. 107-108 for an incident of associated cloud, arch, and anomalous pressure effects. 44. See Christopher S. Wiren, "Brezhnev Calls for Accord against 'Terrifying Arms,'" New York Times, June 14, 1975, p. 1, 11. In a major Kremlin speech on June 13, 1975, Leonid I. Brezhnev included a statement that one major concern not covered by existing agreements was "assuming ever greater urgency with each passing day." Calling for a ban on new weapons of mass destruction, the Soviet leader stated: "The level of modern technology is such that a serious danger arises of creating weapons more terrifying than nuclear ones." He stated, "The reason and conscience of humanity dictate the necessity of erecting an insurmountable barrier to the development of such weapons." See also Malcolm W. Browne, "Senatorial Group Received by Brezhnev," New York Times, July 3, 1975, p. 2. Leonid Brezhnev repeated his proposal to a group of U.S. senators on July 2, stating that the capability to develop more terrible weapons was obvious. He emphasized, however, that he "had no particular weapon in mind." Here he may have been deliberately misleading the U.S. senators, to prevent revealing that the Soviet Union had already developed such weapons, and was horrified at their potential for total destruction. E.g., if massive and rapid scalar explosions occur, the linearity of spacetime -- and the orderly flow of time itself -- may be seriously perturbed throughout the earth and its adjacent space. From a general relativistic viewpoint, such an event might well prove catastrophic for the entire biosphere. Boris N. Ponomarev, a Soviet national party secretary, again raised the same issue to a delegation of visiting U.S. congressmen in the Kremlin on Aug. 11, 1975; see Christopher S. Wren, "Moscow Now Pressing Disarmament." New York Times, Aug. 12, 1975, p. 6. At the United Nation's thirtieth session of the General Assembly on Sept. 23, 1975, Foreign minister Andrei A. Gromyko strongly raised the same issue, warning that science can produce "ominous" new weapons of mass destruction. He urged that all countries, led first by the major powers, should sign an agreement to ban the development of these unspecified new weapons. He even offered a draft, entitled "Prohibition of the Development and Manufacture of New Types of Weapons of Mass Annihilation and of New Systems of Such Weapons." The first article provided that the types of these new weapons would be "specified through negotiations on the subject." Because of its fixation on nuclear weapons, the West may have lost its only opportunity to prevent the spread of scalar electromagnetic weapons of power unprecedented even by nuclear arms. Of course, it may also have been a Soviet ploy to prohibit the U.S. from developing scalar electromagnetics defensive weaponry to counter the massive strategic scalar electromagnetics weapons already developed, tested, and deployed by the Soviet Union. Certainly in 1973 at a secret meeting in Prague with European communist leaders, Brezhnev had laid out a firm statement of Soviet domination of the world by 1985. See "Secret Speech: Did Brezhnev Come Clean?", National Review, 29(8), Mar. 4, 1977, p. 248, 250. Brezhnev's speech contained statements such as: "We are achieving with detente what our predecessors have been unable to achieve using the mailed fist...come 1985 we will be able to extend our will wherever we need to." Brezhnev stated the Soviet Union would control the oceans of the world, 90% of the land, and the air and space above. A front-page Boston Globe article on Feb. 11, 1975 was the first to carry the story. A copy of Brezhnev's secret speech was obtained by British intelligence in 1973, but denigrated by Secretary of State Kissinger. Apparently the first official U.S. reference to Brezhnev's startling speech did not appear until the 1976 National Intelligence Estimate. Although the big intelligence bureaucracies can do a fantastic job with "current intelligence," their record at predicting a drastic change is woeful, precisely because of the political nature of bureaucracies. See "What is Intelligence," Colonel William V. Kennedy et all, Intelligence Warfare: Penetrating the Secret World of Today's Advanced Technology Conflict, with an introduction by Dr. Ray S. Cline, Crescent Books, New York, 1983, p. 8-23. Intelligence Warfare is heartily recommended as the single book which best gives the reader a grasp of modern technical intelligence organizations, capabilities, and operations.

45. For details of Soviet weather engineering operations over the U.S., see Thomas E. Bearden, "USSR: New beam energy possible?", Defense & Foreign Affairs Daily, 13(111), June 12, 1984, p. 1-2. Cloud signature patterns reported in the article have been repeatedly sighted over multiple areas in the U.S. A series of anomalous "hole in the cloud" patterns, possibly associated with early Soviet weather engineering efforts over the U.S., was widely seen in 1967-68. See Weatherwise, 21(4), Aug. 1968, cover and p. 143; 21(5), Oct. 1968, p. 194-195, 204-205; 21(6), Dec. 1968, p. 238-245. Peculiar stationary blocking patterns have also been observed to occur and influence weather over the U.S., leading to severities such as the winter of 1976-77. See K. K. Tung and R. S. Lindzen, "A theory of stationary long waves, Part 1, A simple theory of blocking; Part 2: Resonant Rossby waves in the presence of realistic vertical shears; Part 3, Quasi-normal modes in a singular waveguide," Monthly Weather Review, 107(6), June 1979, p. 714-774. 46. For details of the Soviet Woodpecker beams bending around the earth and intersecting over the U. S., see Christopher Chant and Ian Hogg, Nuclear War in the 1980's?, Harper & Row, New York, 1983, p. 71. See also Soviet Military Power, U.S. Department of Defense, 1985, p. 45. The intersection forms an interference grid. Scalar EM channels added to the Woodpecker carriers then provide a corresponding sca1ar EM interference grid in the scalar area.

When adjusting the scalar interferometry components of the grid, bursts in the interference and discharges of energy as well as bursts of energy extractions occur. This leads to the production of anomalous aerial phenomena such as explosions, rumblings, airquakes, etc. In addition, direct Bohm-Aharonov forces may be engendered in ground structures, shaking buildings and windows, etc. without seismic disturbances. Such anomalous disturbances have been widely noted in the open U.S. press. E.g., particularly see Kenneth F. Bunting and Daniel M. Weintraub, "Mysterious Rumbles Jar Southland," Los Angeles Times, Dec. 8, 1984, CC(II), p. 1,10; Let Scarr, "People shook up over mystery shakes," The San Diego Union, Dec. 8, 1984, p. Bl, 4. Following this and a Dec. series of anomalous aerial disturbances off the Los Angeles/San Diego coast, a sharp and unexpected weather front appeared, racking the area with high winds on the night of Dec. 12, producing widespread damage and power outages. The newly-formed front moved on to produce significant snowstorms in other areas. See Ted Thackery, Jr., "Winds Kill Two, Wreak Havoc as They Sweep Through the Southland," Los Angeles Times, Dec. 14, 1984, MF/Part II, p. 1,8; "Even Tucson gets snow in storm that dumps 20 inches," AP release, Los Angeles Herald Examiner, Dec. 14, 1984, p. A-12. During several months prior to the December 1984 Los Angeles incident, anomalous electrical failures and outages had occurred in the San Diego and Southern California area, possibly due to scalar interferometry adjustments in the Woodpecker grid over the area. For other typical incidents possibly associated with adjustment of the interference grid, see "Who boomed? Odd Noise unnerves Ohioans," Journal, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Dec. 28, 1982; "Tremors shake Miss. Gulf Coast," Times-Picayune, New Orleans, Louisiana, Feb. 27, 1983; Sandra Skowron, "Sonic boom is just Mother Nature," Beaver Co. Times, Beaver Falls, Penn., Jan 13, 1983; "Booms in Rockland, New York Times, Mar. 1. 1979, Sec. 8, p. 82; "Loud 'boom' unexplained," Star-Beacon, Ashtabula, Ohio, Feb. 21, 1983; Paul Senecton, "The word is now IDENTIFIED," Mail, Hartlepool, England, Feb. 3, 1985: On Jan. 23, 1974 a mysterious explosion over North Wales rocked a 60-mile radius area. Associated anomalous light phenomena were also seen. Hundreds and hundreds of anomalous booms, aerial rumbles, and aerial explosions, many accompanied by flashes or anomalous shaking of ground structures, buildings, windows, etc., have occurred over the U.S. and other Western nations in the 60's, 70's, and 80's.

On occasion, an aircraft at the proper altitude and position can conceivably experience interference in its electrical systems and in its engine combustion processes due to exothermic kindling or endothermic extraction of electromagnetic energy. The combustion processes of aircraft engines produce highly ionized gases in very nonlinear conditions. These can act as strong dephasers and decouplers of the vector EM components of a vector zero summation in a scalar interference zone. Exothermic interference would have little effect on combustion, but strong endothermic interference can result in engine flameout. Anomalous simultaneous failure of jet and propeller-driven aircraft engines sometimes occurs. For high altitude grids, this can result in engine flameouts, but restart and recovery after unusual loss of altitude has dropped the aircraft out of the scalar interference zone. Several candidate incidents over and near the U.S. exist, particularly where power failures were experienced by multiple aircraft. The more usual exothermic case, however, if substantial could result in anomalous loss of control of the aircraft. For a recent candidate incident, see "Jetliner drops 32,000 feet; 400 aboard; 50 are injured," Associated Press release, Huntsville Times, Feb. 20, 1985, p. 1 and "China Airlines Pilot Denies Cockpit Error," Associated Press release, Huntsville Times, Feb. 21, 1985, p. A-9. Deliberate use of this effect as an anti-strategic-bomber weapon capable of destroying bombers at or shortly after takeoff is possible (the Arrow DC-8 which crashed just after takeoff from Gander Air Force Base, Newfoundland on December 12, 1985 may have been deliberately interfered with by just such a Soviet weapon -- see extensive newspaper and TV news coverage of that event).

In scalar EM interference with aircraft, certain signatures may occur. Different instruments may sharply contradict each other, since their activation and inactivation is no longer a simple function. The pilot's instrument panel, for example, may indicate failure of the control system, when actually it has not failed, and the flight recorder may record that the control system is still operating. In such case, the pilot may take proper action based on his own instrumental readings, yet these actions may be contraindicated for the actual status of the aircraft, resulting in opposing pilot/autopilot actions. Tentative indications of the jetliner that anomalously dropped 32,000 feet and recovered are that apparently such anomalous instrument disagreements occurred. Another signature is that, as the EM charge accumulates in and on the aircraft, its skin charges up electrically, producing a glowing corona similar to St. Elmo's fire. The Arrow DC-8 was observed to be glowing yellow by eyewitnesses, according to the Canadian Broadcast Corporation's 10:00 p.m. network TV news on April 8, 1986.

Lewis, "Aharonov-Bohm effect for trapped ions," Physical Review A, 28(3), Sept. 1983, p. 1228-1235. This paper analyzes the role of the Aharonov-Bohm effect for the bound states of a charged particle in the superposition of two fields: a uniform magnetic field plus the vector potential of a solenoid. Gives exact solutions for a solenoid of zero size and discusses the corrections due to a solenoid of finite size. Shows that a series of new "betatron resonances" appear in the spectrum, dependent on the flux quantum number. The fundamental betatron resonance remains narrow and unshifted for solenoid radii large enough to broaden and shift the cyclotron resonance. See also W. Ehrenburg and R. E. Siday, Proc. Phys. Soc. London, Sect. B62, 1949, p. 8 which, among other things, discusses the effect of the vector potential in electron interferometry, where the insertion of a tiny solenoid between the interfering paths is shown to give an additional phase difference proportional to the flux through the solenoid. The resulting shift in the fringe system is called the Aharonov-Bohm effect.

49. Frank Golden has developed a most important and precise scalar EM detection system to display scalar EM signals on a cathode ray tube. His important measurements have mapped the scalar resonant frequency responses of the entire earth. Two completely different types of scalar instrumentation show precise agreement on the frequency maps. The measurements show that the Soviet Union has for some time entrained the entire earth into giant scalar electromagnetic resonances on two frequencies approximately 12 kilohertz apart. It is the opinion of the author that the beat frequency between these two giant resonances is utilized by the Soviet Union to extract enormous power from the earth, essentially by a mechanism that Golden has uncovered. A complex of four to eight weapon systems might reasonably be powered from the single bi-resonant tapping source. In April 1985 Golden discovered the rather sudden activation of many other scalar frequencies with characteristics resembling command and control communications. In addition, a significant number of additional paired scalar resonances had been entrained upon the earth. It is the opinion of the author that this showed a major activation of the Soviet strategic scalar electromagnetic defense system, with the power up of from 80 to 100 weapons, along with the complete command and control system. Golden has previously built a prototype of an actual Soviet scalar communications system and demonstrated that it works. Because of the impending mayday and the 1973 statement by Brezhnev indicating that 1985 was a critical planning year, the sudden activation of such massive numbers of weapons and communications was alarming. Accordingly, the author discreetly notified certain contacts to alert the U.S. system. Golden then detected the periodic turn-on and turn-off of the systems, indicating a large command and control exercise rather than preparations for direct tactical use. An additional difference, however, was the change from scalar electric to scalar magnetic field on many of the large transmitters. This is indicative of electrostatic location, targeting, and adjustment of the target on the earth and then switching to the "power input" mode. It is the opinion of the author that this indicated the choice of a geological target and proceeding to attack that geological target in the "slow buildup" mode. Again, proper contacts were so notified.

50. A very good coverage of the Soviet microwave radiation of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow is given in Paul Brodeur, The Zapping of America, W. W. Norton & Co., New York, 1977, passim. None of our U.S. Embassy security personnel knew of scalar interferometry, nor did they possess scalar electromagnetics detectors. Further, orthodox U.S. scientists were also ignorant of scalar electromagnetics. The Soviets were thus in a position to tailor the radiation signals and precisely determine what our on-site personnel would detect. Details of the effects on U.S. Embassy personnel, possibly associated with the microwave radiation, are given by Brodeur. A great number of related releases by the open news media also exist. For example, see Robert C. Toth, "Radiation Devices Bug U.S. Embassy," Huntsville Times, reprinted from the Los Angeles Times, Feb. 8, 1976; "U.S. Screening out Soviet 'Listening Rays'," United Press International release, Washington D.C. 54. A particularly important Soviet Paper is E. B. Smetanin, "Electromagnetic field in a space with curvature -- new solutions," Soviet Physics Journal, 25(2), Feb. 1982, p. 107-111. In this paper, a solution to the stated problem is obtained, which may be regarded as a classical model of a charged particle that has both a magnetic moment and a nonzero magnetic charge density. Interaction with spacetime curvature can disrupt the gauge invariance of the EM field, and it can also reestablish invariance in an initially noninvariant theory. (Hutchinson has had anomalous breaks of metal caused by standing scalar waves, which seems to be due to a mechanism that produces monopoles and deposits them in the metal at standing-wave nodes. This paper should be directly applicable.)

See also Yu. S. Vladimirov and A. A. Kozlenkov, "6-optics and a general theory of gravitation and electromagnetism," Soviet Physics Journal, 27(12), Dec.1984, p. 1039-1041; V. G. Bagrov and M. D. Noskov, "New exact solution of the Dirac equation. XI," Soviet Physics Journal, 27(12), Dec. 1984, p. 1030-1034. See particularly V. I. Petukhov and I. A. Kuzin, "Weak processes in the field of a gravitational wave," Soviet Physics Journal, 27(12}, Dec. 1984, p. 1025-1029.

In the latter paper it is significant that the decay probability increases in a locally curved spacetime, and that solutions are obtained for circularly polarized waves.

(In EM waves, circularly polarized waves have special characteristics in nonlinear isotropic media: exact solutions exist. Also, when two longitudinal sine waves of differing frequencies are transmitted into a nonlinear isotropic medium, the apparent difference frequency is transmitted as a sine wave, undistorted. This characteristic has been used by Westinghouse to produce improved sonar transmission through seawater, for example. The scalar EM (electrogravitational) wave may be represented as a longitudinal EM wave. Immediately, if one wishes to produce a pure scalar EG wave in the nucleus of an atom, two frequencies should be transmitted such that their difference is the frequency wished. Or circularly polarized waves may be utilized.)

Note that, by implication, one should be able to deliberately tailor scalar EM waves to greatly speed the decay of long-lived radioisotopes, such as are contained in radioactive wastes from nuclear reactors and other processes.

55. For some evidence of continuing persistence of the higher frequency scalar components applied to the scalar grid on Jan. 28, 1986 to localize the effects when attacking the Challenger, see "Poison suspected in unexplained deaths of birds," Huntsville Times, AP release, Feb. 6, 1986. From 1-4 Feb.

1986, various kinds of dead birds -- such as blackbirds, cardinals, sparrows and bluebirds -- plummeted to the ground in Birmingham, Alabama. At first some sort of mysterious poison was suspected, but later was ruled out. During this period, the woodpecker grid was particularly active in weather engineering operations. Multiple sightings of giant cloud radials occurred in various places throughout the U.S. The retention of the high frequency components possibly was intensified in the Birmingham area sporadically during the period. Birds flying into this zone would be killed if their brains acted as scalar receivers and were sufficiently jammed by the signals. Normally Huntsville (further north) is a "hinge point" for increased scalar activity, to start the Jetstream bending northeast to move along the Appalachian mountain chain. However, just before 28 January the jetstream had been diverted further south than usual by the Soviet interference, bringing unseasonably cold weather to Florida and the waiting Challenger on its launch pad. Probably hinge points further south than Huntsville were needed for this operation. If these more southern points were retained for a few days, and the high frequency components were retained, then an inadvertent high intensity area of these components may have sporadically occurred in the Birmingham area, killing the birds.

56. For another very important paper indeed, see Vu. G. Ignat'ev, "Relativistic kinetics of an anisotropic plasmalike medium with damping in a field of gravitational radiation," Soviet Physics Journal, 27(12), Dec. 1984, (English translation: Plenum, June 1985), p. l066-1069. If we substitute the vacuum "virtual plasma" for the observable plasma, this paper may be part of the smoking gun to show that the Soviet Union has developed scalar electromagnetics. Extrapolating from this paper, the amplitude of the "induced longitudinal field" is proportional to the square of the amplitude of the gravitational wave (GW) in an initially isotopic medium, but reduces to a linear proportionality as the medium develops nonlinearities (anisotropies or inhomogeneities). Whereas conventional GW are considered to be weak, the scalar GW may be very strong since we ourselves determine the variation in the energy density of vacuum it involves. Further, sharply spiked scalar EM (EG) pulses may develop appreciably more amplitude that the linearly calculated amplitude from the magnitudes of the zero-summation components. The end result is that (1) we can produce powerful gravity waves using the scalar EM approach, (2) local spacetime can be curved, producing violation of the conservation laws, and (3) the assumption of a local Lorentz frame made by Einstein as a limitation on ordinary general relativity is falsified.

In passing, note that immediately one also has a clear basis for the excess local production of energy when the battery furnishing power to a DC series motor is sharply spiked backwards in a "recharging" fashion. Further, the ions in the battery (which are several hundred thousand times as massive as an electron) possess a resonance on the order of 16 megahertz in a typical lead-acid battery. Under the correct conditions, the ions collect the excess energy (due to the initial square effect) produced by a sharp pulse of recharging potential. The ions are shocked into resonance and, on reversal, "overshoot" and deliver this excess energy to the plates, recharging the battery. Thus such a system can violate linear conservation of energy because spacetime is locally curved by the spiking, and excess energy from the excited local vacuum is collected by the ions and delivered to the plates. This is precisely the effect upon which the first Bedini free-energy motor depended. The timing and adjustment, however, are highly critical and difficult, and the battery takes a rather severe beating.

NOAA-6 and NOAA-7 weather satellite photographs of massive smoke plumes, one of them 150 miles long and nearly horizontal, are shown. Also, in U.S. weather satellite photos of Novaya Zemlya, similar plumes have been detected, making this location a tentative candidate for a second Soviet "exhaust site." See also Letter John M. Miller, Geophysical Institute, University of Alaska, Jan. 4, 1985 with attachment, "Bennett Island plume cases recently found." Satellite photos showing actual circular breaking of arctic ice have also been taken near Wrangel Island. See Sam Bishop, "UA photos show Soviets break ice for missiles," Fairbanks Daily News-Miner, Dec. 15, 1984, p. 1,3; Craig Covault, "Soviet Abi1ity to Fire through Ice Creates New SLBM Basing Mode," Aviation Week & Space Technology, Dec. 10, 1984, p. 16-17. Wrangel Island in fact has a bizarre history: it belongs to the U. S., but has been illegally given to the Soviets and occupied and used by them. 59. For other possible evidence of traces of Soviet scalar EM activity over the oceans, see George D. Curtis, "An electromagnetic radiation pattern over the ocean," Undersea Technology, 5(8), Aug. 1964, p. 29-30, 40. In producing a scalar wave, there exists a sort of "signal to noise" ratio of the desired scalar wave to an accompanying, undesired normal EM component. Due to practical equipment imperfections, the generated scalar wave inevitably is accompanied by a small residue of ordinary EM wave. While measures can be taken to further purify the scalar wave, a residue always remains. Curtis may have detected the weak EM residue accompanying early Soviet interference gridding for weather control testing over the U.S.

60. Interactions which occurred between Khrushchev and renowned physicist and Nobelian P. Kapitsa are of interest. Khrushchev desired absolute defense of the Soviet Union so that the Soviets might be able to launch any action desired without risk or serious concern. Kapitsa informed the Soviet leader that, if a means of total neutralization of foreign missiles was to be found, it could only come from a group of new principles in physics which was called " energetics." The term "energetics," of course, was contracted from "psychoenergetics," and is essentially the expanded physics/electromagnetics that this author has dubbed scalar electromagnetics.

Strangely, a portion of a book by Marshal Grechko was deleted from its English translation at the specific request of the Soviet Union to the U.S. State Department. The passage stated: "Of particular importance is basic research aimed at discovering still unknown attributes of matter, phenomena, and the laws of nature, and developing new methods for their study and use to reinforce the state's defense capabilities."

The most definitive Soviet book on military strategy is titled Military Strategy (Voyennaya Strategiya). See V. D. Sokolovskiy, Soviet Military Strategy, third edition, edited with an analysis and commentary by Harriet Fast Scott, Crane, Russak & Company, Inc., New York, 1975. There are three editions, the latest in 1968. In the third edition, the exotic weapons normally proposed for defense against strategic ballistic missiles -- such as particle beams, high energy lasers, exotic nuclear warheads, plasma weapons, antigravitational weapons, etc. -- are discussed and discounted by implication. The statement is made several times that 100% defense against missiles and aircraft is possible. A statement is also made that it is interesting to note that this capability (a solution to the strategic missile defense problem) has been achieved by the Soviet Union, but not by the West (e.g., p. 298.) In the same edition, a previous definition of antimissile defense obviously consisting of radars, computers, and interceptor missiles is deleted (see author's note 190, p. 454).

The Soviets also recognize the great importance of technical surprise: "The experience of war shows that warring sides quite often have tried to employ new types of weapons to this end to achieve surprise, which are a surprise for the enemy or are little known to him. Each side secretly develops new means of warfare in order to employ them unexpectedly. History knows many examples how the employment of a new weapon initially gave considerable success because the enemy, caught unaware and not knowing the combat capabilities of this weapon, was for some time incapable of effective counteraction… The mass introduction of new weapons into an army usually cannot remain secret for long for the other side. -- New means of warfare, and in mass numbers, are impossible to create often and quickly. In this regard, the sides have begun to take other paths concerning the attainment of surprise along with searches for new weapons and their sophistication." V. Ye. Savkin, of The Basic Principles Operational Art and Tactics, Moscow, 1972, U.S. Air Force translation, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402.

61. The Soviets have not discarded most of their old radars, and have continued to develop, build, and deploy giant new radars (in apparent violation of SALT agreements), which U.S. analysts always analyze in conventional fashion. It is fairly straightforward, simple, and inexpensive to modify an ordinary pencil beam radar to produce scalar wave beams and geometrical scalar Fourier expansion forms. Radars can provide a wide array of totally new and unexpected capabilities when utilized in the scalar electromagnetics mode. Even older Soviet radars, with antiaircraft gun sites and older surface-to-air missile sites, will exhibit new and startlingly advanced capabilities against ballistic and cruise missiles and Strategic Air Command bombers. Since there are many thousands of these older Soviet radars still operationally deployed, in the scalar mode the Soviet strategic defense may well approach 100%, just as Military Strategy implies. Also, the antiaircraft and antimissile defense capability of Soviet land forces may be far greater than anything presently estimated by U.S. analysts.

62. To the physicists, engineers, and researchers who have made the tough sledding to this point, congratulations! Here's a bonus for you.

Turn to page 32, equation [7]. Time differentiate it (this is left as an exercise for the reader). Collect terms and study the result intensely.

Now you have the reason why rise time is so important from a scalar EM viewpoint. You can also see why spiking the innate inductance of any system very sharply is so important. Fast rise time greatly increases the value of the time derivative terms, and your gravito-inertial effects go up with the collective squares of your zero-vector summed components. Any system has at least a little inductance. For sharp spikes, the gravitational potential goes very high. The inductance of the system momentarily opposes any current (translation: opposes any current bleed-off, or EM force field bleed-off). During that time you've got the 4-space G-potential to use. If you need to hold it longer to use it, then increase the inductance.

Now you can see why extremely rapid discharge of properly tuned, giant Tesla coils give gravitational and inertial effects sometimes.

You can see why the sharp "EMP" (electromagnetic pulse) from a nuclear explosion or EMP generating device can penetrate the ocean.

That's why the spikes (such as used by the neurophone) can carry messages directly into the brain and nervous system. You also should see why the Soviet woodpecker carriers (a Soviet over-the-horizon radar system) are loaded with scalar EM spikes (Bedini has precisely detected them from 50 Hz to 10 MHz; Golden has detected them into the gigahertz range.) to work on the humans in the targeted area. They're zapping the hell out of us. And they have done something similar at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow for decades.

Bedini has developed a simple, cheap device to mess up the phaselocking of the scalar EM spikes on the woodpecker carriers. It's based on the fact that the Russkies use a lot of circularly polarized transmitters when they make the spikes. Here's what to do: Take 4 strong bar magnets and an old (but operational) long-playing record turntable. Set it on 33-1/3 RPM speed. Glue the magnets on the top of the turntable, standing vertically, symmetrically placed around the turntable's outer edge. Place them so that on one a north pole is up, on the next a south pole is up, then a north up, then a south up. Now turn the turntable on and let it run. This gadget makes a slowly rotating magnetostatic wave. (Yes, it will also make a rotating "magnetic" wave, which is actually two rotating magnetostatic waves.). These rotating magnetostatic waves will interfere with the scalar spikes, changing them to EM (electromagnetism) and slowly rotating their phase. This breaks the phaselock of the Soviet circularly polarized scalar EM signal on the human brain. This gadget will protect the average large room.

But back to our differentiated equation.

Now you should also see why the first Bedini motor is so "devilishly difficult" to adjust. You've got to get the effect and examine it in well under 20 nanoseconds. You'll need an oscilloscope of 350 MHz range or so. Microwave-quality bench equipment is necessary; the ordinary electrical and electronic shop equipment is not good enough. You can also see why the ordinary lead-acid battery takes such a beating. However, a special battery certainly can be designed to take it. Now you know.

Okay, you tigers. Go get 'em.

63. Now here's a final bonus for the persistent reader.

This time, see J. N. Brittingham, "Focus Wave Modes in Homogeneous Maxwell's Equations:

Transverse Electric Mode," J. Appl. Phys. 54, 1983, p. 1179-1189; T. T. Wu and R. W. P. King, "Comment on 'Focus Wave Modes in Homogeneous Maxwell's Equations: Transverse Electric Mode' [J. Appl. Phys. 54, 1179 (1983)]", J. Appl. Phys. 56, 1984, p. 2587; T. T. Wu and H. Lehmann, "Spreading of Electromagnetic Pulses," J. Appl. Phys. 58, 1985, p. 2064-2065; T. T. Wu, "Electromagnetic Missiles," J. Appl. Phys. 57, 1985, p. 2370-2373. Pay particular attention to the latter paper.

Because of the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) and other programs, great interest has recently been kindled in using EM pulses to carry energy from a high-powered source to a target. However, so far almost all the work is still couched in terms of purely ordinary (though sophisticated) electromagnetics. It still involves the EM concept of "EM energy flow through the intervening space from the transmitter to the target." As such, the work to date still suffers from all the self-imposed ills and limitations of using the classical force fields concept of EM.

However, the theoretical work of these referenced papers is of great interest to us here.

In the first paper, Brittingham sparked a great deal of interest with theoretical work which promised a permanently focused 3-dimensional concentration of EM energy that propagates in a straight line with the speed of light. That is, this mode used a newly formulated wave packet (called the "focus wave mode") that acted as a non-dissipating EM soliton.

In the second reference, it was concluded that Brittingham's focused wave packet actually satisfied Maxwell's equations, but not the associated boundary conditions.

[Comment by this reviewer: both of these formulations use "linear time" and a "linear frame," ignoring the local general relativity aspects. Indeed, Brittingham's "focused wave packet" can be made by the zero-vector approach! However, it will not be an "EM" packet, it will be a pulse (or oscillating wave, depending upon how it is made) of 5-gravity potential. As such, it contains a multiplicity of locked-in, 5th-dimensional, non-zero EM gradients in and EM gradients out. Collectively these gradients themselves constitute a deterministic "flux of gradients" or an EM flux in the 5th dimension, with no resultant effective current of EM gradients. In other words, it's possible to build a "flux of gradients" and to have a "current of gradients," just as in ordinary EM it's possible to have a "flux of virtual particles" and a "current of virtual particles." The argument concerning the EM boundary conditions of Maxwell's equations is not relevant in such a case. The only boundary involved is the zero itself.]

Be that as it may, the 4th reference is of direct interest. In this paper, Wu has done us a great service. He shows that, under transient excitation, an antenna of finite size can transmit energy to a faraway receiver so that the energy decreases as slowly as one wishes. An electromagnetic pulse of energy with such slow decay is conveniently referred to as an "electromagnetic missile."

The electromagnetic missile has important applications, according to Wu. One possible application is the transmission of information in a manner that is very difficult to intercept or jam. A second possible application is to destroy or disable a distant target. However, Wu feels that so much energy is required [remember, he is speaking of EM non-zeroed force fields traveling through ordinary space] that a like1y radiating source must be something like a nuclear explosion. However, as Wu points out, a nuclear explosion produces a powerful EM pulse which includes frequencies from microwaves to gamma rays. To weaponize the explosion to produce a coherent beam, the nuclear explosion must be controlled to produce a coherent radiating source and a pulsed laser-like EM beam. Wu points out that such a technology is difficult and has not been developed.

We comment as follows: It is certainly true that enormous energy is required if the waves in the pulse remain electromagnetic -- that is, if they have non-zero resultant E and B fields to the external observer.

On the other hand, if we form a complex of waves in opposition so that we control the energy content of each individual component wave, but blend all the waves so that their collective envelope wave has zero E-field and zero B-field resultants, then -- to the external observer -- the EM energy is infolded and unzipped electromagnetically. It is now electrogravitational energy, and limitations of "EM force field energy flowing through space or through a physical medium" need no longer apply. However, we may still look at each EM component wave as an individual EM wave, moving in the Kaluza-Klein 5th dimension that is wrapped-around each and every point in our ordinary 4-space. In other words, to the ordinary 4-spacetime observer, each component wave has a special channel around every point of his space, not through it. Thus we have established multiple EM channels "just outside" each point of observer space. These we call "scalar channels," and EM energy can move through each one as if it were moving through a wire. The relative potentials between the "ends of each wire" determine in which direction the "EM energy current" flows along the wire.

And in each of these "special channels," we just have a normal kind of space (to the internal observer). Wu's paper assures us that we can get as much of the input energy to the distant target as we desire. The problem then is how to break the zero-summed EM envelope (and hence the "zero channel" for each component EM energy wave) in the distant target itself, spilling the infolded contents of all the special channels back into ordinary spacetime as EM energy (either positive or negative).

That, of course is easily done by interference in the distant zone. As previously stated, there is a way in which we can even perform this interference in a single scalar beam. Since the newly formed EM energy emerges from each and every increment of spacetime occupied by the distant target, it already emerges inside the very vitals of the target. It does not have to translate through the intervening ordinary space between transmitter and target. Instead, it goes through the Kaluza-Klein fifth dimension. It translates along a line through our space, but not through our space. With the scalar EM approach, we transmit EM energy through hyperspace, not through normal space.

Hereafter we will adapt and expand Wu's SDI term "electromagnetic missile" to include these electrogravitational aspects. In other words, we include the "scalar EM missile", which consists of an infolded multiple of Wu's ordinary EM missiles moving together coherently in special sheathed hyperspace channels.

In Appendix I we show an anomalous photograph taken by Bob Gladwin, just before the shuttle launch of Nov. 26,1985. While the photograph may be an artifact, it also is a candidate for the test strike of such a Soviet scalar "electromagnetic missile" tested against an aiming point offset from the shuttle launch which followed a few seconds later. The test was accomplished before the shuttle was launched, and offset from it, so that it positively would not endanger the shuttle itself. The conditions under which this spectacular photograph was taken happened to coincide with the special conditions required to photograph such scalar EM energy. Those conditions are clarified and explained in the Appendix.

My deep appreciation goes to Mr. Gladwin for allowing me to use this photograph. As we will point out in Appendix I, the video camera caught a picture of the Soviet scalar EM marker beacon associated with the Titan explosion of April 18, 1986. One can rest assured that the Soviets probably destroyed that vehicle, using a scalar EM missile.

APPENDIX 1: SOME IMPORTANT INDICATORS AND DESTRUCTIVE TESTING

Some of the indicators which bear on the use of the Soviet scalar electromagnetic grid via the Woodpecker EM carrier beams are given in this appendix. along with other information believed pertinent to overall scalar EM effects.

IN ADDITION, THE THESIS OF ACTUAL LIVE TESTING OF THESE WEAPONS BY THE SOVIETS -- TO INCLUDE THE DESTRUCTION OF A TROOP-CARRYING U.S. AIRCRAFT, A SHUTTLE, AND A TITAN MISSILE -- IS ADVANCED AND INDICATORS PRESENTED.

An anomalous photograph taken by Bob Gladwin is presented which possibly may have captured the "smoking gun" -- the strike of a Soviet scalar EM missile at an offset aim point near the shuttle Atlantis, just before its launch on Nov. 26, 1985. However, this photograph is caveated since it may also represent an anomalous but ordinary artifact. captured in some as yet unknown manner. The manner in which such a photograph may have been taken -- when normally the scalar energy does not show on a photo -- is explained.

Another photograph taken by George Suchary after the launch did capture the Soviet "marker beacon" utilized in the test firing, however. This independent photograph is presented, and adds credence to the thesis that the Gladwin photograph captured the test of a Soviet scalar EM pulse missile.

- INDICATORS AND SUCH -

1. Continual cloud radials have repeatedly been seen and photographed over Los Angeles, California or its vicinity.

Los Angeles is also apparently a "hinge point" for bending and controlling the jetstream. Three typical radials seen to form one after the other by Margaret Wilson (and sketched and airbrushed by her) in the greater Los Angeles area are shown in figures 1, 2, 3, and 4. These radials were formed on Sunday, Jan. 26, 1986. Ms. Wilson had heard my Saturday night "Soviet Weather Engineering" broadcast over KABC Los Angeles, and my request that anyone who saw the typical radial cloud formation should photograph or draw it, noting time and location, and send the photos or drawings to me.

As Margaret described it. "To my astonishment, the next day I not only saw one, but three in the sky at the same time.

The time of the first one was Sunday, Jan. 26, at 1:15 p. m.

. . . I stepped out the back door for some minor errand and noticed a fan of long straight clouds in the sky. The sky had been filled with dark clouds most of the morning but this had been breaking up and the western half of the sky was now clear with these lines of clouds spread out on it. I immediately thought of your request and tried to see the bottom of the fan which was hidden behind bushes and a garage. When I stepped into the street, I saw there was a semi-circle beneath them.

Not having film and a wide-angle lens on my camera. I knew I couldn't capture it in its entirety. I am, however, a retired commercial airbrush artist so I quickly sketched the formation. It is illustration #1.

It was in the western sky, the base of the central semi-circle sitting about 15 degrees above the ocean horizon. It was very clear and sharply defined. The semi-circle was broken at the top and the two broken ends curled inward like commas. As I sketched the wind deformed it somewhat, the right half of the whole formation sliding down away from the left.

Ten minutes later it was getting quite clear of clouds except for a bank over the Santa Monica Mountains to the north and there, straight north, another fan was forming. As I watched it took shape -- illustration #2. The same broken semi-circle (with commas') but this time the bases of the rays were feathered about half-way out with end halves long straight wisps.

As I sketched, another fan had begun to take shape further east. It was hard to tell its size but I had estimated the first one at about 15 miles across and the second a little larger and the third larger yet. At the peak of its formation it looked like illustration #3. ...There in the middle of the central circle, hazy and a little faint was what looked like the top of a mushroom cloud. Or was it only a distant thunderhead that coincidentally found its way to a place behind the formation? The arms of the last, largest formation were rather wavy and feathery like some gigantic sea creature. It did not disperse as fast as the others, but held for a couple of hours, though it was pretty distorted by then. I could not estimate its size as I wasn't sure of its altitude.

Were they aircraft contrails? Certainly not! There was an airliner in the sky at the time -- a mere scratch on the smooth blue sky (see illustration #3, right center.).

The three formations were present in the sky at the same time although the first was getting quite distorted by the upper level winds before the last reached its peak.

Tuesday our weather changed from hot and sunny to rainy as the weather man said the path of the jetstream altered, and then there was the space shuttle explosion.

...The Russians seemed very sincere in their sympathy for the loss of our astronauts but only two days later it was printed in TASS and I personally heard Vladimir Posner say that Russia hoped that the United States would now realize what could happen if the S.D.I. program was further pursued. Was this friendly concern or a threat? It is very evident that if the S.D.I. can destroy a missile in flight, it can also destroy one on the ground. This would immediately put all Russian missiles in [reach of] our arsenal. They are already in place in the most desirable target areas -- their own launch sites. I'd be panicky too if I were a Soviet leader."

[Ed. comment: My sincere thanks to this thoughtful lady who took the time to sketch the cloud radial phenomena occurring in the Los Angeles "jetstream pivot point" at this critical time, just prior to the launch and destruction of the Challenger.

Anomalous cloud grid activity (formation and dissolution) in the Los Angeles area has been positively correlated with Soviet Woodpecker activity by engineer Ron Cole, with 100% correlation in 30 straight Woodpecker measurement runs. Statistically, of course, this is quite decisive.].

2. Continual cloud radials have repeatedly been seen and photographed over Huntsville, Alabama, associated with weather engineering and grid activity. Typical radials seen by this author are shown in Bearden, Soviet Weather Engineering Over North America, 1-hr. videotape, 1985. Huntsville is apparently a pivot point or "hinge point" for bending and controlling the jetstream.

3. Spectacular cloud grid patterns have been seen over Huntsville, Alabama and Los Angeles, California. An excellent videoclip of one of the Los Angeles area grids, personally observed and shot by KABC Open Mind talk show host Bill Jenkins, is shown in Bearden, Soviet Weather Engineering Over North America, 1-hr. videotape, 1985. An artist's sketch of an earlier gigantic grid, extending from horizon to horizon in every direction, seen over Huntsville, Alabama by Tom Bearden and Ken Moore, is also shown in the tape. The videotape is available from P.O. Box 1472, Huntsville, AL 35807. Sketches and details of another highly anomalous grid pattern observed in the greater Los Angeles area by engineer Ron Cole are shown in figures 5 and 6.

The reason that clouds of water droplets and/or ice particles detect the scalar interferometry and form signature patterns is simple: Consider each H_2O molecule as having two light little hydrogen atoms hanging on to the much heavier oxygen atom. The covalent sharing with the oxygen atom of the electron from each hydrogen atom means that (1) the electrostatic scalar potential between the H ion and the O ion it is bonded to, is rhythmically varying as the electron is shared back and forth, (2) this varying potential contains "electron spin holes" since it is made by the moving electron, (3) two such varying potentials exist since there are two H atoms sharing covalent electrons with the O atom, (4) the two H ions are at an angle of over 100 degrees with respect to each other, (5) the molecule assembly thus constitutes one part (one half, so to speak) of a scalar interferometer with imbedded electron spin holes for electron hooking, (6) Incident scalar waves from outside the system interact with the "half scalar interferometer." This scalar interferometry interaction is coupled to the covalent bonding electron because of the internal spin hole pattern of the molecular half of the interferometer. The coupled electron moves with the scalar pattern's changes, causing an observable interaction with and in the electrical structure and ionic potential of the molecule, (7) the weak H to H hydrogen bonding between molecules connects resulting ionic potential changes to the structuring of the entire macroscopic cloud assembly. Thus by scalar interferometry with the H_2O "half interferometers", an incident scalar EM pattern is detected and translated into patterns of E and B force fields. The H_2O molecules then "line up" in accord with the electrical patterns detected.

Thus the clouds form "signature patterns" according to the incident scalar EM radiation patterns. Giant cloud radials in the targeted area are probably due to the type and shape of antennas -- including the type and shape of the electrical wires establishing the antennas' ground planes -- 640used by the Soviet Union to project the scalar waves. Note that such "radial" antenna patterns were occasionally used by James Harris Rogers in his underground and undersea scalar EM transmission system.

4. Anomalous power outages in Ventura County, Southern California on Nov. 8 and 9, 1985. Again, engineer Ron Cole, who lives in the affected area, investigated and reports as follows:

"On the evening of 11-8-85 in a rural area of Ventura County known as Carlisle Canyon, a strange electrical phenomenon began to occur at about 10:15 p.m. Our first observation was that random white dots began to appear on the TV screen, then began to increase in size and brightness. The brighter the dots got, the dimmer certain lights in our home became. Yet later we found that, when some lighting circuits were dimming, other circuits were causing lights to shine much brighter than normal. After a bit of checking, we were able to determine that lighting circuits common to pole 1 of the service transformer were the ones that were seeing a reduction in voltage, while all circuits on pole 2 were seeing an increase in voltage.

There is another interesting condition that was observed on the TV screen. The dots were in sync with the vertical field or frame rate of the signal. This means that the interference had to be of a frequency of 59.7 Hz or 29.85 Hz. Normal power line interference will form a grouped dash pattern across the screen and will strobe upward at the rate difference of 59.7 Hz or 29.85 Hz. In the 8 November case, there was no strobing of the dots whatsoever.

These conditions continued off and on for the rest of the entire evening and were observed by no less than six other persons that I know of. They were observed over the entire TV frequency spectrum, low band VHF, high band VHF, and on two UHF channels. Line interference is almost always most prominent on the low band VHF frequencies only.

These anomalous events would take place on a somewhat irregular time pattern; anywhere from 3 to 10 minutes apart. They would always last for about 2 minutes.

At 12:30 a.m. I went to bed and was not aware of any further activities until 6:20 a.m., at which time I was awakened by several sharp snapping or cracking sounds coming from the walls of my house. I rolled over and went back to sleep, only to be reawakened about 15 minutes later by my wife, who informed me that the power and phones were out. My comment was, "Some dummy must have crashed into a power pole," and I dozed off again.

At 10:15 a.m. the power and phones came back on line. Shortly after, our phone began to virtually ring off the hook. About a dozen neighbors up and down the canyon wanted me to check out their electrical wiring and various appliances. All of them were trying to explain their individual encounters and what took place when the power went out. Such things as wires snapping in walls, singing and humming sounds coming from wiring in walls, strong smell of ozone, light bulbs exploding, buzzing coffee pots, and a handful of other phenomena all took place just before the power went out at 6:20 a.m.

A typical example was that of Rob Steel. [Ed: Name changed for this report; his real name is in my files.] Rob lives four miles down the canyon from us. He had just turned on the lights in his barn and was getting ready to feed the livestock, when he realized he had left several needed items in the garage located about 75 yards from the barn. Upon entering the garage, he saw the garage lights began to flicker, then go to a dim orange glow. Upon stepping from the garage area, Steel saw that lights in the barn were so bright that he thought the entire structure was about to explode. He froze in his tracks for a moment and his whole house and garage began to hum. Then everything went out.

An interesting point to inject is that Mr. Steel's home and several others farther down the canyon from us are being fed from a different 19 kv power feeder source than the 14 kv feeder that supplies us and most homes in the canyon.

At about 2 p.m. on 11-9-85 I was in contact with the power utility company (Southern California Edison Company) to inquire as to the cause of the power outage. My first assumption was wrong. No power poles had been knocked down; only a ceramic fuse in the 19 kv feeder system had blown and a two-pole oil breaker had kicked out on the 14 kv feeder system. Load charge recorders at the power company show that both fuse devices kicked out at exactly the same time, but they are in no way common to each other as to load distribution. They only supply power to adjacent areas.

Also, the phone company has no record of its service being out, yet the phone service was restored when the power was restored. The phone company does not use Edison Company's power to power its phones. Again, the only commonality is that the phones and phone lines were in the same area.

Numerous magnetic breakers, used as manual switch devices for well pumps and other services, were on when power was returned. These switches had previously set in their off state.

A strong electrical-type ozone odor was detected at five locations at the time the power went out.

Later we found that a Research and Development laboratory in a nearby area measured 29 Hz intermittent signals late on the night of 11-8-85. These signals were interfering with some critical tests the lab personnel were trying to accomplish. The laboratory itself did not experience a power outage.

At this point in time, the only realistic surmise we can come up with is that a tremendous ELF or scalar ground wave was adding and subtracting to the grounded neutral service side of the power pole transformers so as to sum in and out of phase. When peak nodes were achieved, all line transformers ended up back-feeding the feeder lines out of phase, causing the final power outage.

Twenty-one persons are aware of the strange conditions of the power outage and prior events. [Ed: Their names are in my files.]"

Editor's comment: Another anomalous power outage also occurred in the same area. This occurrence is possibly associated with effects of the scalar interference grid adjustments. If the Soviets were preparing for a major test of the grid in the Launch Phase ABM mode, substantial tests and exercises may have been performed before the actual "wet run" against the shuttle launch on Nov. 26, 1985 -- about two and a half weeks after the anomalous power outage at Carlisle Canyon.

See the Rogers' patents, referenced above, for ideas of how scalar EM signals couple to the power lines and telephone lines.

As this book goes to press, John Bedini has notified me that his new and very sensitive developmental scalar detector positively verifies scalar frequency "spike" activity on the Woodpecker grid (and possibly the ground reference) from 50 Hz to 10 MHz. A normal instrument will definitely not see these signals. John's lab is at Sylmar, California and about 70 miles from Carlisle Canyon.

5. During the Skylab mission, NASA astronauts observed and photographed a mysterious green glow of the atmosphere. The glow was over 1,000 miles long and over 100 miles wide. From Carlisle Canyon, Ventura County, California the sky has also been observed to possess a mysterious green glow from horizon to horizon, on three occasions. [Editor's comment: It is hypothesized that this green glow is associated with grid activity in the Launch Phase ABM System mode.]

6. Just prior to the hapless launch of the Challenger on Jan. 28, 1986, the Soviet Union sharply bent the jetstream down through the center part of the country, then curved it eastward across the Florida panhandle. This exposed the waiting Challenger on the launch pad to severe cold air, brought down from Canada by the sharply deviated jetstream. The use of the scalar interferometry aspects of the Woodpecker grid for weather engineering over the U.S. has been documented previously. [Bearden, Soviet Weather Engineering Over North America, 1-hr. videotape, 1985;

Bearden, "USSR: New beam energy possible?", Defense & Foreign Affairs Daily, 13(111), June 12, 1984, p. 1-2.]. Wilson's cloud radial sightings on Jan. 26, 1986 and Cole's giant cloud grid sightings on Jan. 24, 1986 are directly connected with adjusting the Woodpecker grid and deviating the jetstream, to carry cold air to the Florida launch site.

7. The previous testing of the grid in the Launch Phase ABM/Anti-bomber Mode, using actual jet aircraft as "wet-run" targets, has been demonstrated by various anomalous incidents.

As one probable example, see "Jetliner drops 32,000 feet; 400 aboard; 50 are injured," AP release, Huntsville Times, Feb. 20, 1985, p. 1 and "China Airlines Pilot Denies Cockpit Error," AP release, Huntsville Times, Feb. 21, 1985, p. A-9. In this incident (see figure 7) a Boeing 747, flying at 42,000 feet and bound for Los Angeles, experienced unusual engine flameouts while still out from San Francisco. In a hair-raising plunge toward the earth, the pilot fought to restart the engines and regain control of the aircraft. After a fall of some 32,000 feet in two minutes, the engines finally restarted, and the pilot was able to fly into San Francisco and land safely.

We have already explained how the Soviets are able to track the aircraft's jet engines. Later in this Appendix we show just how accurately an actual "scalar EM missile" may be focused by the Soviets on a hapless target. If a negatively biased pulse or continuous wave scalar EM "energy extraction" beam hits the engines, the extraction of energy will result in engine flameout. (No heat energy, no combustion of the fuel.). This is apparently what happened to this aircraft. In the presence of "splatter" from the extraction beam targeted at the engines, the aircraft instruments were seriously affected. Different instruments have different responses to such an anomalous scalar EM kindling effect. Thus a signature would be that the instruments disagree with each other, and need not record what actually occurred. This appears to have been the case, constituting a signature that scalar EM was targeted against the aircraft. The pilot's instruments apparently indicated that the control system had failed, while the flight recorder apparently indicated that it had not.

Let us assume this was a Soviet test. When the distant Soviet operator turned off the extractor beam, the engines returned to normal state after a "discharge time constant" period. They normalized before the plane struck the ground, so the pilot was able to restart the engines and proceed.

Notice that this was a limited test to cause engine flameout only. If the scalar EM missile had been used against the aircraft in the "pulse" mode, it would instantly have exploded in mid-air.

The crash of an India jet aircraft outside Great Britain may have been a test of the same weapon in the pulsed "destroy aircraft" mode, since there are indications that the aircraft suffered an anomalous midair explosion. Another candidate for such a possible "shoot-down" of a jet aircraft is an (Italian) Itavia DC-9 that crashed into the Mediterranean in June, 1980. Both Itavia and the Italian Transportation Minister Salvatore Formica believed that a missile struck the jetliner and was the likely cause of the crash. It may have been a scalar EM missile and a full-up test by the Soviet Union. See "Plane was probably hit, judge says," Birmingham Post-Herald, Jan. 17, 1981.

Also the present author has knowledge of at least one instance in the early 1980's when an American-made tactical ballistic missile was anomalously destroyed shortly after being launched by troops in Europe. The destruction was anomalous and a large hole was inexplicably burned through the side of the missile -- exactly as if it had been struck by a scalar EM missile test in the anti-tactical missile (ATM) role.

8. As another example of airborne scalar EM activity in the Woodpecker grid, in January 1985 a U.S. Navy-dispensed chaff cloud, dispensed well-offshore from San Diego, California was caught by an unexpected wind and blown toward the city. (See figure 8.). As the chaff cloud moved in, significant failures of electrical systems and electrical components resulted. Power was disrupted to as many as 60,000 homes by the incident.

The sudden, unpredicted wind was suggestive of a wind blowing toward an artificially created low pressure area. Under certain conditions, a specialized structure such as that of a piece of sophisticated chaff will reflect scalar waves of frequencies within its cut bandwidth. If scalar modulation frequencies within the chaff bandwidth were present on the Woodpecker carrier grid above and surrounding San Diego, a myriad of reflecting bits of chaff in the moving chaff cloud would produce myriads of random, invisible "fireflies" of EM energy kindled at a distance, from random scalar interferometry, in a zone surrounding the cloud. As these invisible "firefly" pulses of EM energy pulsed inside components of the electrical systems and electrical controls in San Diego and vicinity, extensive and random internal electrical interference occurred. This lead to widespread, anomalous electrical failures throughout the city.

Note that this activity preceded the huge Soviet scalar EM exercise of April-May 1985. The grand exercise would certainly have been scheduled well in advance by Soviet strategic forces controlling the scalar EM howitzers and Woodpecker grid weapons, and adjustments and smaller tests would have been being made for some months before the tests.

9. Other anomalous "electrical strikes" certainly exist, suggesting Soviet testing may occur widely throughout the world, yet be reported as ordinary but anomalous phenomena. An example which comes readily to mind is the anomalous blast (or blasts) that struck Bell Island, off the east coast of Newfoundland, on April 2, 1978. Persons on the shore of Conception Bay reported seeing fireballs coming down out of the sky and hitting the island, according to Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Highly anomalous atmospheric electrical activity preceded the blast. This may have been Soviet testing of scalar-created electromagnetic missiles. Extensive information on this incident can be obtained from P.A.C.E., 100 Bronson Ave., Apt. 1001, Ottawa, Canada T1R 6G8.

As another possible example, villages in an area of West Donegal in Ireland have been terrorized by freak "lightning bolts" for over two years. Roofs have been literally stripped off, windows smashed, telephones and television sets blown up, and pipelines wrecked. On Dec. 25, 1984 a mighty blast caused a three-day blackout: it accompanied a snowstorm, the first "white Christmas" in the area in 20 years. See "Bolts from the blue," Fortean Times, Issue no. 45, Winter 1985, p. 5.

10. Scalar spikes or pulses from the Soviet testing may also cause other anomalies, including deaths of unsuspecting persons using the telephone. For a candidate event of this type, see "Killer Phones," Fortean Times, Issue no. 45, Winter 1985, p. 8-9; also AP release, Huntsville Times, May 30, 1985; AP newswire June 2, 1985; and New York Times, Sep. 11,1985.

On May 21, 1985, five days after passing a complete physical examination, 17-year-old Jason F. Findley of Piscataway, New Jersey was on the phone at his grandmother's house, talking to his girl friend. An odd click occurred on the line, followed by a gasp from Findley and then only the TV playing in the background. His grandmother found him unconscious, still clutching the phone in his hand. Rushed to Muhlenberg hospital, he was pronounced dead shortly afterwards. An autopsy could not determine the cause of death, and the telephone company found the phone working properly, properly grounded, and no evidence of excess electrical charge. Findley was lying on a wooden bed which would not conduct electricity. He had a hemorrhage of the inner ear. There had been an electrical storm over Scotch Plains, New Jersey the night Findley died.

AP wire services were told by the special forensic investigator with the New Jersey medical examiner's office that about six people had died in the U.S. in similar circumstances. Others had reported being knocked unconscious by "high voltage shock" from their telephones. Several weeks before Findley's death, another man from Whitehouse Station, New Jersey had been found unconscious with a telephone in his hand. According to the Consumer Product Safety Commission in Washington, D. C., in 1984 nearly 12,000 people in the U. S. were taken to emergency rooms with injuries related to telephones. A hundred of them died, although exact details were not revealed.

Note that the giant Soviet scalar exercise of May 1985 had been detected and verified by Golden. Substantial activity in the Soviet weapon complex, and in the Woodpecker grid over the U.S, continued throughout May and beyond. A phone line may by chance detect one or more atmospheric scalar EM pulses, just as occurred in the blackout in Ventura County, California on Nov. 8-9, 1985. These scalar pulses can travel along a phone line and be broadcast into a person's ear and brain from the telephone earpiece. The proper scalar EM pulse can induce both "acoustic shock" in the inner ear and "electrical shock" conditions in the nervous system. The pulse may also interrupt the body's electrical timing pulses to the heart, causing the heart to stop without physical damage. The scalar EM shock to the brain and nervous system can knock the person unconscious or, if sufficiently strong, kill him instantly. The condition is worsened if the person is ungrounded, since then he acts as a large, open-ended capacitance in series with the telephone instrument's inductance. In such case, the scalar resonance of the equivalent series LC circuit can be sharply excited and resonated. By the nonlinearities of the body and nervous system, the scalar resonance can be translated into an ordinary electrical pulse or resonance. Since the scalar power is not translated into ordinary power except inside the nonlinearities of the human capacitor/nervous system, no damage to the telephone or phone lines need happen. [At the ComTec exhibit in Las Vegas in 1984, John Bedini demonstrated powering a 200-watt speaker system through a 100-foot length of #40 magnet wire, using scalar EM means. He put some 200 "watts equivalent" of scalar energy through the tiny wire to the speakers, where a small Bedini translator translated it back into ordinary electrical "force field" energy, powering the speakers. This was much to the astonishment of the technical audience, since the wire was quite cool and exhibited no evidence of heating, even though by conventional thinking it should have been instantly melted.]

The bottom line is: With increased Soviet scalar weapons activity over the U.S., the telephone system is likely to become more hazardous to humans using it, when the instrument is connected to the external wire. A radio phone is much safer against anomalous scalar EM "spiking."

11. The metal-softening detected and verified by Frank Golden on Jan. 1, 1986 is certainly indicative of a new mechanism or effect added to the Woodpecker grid. The highly specialized nature of the particular detector/amplifier which Golden was using provides strong evidence that the signal was actually derived by recording the scalar EM signals produced by a human cerebrum (two cerebral hemispheres connected by the corpus callosum, forming a scalar interferometer) when the human was successfully performing psychokinesis (metal-bending). The fact that Golden was able to nullify the signal locally by special methods worked out by him lends further credence to this hypothesis. In any event, three hours of very objective experimental data strongly support this thesis. It is therefore indicated that (1) the metal-softening signal had been added for a purpose, and (2) something made of metal was going to be softened, leading to its failure. Certainly the Challenger would have been an ideal target; softening the metal on its boosters and fasteners by even a small percentage would significantly reduce the vehicle's ability to withstand the stress during launch. This of course is circumstantial evidence only, but the finger of suspicion is there nonetheless. It is a fact that the metal-softening signal was and is in the Soviet Woodpecker-repertoire; it is a presumption that it was intended for use against the Challenger.

- FINAL DRESS REHEARSAL BEFORE THE BIG SHOW -

12. The shuttle launch from Cape Canaveral on the evening of Nov. 26, 1986 seemed smooth as silk to the army of official observers and onlookers. In reality the Soviet Union clandestinely conducted one or more Launch Phase ABM System tests against the vehicle, using it as a convenient target.

Figures 9, 10, 11, and 12 are included to give the reader some preliminary background on the highly significant events which occurred in conjunction with this flight, and previous to it. These figures are newspaper articles from the News Tribune, Fort Pierce, Florida. The articles are used by permission.

Anomalous atmospheric "booms" and airquakes had occurred in the Florida area for over three and a half years prior to the launch. Sixteen counties, most of them on the northern Gulf coast or close to it, had reported booms during the two-year period preceding April 1984. State and local emergency preparedness officials and U.S. Air Force Base representatives met but could not resolve the mystery of what was causing all the anomalous booms.

In fact, many booms had occurred in and around the gulf coast of Florida, particularly offshore from St. Petersburg, starting from several years earlier.

These anomalous booms were caused by the Soviets adjusting and testing the Woodpecker scalar EM grid for weather engineering and potential weapons use. The booms and airquakes were certainly not confined to Florida alone, but also occurred at many other locations throughout the U. S. and Europe.

Mysterious, highly localized seismic microquakes also had occurred at widely scattered locations throughout the U. S.

On at least two shuttle flights prior to the Nov. 26, 1985 launch, large anomalous "booms" had occurred over or around the launch site after launch. No one in NASA knew what they were or what caused them.

So prior to Nov. 26, the Soviets had already prepared and tested the Launch Phase ABM system mode of the grid against at least two U.S. shuttle launches. However, so eerie and strange are the scalar EM weapons that they had been able to do so without the U. S. government even becoming aware of what was going on. In the Kremlin, they must have marveled at our continued ignorance.

At any rate, they tested the Launch Phase ABM system again on Nov. 26, and this time private U.S. citizens happened to capture at least some evidence of what was going on. It still would have died there without surfacing, except for a curious chain of events. Let me briefly recount those events.

Lucius Farish publishes a fine little monthly newsclipping collection called UFO Newsclipping Service (Route 1, Box 220, Plumerville, AR 72121). In it she includes clippings on all sorts of anomalies, including UFO's, strange light phenomena, etc. Because of my long work in UFOs (for some time now, placed on the back burner due to the press of my work in Soviet scalar electromagnetic weapons), I've subscribed to Farish's service for several years.

And this time my unorthodox interests certainly paid off. Farish published a clipping of the article, "NASA officials stumped by strange light, boom," by Susan Burgess, News Tribune writer (see figure 10). The moment I read the article, I realized that the Soviets had actually tested the Launch Phase ABM System's area mode against the shuttle launch of Nov. 26, 1985. Further, George Suchary had taken a picture of the marker beacon as it was slewed away at the conclusion of the test.

With alacrity I contacted Ms. Burgess and, through her, George Suchary. Both were very helpful, and Mr. Suchary gave me permission to use his important photograph of the light moving away after the test.
Ms. Margery Bril , the kind librarian at the News Tribune, sent me four clippings.

After reading the article by Julie Enders, Showcase Editor of the News Tribune, I contacted her also. Although extremely busy, Ms. Enders kindly gave me additional details, including the fact that Bob Gladwin had taken a series of eight stills of the launch itself, and in one frame an anomalous, curving line of light with a splash on the end appeared.

At first I thought it might be the answer to a dream. Very tentative information suggested that the "curved light with a splash on the end" might have occurred in one of the pictures taken during the launch sequence itself, with the light striking directly under the shuttle shortly after it lifted off. I was positive the Soviets could strike at the shuttle (or a missile) with a "scalar EM pulse" missile, but hardly dared hope someone could have actually been lucky enough to get a photograph of it.

From my acquaintance with two masters of paranormal photography -- the indomitable Trevor James Constable and a close friend, Joe Gambill -- I understood how one could possibly get a picture of such a strike -- assuming it occurred -- at night, when the same picture could not have been taken in the daylight. I also understood why the camera might catch it when the human eye would not see it.

It seemed that, between them, these friendly, cooperative persons just might have gathered together the positive evidence to prove that the Soviets had struck at the shuttle with an offset test of a scalar EM missile, using a marker beacon for adjustment. (As it turned out. it was not to be as definite as that!) However, time was of the essence.

The Soviet tests had definitely included a test in the "area burst" mode, which can catch and destroy several missiles fired from a deployed silo complex at once. The clinching evidence I had needed for so long on a Soviet test of the pulse mode -- the scalar EM pulse missile -- just might be there in one of Bob Gladwin1s photographs. But there was no time to lose; such evidence is fleeting. and unless I moved quickly, it was likely to fade away and disappear forever. With persistence, the rest followed swiftly. Mr. Suchary graciously gave me permission to use his photographs. These of course prove that the marker beacon was there. (In addition, it was seen by numerous persons.). The News Tribune gave me permission to print the articles. Mr. Gladwin furnished his negatives and gave me full permission to analyze and use his photographs. Personal friends, Everett and Shirley Edwards, printed the photographs in their private darkroom so the negatives would not be out of safe hands for even a moment.

At the time, this book was almost finished. If the photo of the candidate Soviet use of the electromagnetic missile was accurate, quick work would be necessary if it was to be included. My friend and publisher, John Ratzlaff. had already agreed to swiftly publish this large output as soon as I could get it to him. At Omni Video Publishing, Ms. Electra Briggs was alerted to the potential importance of what was coming. She and Mr. Glenn Shoemaker swung by my house from New Orleans, and a quick, informal videoclip was taped, announcing the book. (Murphy's law -- if anything can go wrong, it will -- got me there. Inexplicably, in my near-total fatigue from months of 19-hour days and 7-day weeks on this project, I spoke the date of the Titan explosion as April 19th, knowing full well it was the 18th! It happens. Electra suggested she slap a correcting statement over the video. Done. Be ready to get it out. It's too important; don't sweat the small stuff.)

Zerox copies of the photos were received. There in the fifth photo (or so it seemed) was an unequivocal strike of the scalar EM missile, in the launch sequence itself. The assumed strike seemed to have occurred right under the shuttle, a few seconds after liftoff.

The evidence seemed complete. All that was left was to receive the actual negatives and verify the sequence. At last we seemed to have the smoking gun. The Soviets would have been caught redhanded.

Based on the advance zerox copies, the manuscript was altered. Everything was ready. And then the negatives came in.

In this business, you learn to meet and accept a lot of failures. Things often go astray, and don't wind up as they seem at first blush. This time was no exception. Murphy got us again! The photos on the negative were in a different order then they had been on the zerox copies.

There's no mistaking the order in which the pictures were taken. There they are on the negatives, one right after the other, and clearly numbered. And the curving light with a splash at the end did not occur during the launch sequence at all. Instead, it was taken before the launch -- just how long remained to be seen. Everett and Shirley took the photo and developed it at both extremes: very dark and very light, to bring out all the details possible.

The results were most interesting. As shown on the lighter print (figure 13), the light does not curve down out of the sky and strike toward the ground, it turns up toward the sky and strikes above the distant treeline. Further, as shown on the darker print (figure 14), it does consist of a little ball of light, just like a scalar EM missile would appear. No apparent structure to hold the light appears in either picture, though one could not positively rule this out completely without microdensitometer tests. (One can inadvertently get artifacts like this by focusing on a ball-like light bulb, for example, and then moving the camera while the shutter is still open. On the other hand, there is no evidence that this happened at all, and no street lamp post or other foreign object in the photo.)

We called Mr. Gladwin. He verified that the photos had been taken in order, one right after the other. He had not had the camera on a tripod, but had steadied it on a railing. In other words, the "light streak with a burst on it" had been taken just before the liftoff. Also, Mr. Gladwin had not observed 'the marker beacon, and had not attempted to photograph any such "light in the sky." In fact, visually he had not observed any such streak and burst of light in any scene he was photographing.

So the question is, exactly what did Mr. Gladwin photograph in that photo, just prior to the shuttle's liftoff? The answer is. we just don't know for sure.

Let's run through the two possibilities:

(1) He may have snapped an artifact while moving the camera. If so, the camera was definitely quite still at least most of the time the lens was open, for the treeline is quite clear in the lighter photo, which reduces light saturation and shows details more clearly. Further, there is no evident support or structure attached to the light itself; it seems to be a "disembodied" light. So this possibility is ambiguous, though reasonable. Mr. Gladwin does not recall any such movement of the camera; it was steady while he was shooting.

(2) He may still have snapped a scalar EM missile. If so, it means the Soviets fired a "small test" of the exothermic pulse or scalar EM missile in advance of the actual shuttle launch. Let's pursue that for a moment, and suppose it to be true.

The Soviets already had the marker beacon up in the sky -- that's certain. Many persons saw it. Soviet trawlers off shore and Soviet satellites could also have given the actual position of the marker beacon. Thus the Soviet LPABM System would have had (a) the actual parameters the computer had used to transmit the beacon, and (b) the actual location at which the beacon emerged. Comparison of (a) and (b) is much like having a "meteorological data message" in field artillery: One has the corrections to apply for specific conditions of the medium that cause deviation.

These corrections can then be applied to calculated or "table" data to adjust firing for real-world conditions.

So far so good. The Soviets had the exact position of the registration beacon, and could apply corrections for a shot of the scalar EM missile. They certainly would know the exact position of the shuttle on its launch pad.

If a fairly substantial offset for the scalar EM missile shot were used, "mett corrections" could be applied and a small scalar missile could be zinged in, stopping momentarily at the final offset "strike" position so that a track could be obtained by the scanner extraction beam. Then by comparing the detected offset position of the "burst" of the scalar EM missile to the detected offset position of the marker beacon, the difference could be applied to the beacon's true position to get the true strike position of the missile. The offset used could then be subtracted to give the location where the missile would have struck without the offset, had it actually been fired at the rising shuttle after liftoff. This "adjusted final strike position" could be compared to the shuttle's expected early trajectory (which varies only slightly from standard for the first few seconds) to determine the expected combat success of the shot. It's a little roundabout, but it's a very safe way to do it if one wants quite positive assurance that the missile will not strike the shuttle and destroy it. Since the Soviets delayed the "area burst" and its concomitant atmospheric "boom" to T + 12 minutes, it is evident that a large offset was used for the area strike -- probably about 10 extra minutes -- to positively assure that there would be no actual damage or threat to the shuttle.

It seems logical, then, that they might fire the small scalar EM missile well offset from the shuttle, and just before its launch, to prevent any possibility of actual damage to the shuttle.

So there you have it. Mr. Gladwin's photograph is consistent with such a careful, safe scalar EM missile test by the Soviets, prior to the actual liftoff of the shuttle. On the other hand, it's not possible to say with certainty that that is what it is. It may simply be a very peculiar artifact. In fac, if it were not for the other indicators, one would most certainly not consider such a bizarre possibility as an offset Soviet scalar EM missile strike at the shuttle.

If the "streak" photo is examined as a candidate for a sca1ar EM missile test, then one other thing must be explained: Why did the film capture the test when observers did not see it at all? That, of course, we can explain!

So back to our presentation. Here I'm going to assume -- and accent that this is a postulation -- that the Gladwin photo actually represented a scalar EM missile test. We will run through a possible sequence of events, based on that assumption. We will hypothesize the LPABM system operation and the Soviet conduct of the test. The major events here in the U.S. may be quite real; those assumed to occur in the Soviet Union, of course, are "author's license" -- but hopefully realistic.

The evening of Nov. 26, 1985 is perfect. At Cape Canaveral, the shuttle Atlantis is poised on its launch pad waiting to move majestically into the heavens on its impending journey. As launch time approaches, everything is as smooth as a cat's whisker. There is, however, just one small anomaly.

A mysterious light is hanging up in the sky, staying still for awhile, then gently rocking back and forth. The light is a Soviet marker beacon for a scalar EM howitzer. The howitzer, employed in a special scalar EM channel contained in the Woodpecker transmitters and interference grid, will shoot through the EM carriers at an aiming point offset from the shuttle.

Since this is still to be a nondestructive test, no chances will be taken. The pulse mode will be used, and a "scalar EM missile" -- a bundle of energy buried in hyperspace around its moving zero-point in this world -- will be fired directly at an offset aiming point prior to launch of the shuttle. A substantial offset in distance will be used to prevent posing any danger of inadvertently hitting the shuttle on its launch pad.

The marker beacon is necessary for precision. Its desired position will be calculated and the beacon will be placed on station. By placing this source of continuous EM energy in the area, it can be detected by the scanning "energy extraction beam" and tracked by the distant Soviet operator. Soviet trawlers and satellites monitoring the test will report the true position of the marker beacon, which will deviate from the calculated location due to conditions of the channel medium (the Woodpecker beams) at the time. Comparison of the beacon's true position to its desired, calculated position "registers" the marker beacon and yields the "meteorological corrections" which must be applied to standard firing table calculations. These corrections can be applied to any further shot into the area to correct its aim, just as standard field artillery applies registration corrections in the target area.

When the shuttle boosters ignite, an additional track will be obtained from it. The offset from the received track of the marker beacon and the received track of the shuttle booster flame thus will give the exact correction or "shift" from the marker beacon settings that should be used to set the howitzer's aim. In other words, a "relative" firing, offset from the marker beacon registration track, will automatically compensate for any vagaries of the medium experienced by the beams in transmission.

The Russians, being excellent artillerymen, have simply applied the standard artillery technique of shifting from a known registration point.

The Soviet Launch Phase ABM System is cocked and ready. This is the last test in the "wet run" series in which an offset will be used. If everything goes as planned, future shots will move into the next phase, where actual U.S. targets will be destroyed. The two great powers are already at war, but one of them does not know it yet. Because of the importance of this last test before the next step in hostilities commences, Gorbachev himself is monitoring the test.

The countdown begins. In Florida a great many persons are observing the event. George Suchary has already spotted a strange light hanging in the sky, where none ought to be. Bob Gladwin, resting his camera on a railing, prepares to snap his first picture so that he will be sure to have a sequence completely across the launch.

Deep within the Soviet Union, a large display screen is illuminated. The marker beacon's track is clearly shown on the display, as are synthetic symbols for the shuttle on its launch pad, several Soviet ships off the coast of Florida, and several Soviet satellites.

The control officer barks, "Missile test! Proceed!" The simulation officer presses a switch, and a simulated shuttle launch track appears.

The operator responds immediately, "Launch detected!" The identification officer, scanning the frequency components and the signature of the energy extracted from the launch, calls out, "Missile! Target hostile!" He presses a button, and a light illuminates on the panel, marking the target as a hostile missile. The launch track begins to blink.

The control officer announces, "Prepare to fire!" "Pulse mode!" "Strength one!" "Test!" "Apply burst offset!" The operator rapidly flips switches, setting the mode of fire and the offset. Instantly lights light to show that the computer has computed the shift and offset, and corrections. A red "Ready to Fire" light illuminates and a low siren begins its wobbulating growl.

The control officer orders, "Fire!" The operator presses the fire switch. A "Fire" light appears. A slight, deep shudder is felt briefly as the howitzer fires its scalar EM pulse missile of deadly energy. On the screen, the path of the scalar EM missile is traced out as it speeds toward its target far over the horizon.

In Florida, George Suchary is getting more and more curious about that pesky light. Bob Gladwin is preparing to snap his first photo as the final seconds of the countdown tick away.

On the distant Soviet screen, a sudden small burst appears, superposed over the synthetic shuttle track. The operator yells, "Burst!" On a smaller screen, a vertical profile shows the strike directly underneath the target. Immediately a blinking "Target Killed" light appears as the computer assesses the shot a kill.

The operator excitedly calls out, "Kill !" "Direct Hit!" Cheering breaks out from the firing team and the onlookers. Gorbachev and his entourage are smiling broadly and clapping. The cheering quickly hushes as the crew and participants continue to watch the track of the rising shuttle, and prepare for the launch and the next test.

Bob Gladwin has snapped his first picture (figures 13 and 14) leaving the shutter open a bit to allow for the nighttime conditions. As luck would have it, the scalar EM missile strike Occurs during the time the shutter is open. The film has captured the strike by a special process, even though human eyes have not seen it. (We will explain that shortly.).

At 7:29 the Atlantis's boosters ignite and the vehicle begins to rise smoothly off the launch pad. She will continue to rise, then pitch over to a 45 degree angle and proceed down range..

Bob Gladwin is snapping pictures regularly, one after the other.

In the local Florida area, hundreds and hundreds of persons are watching the flawless launch. The tip-off of the Indian River Community College basketball game and the St. Lucie County School Board meeting are held up while participants watch the Atlantis begin to rise serenely upward.

In the Kremlin, another track has appeared on the control screen display. Once again the sharp-eyed operator snaps, "Launch detected!" The identification officer, scanning the frequency components, tersely rasps "Missile! Target hostile!" Again he presses a button, and a light lights on the panel, marking the target as a hostile missile.

The control officer orders, "Simulate multiple firings!" The simulation officer acknowledges, "Multiple firings simulated!" and presses a button to cause the computer to simulate multiple launches on the display.

Immediately other synthetic target tracks begin to appear on the display screen, one by one, clustered around the shuttle launch at various separation distances, pre-arranged to represent multiple firings from a missile silo complex for this exercise. A special audio alarm sounds as each track appears.

The operator immediately calls out, "Multiple tracks! Missile launches!" and then "Identified hostile!"

The control officer orders, "Prepare to fire!" "Area pulse mode!" "Test!" "Apply time offset ten!"

The operator flips switches rapidly, acknowledging. Lights illuminate on the console, showing status of preparation for firing. The "Ready to Fire" light illuminates and the low siren begins again.

Back in Florida, Bob Gladwin has stopped snapping photographs. George Suchary has gone into his house to find his Polaroid camera and take a picture of that pesky light still hanging up there in the sky.

Back in Russia, the fire control officer orders, "Fire!" The operator presses the fire switch. The "Fire" light illuminates, immediately blinking, and the siren changes tone. On the display screen, all target tracks are blinking. A large light on the console comes on, showing that an "exercise time offset" of 10 minutes has been applied. A digital clock starts ticking off the minutes.

Minutes pass as the offset time ticks down.

Back in Fort Pierce, George Suchary is coming out to take photographs of that darn light, which is still hanging up there!

Folks are streaming back into the Indian River Community College gymnasium for the basketball game. Attendees at the St. Lucie County School Board meeting are wandering back inside, to get ready for the meeting.

More minutes pass.

Back at the control console in the Kremlin, the offset clock ticks down to zero. The siren ceases its wobbulating tone and holds a steady note. The "Fire" light ceases blinking and illuminates with steady brilliance. A deep shudder is felt as the howitzer fires again. On the screen, the rapid trace of the mighty scalar EM serpent is shown as it races toward its target.

Suddenly it reaches the target area, and a large blossoming light appears, covering all the target tracks. The operator announces, "Burst!"

All the target tracks flare brightly, then dwindle and die. The "Targets killed" light illuminates and the operator yells, "Kill! All targets killed!"

Wild jubilation breaks out. Everyone is grinning and clapping. Gorbachev personally congratulates the fire control officer and pumps his hand. The tension relaxes visibly. In the noise, the operator touches a joystick and slews away the marker beacon, preparing to shut down the system.

The final test has been a crowning success. Now the real first phase of active combat begins. "And the fools don't even know it yet!" a grinning Gorbachev delightedly announces.

Back in Fort Pierce, precisely 12 minutes after liftoff, high in the atmosphere above the launch site and a little downrange, a tremendous rumbling boom suddenly rocks the coast for hundreds of miles in each direction. The blast is heard as far north as Charleston and as far south as Key West.

George Suchary is taking pictures (figure 10) as the hanging light in the sky suddenly begins to move away, obeying the controls of a Russian operator thousands of miles away. Bob Gladwin has already finished snapping his photographs (figures 13, 14, and 15) of the launch and taken down his camera.

The anomalous light disappears rapidly in the distance, moving faster than any jet aircraft.

People gradually resume their normal activities, talking about the beautiful evening and the perfect launch. Many of them have noticed the strange light that hovered and bobbled in the sky, then sped away.

The final Soviet registration of their eerie weapons for World War III has been completed. A totally different kind of Pearl Harbor -- more akin to a Trojan Horse -- has been prepared for the unsuspecting United States.

Countdown toward Armageddon begins.

George Suchary's photograph of the marker beacon, just after it had started slewing away, is shown in figure 10, as printed in the News Tribune.

Bob Gladwin's photographs of the shuttle launch are shown in figures 13, 14, and 15.

Figures 13 and 14 show two developments of the same shot, one light and one dark. The light one shows the treeline in focus in the distance, with the light streak and burst.

Figure 15 shows liftoff of the shuttle and its rise and tilt over on the first part of its trajectory.

Figure 16 shows a possible detailed interpretation of the first Gladwin photo. The simulated aim point was offset from the shuttle, and the strike was directly at the offset point. The computer computed the burst strike strike of the scalar EM missile from the adjusted registration data, and determined whether or not the target was killed.

The control precision is shown by the small size of the scalar EM missile.

The strike of the weapon is caught by the camera, but not seen by the naked eye. None of the many hundreds of onlookers saw the strike, though all of them saw the shuttle launch.

There is a very good reason for that, though it is not commonly known.

Constable

The reason is that Bob Gladwin's camera was utilizing a form of photography pioneered -- to the best of my knowledge -- by Trevor James Constable. At least I learned about it from Constable's books and articles. I then told it to my good friend, Joe Gambill, and Joe applied and adapted it to the unusual photography which he performs. Both Constable and Gambill are masters of this type of photography. Once I got deeply into scalar electromagnetics, I finally figured out what was going on in this methodology.

Briefly, here's the way it works. Scalar energy, of course, has to be detected by some sort of interference phenomenon. There exists a very special way to get a camera to perform such interference for you.

In the EM spectrum, the infrared and the ultraviolet have a special relationship to each other. The ultraviolet is exactly twice the frequency of the infrared, if the two zones are properly chosen. In other words, the UV is the first harmonic of the IR.

The scalar EM energy, since it operates in the Kaluza hyperspace surrounding every point in ordinary space, may be considered to be composed of pure spin. (That is, it's moving in a dimension where each particle of that dimension is spinning). Harmonics there are spin harmonics.

In this photon-interaction produced level of reality (the ordinary world), the IR and UV bands are more closely connected to the "shadow world" in which scalar energy moves. Thus there is a sort of shadowy "swirling" of the scalar energy near the IR and the UV. Entry of the scalar energy into this world, through the IR and UV windows by a kind of "harmonic interferometry," is normally prevented by the presence of visible light. That is, visible light "squelches" the "paranormal channel" that lurks beneath the IR and UV zones.

To make use of the IR and UV interference source zones, Constable covered his camera lens with a special filter (18A) which is opaque to the visible light spectrum and transparent to the IR and UV. Note that the film is sensitive to the IR and UV region we are talking about, but the human eye is not.

When pointed at a sufficiently strong source of scalar energy, such a specially filtered camera has unique characteristics. It strips out the visible spectrum, but still admits the IR and UV spectrum. The scalar energy surges through these two source windows, and phaselocks harmonically. That is, the scalar energy entering through the UV window fits twice neatly in the scalar energy entering through the IR window. This interference, on the film, is (recall) swirling in frequency. The net result is that the film records the interfering scalar energy as visible spectrum energy.

Infrared film can be used to increase the response in many circumstances.

Both Constable and Gambill have rigorously proven this technique in literally thousands of "paranormal" photographs. (They do not necessarily use my scalar EM terminology, but the technique is rigorous and works, regardless of terms.)

Under nighttime conditions, sometimes the particular lens and film combination will phaselock between IR and UV for incident scalar EM energy. This is particularly true when a relatively strong source of IR is in the vicinity.

While Bob Gladwin was taking his photographs, there was no suppression of the IR/UV phase-lock effect by visible light because it was night and there was hardly any visible light entering his lens.

Thus his camera lens and film formed an IR/UV phase-locked interferometer that detected and recorded the strike of the scalar EM missile underneath the shuttle, even though human eyes did not detect it.

At this point it would be interesting to know whether NASA may have had IR cameras focused on this shuttle launch (which was at night). If so, it would also be interesting to know whether any of them may have developed the IR/UV phaselocked interferometer effect, and captured the strike of the weapon.

Note that daylight shots would automatically break the IR/UV phase-lock possibility, by jamming out the effect with visible light, unless a special filter is used to filter out the visible light but leave both the IR and UV.

One would hope that both NASA and the U.S. Air Force will take note and discreetly add a specially filtered camera to the instrumentation observing and recording all future daylight launches.

To recapitulate the major events at the shuttle launch on Nov. 26., 1985, see figure 17. A marker beacon was placed in the vicinity, high over the area, for precise registration and location of tracks relative to it. A scalar EM missile strike may have occurred just prior to launch, and offset from the shuttle.

Then the shuttle lifted off. The exercise called for simulating multiple launches from a missile field. The area code was computed, and the fire order given. A substantial time delay -- say, 10 minutes or more -- was used to absolutely assure that the actual shuttle was well away from the engage blast.

Twelve minutes after launch, the delayed firing in an area "multiple missile kill" mode occurred, producing a massive boom heard for hundreds of miles up and down the east coast. After the boom, the marker beacon was slewed away, and photographed by George Suchary just as it moved.

The shuttle moved on downrange and went merrily on its way, blithely unaware of the jaws of the tiger that had snapped shut behind it.

To the Soviets, this final test of the preparation phase was highly successful. They were now ready to increase the risk level and fire the first round of World War III.

13. On Dec. 12, 1985 the same Soviet weapon tested against the previous NASA shuttle launches and against various aircraft may have deliberately interfered with the controls of an Arrow DC-8 taking off from Gander Air Force Base, Newfoundland. At an altitude of 100 feet, the aircraft -- carrying over 250 U.S. soldiers and civilian crew members -- lost power and sank into the ground tail-low, killing everyone on board. It was a tragedy of enormous proportions to the U.S., and especially to the families and friends of the brave servicemen and crewmembers who lost their lives.

Three Canadian witnesses to the crash were interviewed over the Canadian Broadcast network television news on April 8, 1986 at 10:00 p.m. No flame or smoke issued from the plane before its descent and crash.

However, witnesses reported seeing the aircraft mysteriously glowing with a yellow halo. That is a signature of the use of a scalar howitzer in the "continuous EM emergence" mode, similar to the manner in which several F-111's were downed in Vietnam.

In short, the DC-8's electrical systems were interfered with by electromagnetic energy and noise created throughout each increment of spacetime occupied by the aircraft. A powerful charge was rapidly created in and on the aircraft structures and skin. The "yellow glow" seen by the witnesses was a corona due to the skin of the aircraft acquiring a high electrical charge.

Something also apparently caused the rapid loss of two engines, one after the other. This indicates that the distant Soviet operator may have struck at the engines, one after the other, with a scalar "energy extractor beam." Thus he apparently tracked the aircraft as it moved down the runway, then used two modes against it: one to create serious EM interference with the electrical systems of the aircraft, and one to disable the engines.

With its controls ineffective and power drastically reduced, the doomed aircraft sank to earth, still in its "tail down" configuration from takeoff, and crashed and burned.

Admittedly other factors may also have contributed to the crash. These included reduced lift due to poor engine maintenance, increased weight of the aircraft due to icing, and heavy loading. However, normally the aircraft could still have taken off and flown to its destination. (See "Arrow Air was absolutely safe, FAA official says," UPI release, Birmingham Post-Herald, Apr. 17, 1986.)

To date, no official seems to nave recognized the sinister significance of the "yellow glow" or what it implies. No one seems to have connected the loss of this aircraft, the mysterious booms over U.S. shuttle launches, the Woodpecker interference grid, the anomalous loss of the U.S.S. Thresher, the high altitude "booms" off the east coast of the U.S. some years back, the puzzling loss of two critical Titan launch vehicles in a row, anomalous engine flameouts of civilian jetliners, etc.

Certainly officialdom has not recognized that a Soviet Launch Phase ABM System is being tested directly over its collective head, to include actual destruction of U.S. aircraft, missiles, and space vehicles with concomitant severe loss of American lives.

Direct and diabolical acts of war have been committed upon us by the Soviet Union, but in a fashion that still eludes our erstwhile pundits.

However, it is not as simple as that. To even energize giant scalar EM weapons is to run a risk -- to all mankind -- so horrendous that it boggles the imagination. Truly it deserves Brezhnev's 1975 phrase, "...more frightful than the mind of man has ever imagined."

Shortly we will reveal exactly what he meant.

- Apr. 18, 1986: Death of a Titan -

14. As this book goes to press, the last two U.S. Air Force Titan 34-D missiles fired from Vandenberg Air Force Base in California have blown up shortly after launch. The first one blew up on Aug. 28, 1985 just after lift-off. That loss has been attributed to failure of a high-powered fuel pump, causing a massive oxidizer leak and a smaller fuel leak. The second Titan loss occurred on April 18, 1986 when the Missile blew up 5 seconds after lift-off. Its loss is still under investigation and no determination of cause has been made. Apparently the shuttle and the Titan presently provide the only viable launch vehicles for launching U.S. "spy" satellites. The loss of these sensitive satellites -- if indeed they constituted the payloads -- cannot help but be damaging to our strategic surveillance capability. According to the Los Angeles Times, the single remaining KH-11 satellite was launched in December 1984 and, with an expected life of two to three years, it could stop functioning later this year.

Whether or not significant Woodpecker grid activity existed in the vicinity of the Titan launch of August 1985 is unknown at this time. However, significant activity in the grid definitely occurred before the April 18 Titan disaster and on the same day.

On Easter Sunday, 30, 1986 engineer Ron Cole observed significant cloud signatures of grid pattern activity, correlated with Soviet Woodpecker measurements. On April 18, the present author observed traces of a cloud radial over Huntsville, Alabama and took photographs of it. Preliminary reports from Thousand Oaks, California indicate extensive grid activity again on April 18, the day the second Titan exploded.

At least the second of these two missile destructions shortly after launch is highly suspicious, since the grid positively was active during that time. Also, a clear trail of Launch Phase ABM system indicators exists back to the massive scalar exercise of April/May 1985. The first Titan explosion in Aug. 1985 thus falls within the Soviets' "now let's test them against U.S. launch vehicles" period.

The second Titan loss follows highly suspicious losses of the Arrow DC-8 on Dec. 12, 1985 and the Challenger on Jan. 28, 1986. The same Soviet weapon system that destroyed those targets probably also destroyed one or both of the critical Titans.

At least, on the second Titan explosion, the Soviets left another signature. In one of the videotapes taken of the explosion, the marker beacon can be seen well , above the exploding debris, moving away from the explosion site.

See for yourself! Refer to "Titan Explosion Cripples U. S. Launch, Surveillance Capability," Aviation Week & Space Technology, 124(17), Apr. 28, 1986, p. 16-19. Specifically, look at the color photo of the explosion on p. 18.

Look well above the explosion (about one inch on the page) and to the left (about one inch on the page) of the center of the top of the fireball portion. There you will see a little light, caught in the very act of moving away.

At my rather frantic urging, engineer Ron Cole sought out a copy of the original videotape. He and a team spent two hours, going through this portion of the tape frame by frame. The light is there. It's real. And it moves on out of there, well above the explosion and independent of it.

It's the Soviet marker beacon, caught in the very act. Here I want to express my sincere appreciation to Ron Cole for his untiring efforts to nail this light down. Without his dedication to supporting this investigation, it would have been impossible to say for sure that the light was there.

So we have caught the bear red-handed, with his fingers in the cookie jar. If the marker beacon is there, you may rest assured that the Soviets destroyed that Titan missile, with very high probability. - More Frightening Than the Mind of Man Has Ever Imagined -

Brezhnev's unheeded 1975 characterization of these weapons as "more frightening than the mind of ran has ever imagined" has very real justification. In a moment we shall explain what he meant. We shall also explain why the Russians may be serious about substantial nuclear disarmament.

There is now a "balance of terror" loose in the world that makes the old MADmen's MAD concept look like a sunny day in Hawaii.

Let me explain just a little of what I mean.

The scalar EM can and does use an ordinary EM beam as a medium. Many, many scalar EM channels can be infolded into an ordinary carrier. Thus the amount of energy stored in the carrier as "electrogravitational" energy has little to do with the feeble amount of electromagnetic energy stored in the EM carrier signal.

Thus in one sense, when the Soviets are employing the big "continent buster" weapons, literally hundreds of millions -- or even billions -- of watts of energy may be infolded into the seemingly weak carrier beams. All this energy is in the scalar EM channels established in the carriers.

Plus which, the scalar beams are employed in a "standing wave" node. Each scalar standing wave is like a gigantic "capacitor": It is highly charged. Under normal conditions, it has a charge and discharge time constant as well. If something were to "short circuit" one of these huge standing waves -- say, one with a thousand megawatts in it -- all that stored electrogravitational charge would discharge through the short circuit into whatever is on the other end of the short, and into the ground itself. In other words, the earth itself in that location would receive a mighty electrogravitational pulse (EGP). The ground in a region surrounding the discharge point would "charge up" just like a capacitor, and would transmit the EGP as a hemispherical current into the earth and spreading around it. This is where the real problem cores in.

The problem, as originally discovered by Wilhelm Reich [orgone energy was and is real, and is simply one form of scalar electromagnetics], is that radioactive material has a very great affinity for this EGP and undergoes a drastic reaction to it. Crudely, it works like this:

Imagine the vacuum as a virtual particle gas. This gas is under extremely high "pressure" or, more correctly, internal Stress. This stress is a gravitational potential.

However, the stress of the ambient vacuum is normally about the same in most localities. So a chunk of radioactive material doesn't experience a difference in vacuum potential across itself or throughout itself. In other words, the scalar EM fluxes in and out of every part of the nucleus are very high, but of equal magnitudes. The radioactive nucleus, however, is "unbalanced"; that is, it has an extra bit of unresolved EG potential which it would very much like to get rid of or discharge, by spitting out one or more particles. That is, it would like to "decay" to a more stable configuration. A nucleus that is trying to decay to a more stable configuration is a radioactive nucleus.

Remember, the radioactive nucleus is involved in a tremendously dynamic virtual particle flux exchange with the vacuum potential. And a part of it isn't quite in balance in that flux. Sooner or later the right "bobble" in the input flux will come along, and the nucleus will decay and emit a particle and/or radiation. By measuring the level of decay activity in a certain amount of the radioactive material, we can determine a "decay constant," or basically the probability that a nucleus will decay in one second. We can then determine how long it will take that chunk of material to decay away to a stable, relatively inert material. Some materials only require a few minutes to decay, while others may require thousands of years.

Now if you suddenly and drastically change the stress of the vacuum in which a radioactive nucleus is imbedded, you change the potential placed on the unbalanced nucleus. You hit it, in other words, with a strong EG potential pulse -- an EGP. That instantly unbalances the nucleus and it decays explosively. That is, it changes the decay constant and the probability of decay.

Basically that's what happens in a nuclear implosion weapon: You hit the radioactive hunk of material in the center with a very high, imploding pressure wave, which is carrying an EGP. The EGP causes all the nuclei to decay nearly instantly, producing a nuclear explosion.

The bottom line is: strong EGPs wreak havoc if they happen to hit anything radioactive. Such as nuclear warheads, in missiles or in storage. Such as nuclear reactors. Etc.

Now do you begin to see the problem? Let me spell it out.

Suppose the Soviets have activated some of their giant scalar EM transmitters, to place a giant weather engineering grid over the U.S., or to knock down a Challenger or a Titan. They've got their scalar EM beams all charged up. One of the giant Woodpecker transmitters has -- let's say -- 500 megawatts in its infolded scalar EM standing waves. Everything is going good. They're socking it to the Americans and the Europeans.

All those multiple scalar EM frequencies they're using to form the patterns, etc. have to all be absolutely phaselocked. Therefore all the transmitters have to be rigorously phaselocked, too.

And suddenly something goes wrong. A major amplifier/transmitter controlling or stabilizing the phaselocking malfunctions. The phaselock is disturbed, and begins to quiver.

Emergency circuits react instantly, trying to stabilize the situation and restore the quivering phaselock. Little "shorts" are being applied to the circuitry and to the "giant capacitor" that is the scalar EM standing waves. Dumps and discharges of EM energy are beginning to flash in the transmitter and associated circuits -- and into the ground. These make the situation more unstable. Feverishly the emergency circuits struggle to contain this thing -- and Wham! they cave in, all at once.

Now you get a mighty and continuing discharge of the scalar EM energy in that standing wave back into the transmitter and into the ground. It burns out the transmitter. And the discharge continues as the "capacitor" drains all its EG energy into the earth in a giant pulse.

Around the transmitter site, the EGP is transmitted radially away, still very much like a standing scalar wave. It reaches the first nuclear facility. Let's suppose it's a nuclear reactor. Specifically, let's suppose it's a nuclear reactor at Chernobyl.

If you'll check Soviet Military Power, DoD, 1986 you'll find that there's a big ABM radar site not far from Chernobyl. And Canadian sources verify that one of the large Woodpecker transmitters seems to be sitting in that general location. Now check "The Soviet Nuclear Disaster," The Wall Street Journal, Apr. 30, 1986, p. 24. Check the small drawing in the lower right corner of the bigger drawing. Here you can see that a Woodpecker transmitter located near Chernobyl would ideally transmit nearly due west to intersect over the U.S., entering across North America from its east. Other Soviet "over-the-horizon (OTH) radar transmitters" go over the north polar regions, to enter the U.S. from the North. The two then form a giant interference grid over the U.S. (You can see that in Soviet Military Power.).

Suppose you were in the field in the U.S., measuring the Woodpecker signals. Suppose the stronger beam was coming from the east. You would be able to see this with your instruments.

Now suppose the giant transmitter near Chernobyl got into the type of failure we're talking about. The emergency circuits panic and cut down the EM carriers, trying to drain away the standing scalar waves in a controlled fashion. Then your instruments would suddenly record the "new" direction as coming from the north, since the east carrier is gone.

That's exactly what engineer Bill Bise detected out in California, about the time it appears the reactor at Chernobyl began to get in trouble.

Let's continue with our scenario. Suppose the emergency circuits at the discharging Chernobyl transmitter contain things for awhile. The standing scalar waves are steadily draining into the earth. The EG potential starts to rise at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant.

In the nuclear reactors, the decay constant of the uranium in the fuel rods changes. Additional radioactivity begins to pour out of the uranium. The reactor alarms go off, and the crew takes measures to reduce the problem. The control rods go further in, to slow it down.

But the EG charge keeps increasing. The radioactivity of the uranium continues to increase. The control rods go further in to counteract this. The electrical controls begin to act up, showing anomalous indications. The radioactivity increases. In panic, the controls are fought until the control rods go all the way in. The reactor should in fact now be shut down completely, in normal circumstances.

Things settle and hold a bit. The scalar EG charge increases. Finally the "shutdown" reactor starts to increase in radioactivity again. The control rods can't handle it. Everything is heating up, including the graphite moderator. Back at the transmitter, the emergency circuits finally are overwhelmed and give in. They fail all at once. The dreaded "uncontrolled short circuit" now exists between the collapsing standing wave and the earth. A gigantic discharge of EGP into the earth occurs at the transmitter site.

In the desperate reactor, suddenly a great EGP appears. Instantly the uranium goes intensely radioactive. A gigantic pressure of heat, steam, graphite and radioactive materials bursts out of the reactor, breaching the building and erupting violently into the atmosphere. The core melts down. The graphite moderator ignites. You've got the realization of the nuclear engineer's worst fears: core meltdown and reactor out of control. It's afire and spewing deadly radioactivity out by the gobs. And the heat! It's like hell itself opened up for business in this spot.

At any rate, something very similar to that seems to have happened at Chernobyl.

This author believes something similar happened in 1957 in the Southern Urals. (See Zhores A. Medvedev, Nuclear Disaster in the Urals, Translated by George Saunders, W. W. Norton & Co., 1979, p. 150.). In the Kyshtym area, an explosion of nuclear wastes stored underground occurred in the winter of 1957-58. The area for miles around was contaminated, and is still contaminated to this day.

Recall, Khrushchev spoke of a fantastic weapon in development in January 1960. Early prototypes of the weapon would have been in development and testing in 1957. Probably at that time there were no emergency control circuits to handle standing wave collapse, or only primitive circuits at best.

If the failure of a transmitter occurred in full-power experiments, the unrestrained collapse of the standing scalar EM wave would most certainly have produced a large EGP in the ground, and instantly activated the nuclear wastes stored nearby. Eyewitness accounts reportedly stated that the wastes exploded, and that is totally consistent with our thesis. It is in fact a scalar EM accident signature.

Any nuclear facility at all is an incredible and monstrous risk whenever scalar EM weapons are active.

Of course, one's nuclear facilities are at risk if one's enemy has scalar EM weapons and fires at them, as we covered earlier in this book.

However, they are at terrible risk even from one's own scalar EM weapons. The consequences ot a relatively simple electronic failure can be catastrophic; not only for the local nation, but for the earth as a whole.

To show what we mean:

Suppose a similar scalar EM accident -- such as seems possibly to have happened at Chernobyl -- occurs at some other giant Soviet "radar" facility. Further, suppose this particular transmitter is not too many tens of kilometers away from a Soviet missile silo complex. Just to really throw in the grit, suppose these missiles are the "big monsters" with--- say -- a 50 megaton warhead in each missile. Suppose there are 10 of them in the complex.

Let's say this accident occurs "catastrophically" -- that is, the emergency control circuits are overwhelmed immediately and a discharge of all the scalar energy begins at once.

A giant EGP strikes the earth, spreads in all directions, and strikes the waiting monster missiles. In their implosion trigger warheads and in their fissionable and fusionable payload, everything goes at once. Actually, it goes better than when normally triggered. So each one goes at about 100 megatons.

You've just had a monstrous 1,000 megatons of nuclear explosion in the earth. You get a giant earthquake. If it's not too far from the ocean, you get a tidal wave also. You get incredible amounts of lethal dirt and debris, radioactive and deadly, hurled violently into the air.

This is just about the equivalent of a "normal all-out nuclear war!"

And what about the other side's detection and early warning systems? Who's going to alert whom, and for what? How many missiles get launched?

I think you see the point.

And I haven't even covered what a giant EGP can do to humans. If it's truly a catastrophic failure, you can get an EGP that can wipe out half a mighty nation in one burst!

And if the discharge happens to tickle the Sun and Moon's feedback loops the wrong way, you'll get convulsions of the earth, mighty burps of the sun raining fire and brimstone on the earth, and a violent increase in the interior heat of the earth's molten core, with a concomitant eruption of that core right up though the mantle.

In other words, it could be "back to the beginning" for the earth, and start all over -- if, that is, some semblance of an earth survived.

The Soviets know full well the implications of their giant scalar EM weapons. (Remember, I estimate they have over a hundred of these monsters, based on Frank Golden's detection of their full-up exercise in April/May 1985.).

Scalar EM weapons have added a totally new dimension to the meaning of the word "terror". If one develops them and his adversary does not, nothing on earth can stand against them. So in Man's present state, the temptation to develop them is nearly irresistible.

On the other hand, if one's adversary already has developed them, one is already totally defeated unless one also develops them. Again, the need to develop them is imperative.

Yet, whenever one activates a large scalar EM weapon, one immediately places the entire earth in deadly peril. The slightest misstep, and it's curtains for everyone. And it's curtains for the earth as well.

So one is damned if one does, and damned if one does not.

We have reached the final turning point in human history. The clock is ticking away the last years -- or days -- of the lives of all humans on earth. There has never been such a threat.

We simply have come to the crossroads. somehow, all Mankind has to change.

Infatuated with the thirst for ultimate power, we are facing two doors. Behind one is a beautiful lady, and the fulfillment of all man's dreams: control of physical reality itself. Behind the other is the deadliest tiger ever dreamed of in our wildest nightmares.

Which is it to be, the lady or the tiger?

SCALAR EM INOCULATION AND ITS IMPLICATIONS

My appreciation goes to Gary North for his openly sharing the above important information with the public. Human nature being what it is, one or more of his more dire scenarios is going to happen sooner or later.

The problem becomes enormously more compounded if the hostile agent or agents possesses sophisticated scalar EM technology.

With scalar technology, there exists the potential that the worm or virus can be implanted from a distance. If scalar scanning devices of sufficient precision can be developed, then major software residing in a chip, a computer, or on a disk can be read from a distance. With scalar EM methods, the ordinary software "guards" are totally ineffective. The scalar "reader" could simply read off the software directly as the disk or device goes about its normal operations.

After the software is read, a germ or a virus is designed to produce a particular problem as desired and upon special stimulus. Then a scalar "imprinter" device is used to produce the necessary digital pulses directly upon the media in which the software resides. The required code has now been .implanted. In effect, the operating system has been injected from a distance, and contaminated with the desired "sleeping agent" -- germ or virus. From there on, it's just like Gary North's scenarios.

So the scalar EM technology can probably be used (at least eventually) to place "mines" in systems in advance, for damage or destruction at a future date. At least it's possible in principle.

However, it's not the injection of computers and equipment that bothers me. It's the injection of human beings. Here's generally how it can be done (and possibly is being done).

Basically, human brains have various rhythmic waves which represent "envelope pulsations" of the entire electrical system. However, it is not the EM force fields represented by these pulsations which are important: it is the summed-zero (scalar) patterning of the entire complex of neuron firings which represents the real activity of the brain -- and represents it thoughts and emotions. A storage system for these patternings exists, but it's a scalar pattern storage, not an E and B field storage. The storage system is in the nuclei of the tissues of the nervous system itself, not in electrical or electrochemical potentials.

At any rate, the human brain rhythms are also "riding along" relatively entrained to the Schumann resonance of the earth's magnetic field. So all the patterning of the brain is grouped together into giant overall orders, and one or more of these is normally synchronized to our natural environment.

If a varying magnetic signal of extremely low frequency -- say 10 hertz -- bombards the brain with greater power than the earth's magnetic field, it is possible for the brain's rhythm to be "forcibly entrained" to synchronize with that signal, rather than with the normal Schumann resonance. If a large number of brains are forcibly entrained to such a signal, and the signal is artificial, then a master coherent phasing of all the brains to the transmitted signal has been accomplished.

And that can be utilized -- and is utilized -- by the Soviet Union. On the Woodpecker signals, Bob Beck has detected up to 16 carriers, each with a 10 Hertz modulation, and with all the 10 Hz modulations in phase.

Let's stress what we're saying here. At times, the Woodpecker signals have shown 16 carrier frequencies which contain the same 10 Hertz modulation, and which are all kept coherently sync-locked.

If those signals and the modulations are strong enough, the brains in a targeted area demodulate the 10 Hertz signal and phase-lock to it -- actually, to them. At that point, the brains are entrained to a 10-Hertz driver, and 16 channels of multimegahertz frequencies are locked-in to the brain.

Now if the Soviets have broken the genetic code of the human brain (which they have) and succeeded in developing the ability to implant thoughts, emotions, pictures, etc. (which at least to a degree they have), then they can simply record the proper signals from human guinea pigs, using scalar technology and instrumentation. They can tailor those signals and add them onto the Woodpecker carriers, using scalar EM techniques. By using most of the sixteen carriers as a means to express Fourier frequency expansions, specific areas and functions of the brain can be targeted.

Notice that the distant transmitters al ready "know" the correct phasing; just use the 10 Hertz modulation signal as a reference. In that case, phasing takes care of itself inside the captured human brains.

The brain has a unique characteristic. If a signal arises inside it, it interprets that it itself originated the signal. Thus for the first time in history , true unwitting "robot" actions and emotions can be engendered in masses of human beings.

But it's still worse. The Kaznacheyev experiments (see references) proved conclusively that electromagnetic signals can carry and transmit cellular disease and death patterns into a targeted biosystem. You can rest assured that the Soviets continued on to actually measure and determine a wide variety of death and disease scalar patterns. All of that can be added on to the Woodpecker carriers so that the population in the intersection grid area is devastated. One can even test it out in advance by producing a modified pattern of a disease in the targeted populace, and keeping the percentage of brains entrained down to a small level. This lowers the number of persons "injected" from a distance to a small percentage of the populace. Then the outbreak of the "new strain" of a familiar disease -- such as influenza, pneumonias, and something like AIDS -- can be monitored to provide targeting and effectiveness data. Notice that a series of diseases was experienced by U.S. personnel assigned to the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, probably as a result of the so-called "weak microwave radiation" of the Embassy by the Soviet Union.

But that's not all. Much more subtle effects can be produced in the targeted populace, without anyone getting wise. Cancers and leukemias should be relatively easy to induce. Also, the immune system can simply be attacked directly. If done slowly, a series of common, ordinary diseases will just seem to get "tougher and tougher to cure." Actually it's not the disease that got tougher, it is the immune systems that got weaker. It is my opinion that precisely that sort of testing -- against the immune system -- has been accomplished by the Soviet Union against the U.S. since about October, 1985. A great percentage of influenza patients during the period from then until now have had complications. So much so that multiple sessions -- as many as 3 to 5 -- of antibiotics are necessary before the patient recovers. At least in the Huntsville, Alabama "hinge pin" area, that seems to have been the case. This author personally experienced this, having influenza and follow-on complications for a period of seven months -- something quite different indeed for him.

But it's even worse.

The human scalar EM nervous system ("inside" the ordinary EM signals and functioning of the system) also has its own resident "software." It has special storage media contained in its brain. its cells, and its genetic material, and its actual nucleons. All of these storage media are continually telecommunicated with via scalar EM means. The "stability" of what each of us is, is largely conditioned by those recordings. As personalities we literally "are" what we have experienced, felt, thought, and did. Our whole "functioning conscious system" has been evolved by our experience, and it continues to be "us" by means of continual reference to the record base.

I hope you now realize that the actual record base itself can conceivably be altered by scalar electromagnetic means, even from a distance. Even by the hidden scalar EM content of 16

Woodpecker carriers, locked into a captured brain and pouring in their deadly content. It is conceivable that even what one is can be taken from him, and what someone decides he will be, he will be.

A totally new -- and ultimate -- form of "slavery" has emerged.

Also, look at all this scalar EM functioning of the human system as a special kind of cybernetics. A scalar EM computing software and hardware system.

What if scalar techniques are used to plant "worms" and "viruses" in this system? With hidden triggers? What about a series of them, so that a range of "eruptive software diseases" can be stimulated at will?

And guess what. Such scalar EM "worms" and "viruses" can even be induced by contact with or consumption of "contaminated" water and food. Or saliva. Or other body fluid.

So you can see the possibilities of "seeding" a population with a staggering variety of time-bombs.

I think you begin to see the point. Now you can change North's "Soviet blackmail" scenario drastically. In a new scenario, Gorbachev simply announces to Reagan that a graduated series of specific sweeping changes are going to happen in our population -- changes which we are absolutely powerless to stop. The last stages are various deaths. The master "trigger" for this series has already been initiated. Incidentally, the Soviet populace has been carefully "seeded" with the proper antidotes. The Russian leader demands certain things (very similar to what North's scenario utilized). Unless his demands are met, a "killer virus" will be activated by a special signal. If so, everyone dies. The first step change in the series will start to occur in a few hours. And it does.

In fact, this scenario could be added to North's scenario, and both used simultaneously. What do you think the President and the Congress would do? Or could do?

There are other even more diabolical possibilities, but these should be quite sufficient to illustrate the point.

Pandora's box has already been spilled, and the end of humanity is ticking away like a time-bomb. It's already nearly midnight, and the watchman hasn't even sounded the alarm yet.

I certainly can anticipate the next question: Have the Soviets already "seeded" the populations of the U.S. and other selected western nations with scalar EM viruses and germs"?

The answer is, I simply don't know. And just like Gary North, I don't know what if anything can be done about it if they have. This researcher certainly doesn't have all the answers. An immediate national crash program to develop scalar EM defenses is essential if we are not simply to be crushed beneath the hammer and sickle. It takes funding, people, facilities, and time.

In some 22 years of unrelenting struggle to convince the system we've got a terrible problem, I've hardly been able to move it off dead-center (no pun intended). This book, produced under extreme workload stress, is all I can do to raise the alarm. I've given it my very best shot.

What happens now remains to be seen. Other hands, hearts and minds are going to have to take up the task and carry it forward. This researcher has reached his limit, and has no more left to give.

COMPUTER WORMS AND VIRUSES, AND THE IMPACT OF SCALAR EM

Source: - Gary North, "Electronic Aids (Parts 1 and 2)," Remnant Review, 12(20), Nov. 1, 1985, p. 1-8; 12(20), Nov. 15, 1985, p. 1-8. POB 8204, Fort Worth, TX 76124. Phone (817) 595-2691.

Annotation: - Two deliberately un-copyrighted issues to alert the public to software worms and viruses, and their implications for drastic interruption of society. Describes a hypothetical scenario in which drastic scrambling and destruction of banks' computer tapes, files, and records occur due to software worms and viruses. Written in first person by Gary North. [Slightly edited.]

Article: - "Worms." Earlier this year, I read a very interesting article on a major problem facing computer software (programs) development companies. A program comes on one or more 5.25-inch plastic discs. It takes only a few seconds to copy a program on one disc to a blank disc, which costs $3. Yet these programs normally run at least $250, and usually sell at $495, and sometimes cost thousands. Very few are less than $100. So you have a major temptation: make a $500 asset out of a S3 asset. Insert the $500 program into drive A, write "COPY A:..B:" and hit the "enter key;" sixty seconds later, you have a $500 program in drive B.

There are ways to make this copying more difficult. The companies code the programs, and force you to have a control disc in drive A at all times. These "copy protected" programs are a hassle for users. We cannot put them on "hard (big) disc" easily, and sometimes the control disc dies for some reason. Then what? Your data are locked in your hard disc or on a floppy disc, but you can't get to the data because the control disc is not functioning. You order a replacement. Weeks go by.

Last year, several firms came up with a solution. It is called a worm. A worm is a command that is built deep into the complex code that creates the program itself. These are incredibly complex codes, and it is easy to bury a command in them. They cannot be traced.

What does the worm do? It "eats" things. Say that you are a software thief. You make a copy of a non-copy-protected disc, either to use on a second computer, or to give (or sell) to a friend. The program works just fine. But when the program is copied to a new disc, the worm is "awakened." It bides its time, maybe for many months, maybe for years. The program's user is blissfully unaware that a monster lurks inside his pirated program. He continues to enter data, make correlations, etc. He becomes completely dependent on the program.

Then, without warning, the worm strikes. Whole sections of the data disappear. Maybe the data storage disc is erased. Maybe it is just scrambled. Even his backup data discs have worms in them. Everything he entered on those discs is gone. Forever.

Can you imagine the consternation of the user? He has become dependent on a booby-trapped program. His business could simply disappear. For the savings of $500 (stolen program), he could lose everything he has.

Several firms threatened to insert worms into their programs. But then they backed off. They are afraid that lawsuits initiated against them might go against them in court. They could be hit for damages suffered by the thieving victims. Juries might decide that the punishment, a bankruptcy) was too much for the crime (a $500 theft).

So far, no worms are lurking in any commercial software programs — as far as I know and the industry knows, anyway. But what if a disgruntled programmer was to hide one in a master copy of, say, Lotus 1-2-3, the most popular business program on the market? What if ten thousand copies a month go out for, say, three years? Then, without warning, every company that has started using them loses three years of data? They sue Lotus. Lotus goes bankrupt paying lawyers. No company in the industry is willing to talk about this sabotage threat publicly. Obviously.

LARCENISTS

I just happened to stumble across an article on worms in a computer magazine. It occurred to me that it might be possible to use the worm technique as a form of deliberate sabotage rather than just as a copy protection device. But what did I know? I'm not a computer expert.

I know a computer expert, however. I mean, a real expert — one of those people you occasionally read about. In the world of business, they're called "space cadets." They operate somewhere in between the asteroid belt and Jupiter. But this one is different. He's a businessman, too.

I got him to sit down with me to discuss the problem of worms. It turned out that he has a real fascination for the topic. He tells me that there are advanced design worms, called 'viruses' by 'hackers' — computer freak programming geniuses. "The software virus is the most terrifying thing I've ever come across," he told me. And then he showed me why. My initial scenario is based on only a portion of his estimation of the threat. It gets a lot worse.

He gave me a 90-minute FIRESTORM CHAT interview. He must remain anonymous. He used to be a software developer for programs that were used in the U.S. banking system, but is now employed in a highly sensitive job in a related industry. Therein lies his problem. If he were to tell the story of what he is capable of doing to these banks, his firm might lose a lot of sales. He can't "go public." Let's call him Tom.

Let me summarize briefly some of the details he gave to me. They floored me. They're going to floor you.

(1) Jackpotting. The rush is on in the banking world to get automated teller machines (ATM's) into shopping malls, supermarkets, and in front of every bank. We've all seen them. Just walk up, punch in your card number, ask for cash, and you get it.

In a busy location, one of these machines can hold as much as $250,000 in cash, mostly small bills. These machines are controlled by computer. They are hooked up to the bank's computer system, usually by phone lines. This local line, Tom tells me, is what computer freaks call THE LOOP. The loop is wide open to tampering. He says that what computer thieves are doing is to hook up a cheap Apple II computer, tie into the phone lines, break into the ATM, and get it to empty itself. This is "jackpotting."

He tells me that ATM thieves are hitting banks continually, but nothing is getting to the press. The banks have yet to show a profit with the ATM's so far, which is understandable. They are hoping to get their machines placed in key locations, so "market share" is crucial to their plans. They are suffering horrendous losses in the short run in the hope that long-run profits will pay off, if and when a defense is developed.

The banks are saying nothing because of their fear that if the extent of the losses gets into the press, they will be forced by pressure from depositors — bank runs — to cancel the ATM's. The losses are horrendous, he says. At present, there is no known defense, given the communications technology.

(2) Rounding Off. This is the "preferred" computer bank theft system. Someone on the inside who has access to the software takes advantage of the banks' need to round off numbers. The programs carry numbers out to 13 places. Banks can't use all that space. So when they balance the books (interest rates at, say, 9.873), they just don't count every tenth of a cent. The program is assumed to round off the numbers randomly. What does the bank care? But the thief has set up bank accounts that absorb those random tenths or hundredths of a cent. In millions of dollars worth of transactions (federal funds, etc.), programmers in some cases have stashed away hundreds of thousands of dollars — maybe millions — over a few years. No one knows how much of this goes on.

How could a bank spot this? The books would always balance to the penny. How would the accountants ever know?

I think of a story that Adam Osborne tells in his paperback book, Running Wild. The president of a large firm was looking out his window one day, and he noticed two Rolls Royce cars parked next to each other. He inquired as to the owners. They were two men in the data processing department. He called in investigators, and the cars and the men disappeared. They fled to Brazil and took their cars with them; Brazil has no extradition treaty with the U.S. Years later, as Osborne was writing the story, the firm still hadn't figured out what they had done.

ARSONISTS

These are the fearful ones, far more than the larcenists. These are the practical jokers who get into a major data bank and trash things. It's a kind of multimillion-dollar "Kilroy was here" graffitti.

How easy is it to get in? Incredibly easy. The boy in "War Games" really could have broken into most firms' telephone-connected computers. Computer programs exist that allow the user to hook up his computer to a phone line and randomly dial numbers until they hear the telltale whine of a computer line. It then notes the phone number and goes on its way, searching out more lines.

They can do it by long distance, free of charge. The telephone company has a tough time tracing those who use various sorts of electronic black boxes to call anywhere on earth at no charge. Some people get caught, of course. "The tip of the iceberg," says Tom.

How do they get in? Easy: few systems are protected, once you locate the line. If one is, he says, you create a deliberate error. Most programs then collapse the protective shell, and the hacker finds himself inside the heart of the system. Tom has designed a program that keeps this from happening to his company's programs, but few companies have anything like it.

It's very easy to get in if someone has "logged on," — opened his terminal's connection to the main computer — if the system is connected to phone lines. Or anyone in the company can just tap in, if someone has left his desk and left the computer on. It's common to forget and leave an open terminal.

He showed me. He says anyone can get fired for leaving a computer on. He demonstrated his point. With 40 computers on line, he ran a quick search and found two of them "logged on," despite the fact that it was after hours. All the security in the world can't do anything if a computer line is open. It's like a burglar alarm; it's worthless if you leave the door unlocked or leave the keys lying around. That janitor you hired. Is he a computer illiterate? Or a plant?

Once inside, what can you do? Steal a fortune? Yes, if you really know the system. He told me he could easily steal $3 million from a local bank, even as an outsider. He would then offer to give it back and keep his mouth shut about how easy it was if the bank would pay him 10% the take. He thinks most banks would capitulate for fear of the publicity. In any case, he knows that he probably wouldn't get caught.

How about creating a new identity? The grade-changing scene in "War Games" is true. You could even create a new identity, give yourself high grades in any academic discipline, just by breaking into a university's database. There is very little security here, he says.

But for sheer vindictiveness, for sheer envy, consider the possibilities of a virus-implanter. He gets inside the computer for a major communications link: telephones, large information database, bank wire transfer, or whatever. Then he lays the egg: a tiny, untraceable brief instruction. Inside a huge database are just a few characters. These float inside a system, seeking to devour certain kinds of data, or executing certain routines.

There is a game played by computer freaks called "Core War." They try to implant these killer messages, which seek out each other and battle one another. If you find one morning that yours has been consumed, you lost the battle. That was probably the origin of worms and viruses.

TERRORISM

Say that a revolutionary terrorist group, or some anti-zionist group gets a "ringer" into a system. He might be a computer genius type. Everyone knows they are either oriental, dark-skinned people with accents, or teenagers. The firms don't hire teenagers, but they hire a lot of foreigners. They may even check the guy's credentials. Electronic credentials. (Ha!) Then they turn the guy loose in the system.

The virus is implanted deep inside the system. It can then be transferred to any other bank's computer by means of EFT (electronic funds transfer). Maybe it is triggered when someone with a peculiar name and address opens a bank account. Three days later: Bam! The data disappear. They haul out the back-up tapes. Bam! The virus is on them, too. It is a process of infection, contamination, and incubation. There is no known defense. Not yet. This is the bottom line.

ANTIBODIES

The designer of a virus can also design an "antibody." The antibody is a counter-virus agent that seeks out a virus and destroys it. But like other antibodies, it must be specific. The only way today that an antibody system can be created is to know what kind of a virus is involved beforehand.

Tom says that people are now selling antibodies at very high prices. Who is paying? Big companies that suspect that there is a virus present in their computers. In all probability, the guy selling the antibody created and injected the virus. But now can any businessman prove it? So he pays the blackmail.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

A Soviet agent or American spy working for the Soviets penetrates any of a dozen computers used by the military. He plants a virus. The computers talk to each other, and the virus spreads to all of them. It tells them to execute a certain routine when a certain command is entered at a missile-controlling terminal. That command might interfere with a routine that activates a missile or launches it. Upon reading that command, the virus shuts down the computer, or scrambles the executing program, or scrambles the data. No more "launch on warning." No more launch at all. Dead metal.

Scenario: The President of the United States receives a telephone call on the "red phone" — the direct link to Moscow. He lifts the receiver and says, "Hello."

"Mr. President, this is Michael Gorbachev. You must recognize my voice. I have very little time. I will come directly to the point. You have refused to back down on your threat to implement your Strategic Defense Initiative. You intend to go ahead with space-based weapons. My military staff informs me that they think that the United States has the technology to implement it, and that it could place my nation's military strategy in jeopardy. We cannot allow you to do this.

"If we allow you to deploy the SDI, it will be too late for us to respond effectively. Therefore, we are taking the initiative today. I issued orders this morning to put Soviet military units on immediate alert. We are abiding by your biblical rule to announce the initiation of hostilities before striking. Neither the Japanese nor the Germans gave us this courtesy. If you do not come to terms with us, we will launch a first strike against your nation in three hours. We will delay for one day, if you agree to follow a precise procedure that I will outline shortly.

"At one time we feared nuclear retaliation. We no longer do. Within two hours, you will know why not. I suggest that you instruct your ballistic missile team to prepare your missiles for a strike. Then, to prove to yourself that we no longer are concerned about retaliation, launch one or two of them. As far as I am concerned, launch all of them. But please instruct your senior military commanders to report back to you concerning the effects of their instruction. I suggest that you try launching three or four as a test. We don't care which ones.

"Mr. President, let me tell you what is going to happen. As soon as anyone attempts to launch a missile, that missile's computer guidance system will shut down. It will lock up tight, and you will not be able to unlock it within the time you need to respond to our attack. Two hours and thirty minutes from now, your nation will have no remaining Minuteman III missiles to respond with, should you finally unlock your frozen computers.

"I suggest that you contact your senior officers now. You will have to mobilize them within 60 minutes. The test should take about 30 minutes. I will telephone you again in 90 minutes to present our terms of surrender." Click.

The President calls the Joint Chiefs. If he is lucky, he will be able to locate two of the three in time. They will be paralyzed. Who wouldn't be? But in all likelihood, they will at least test Gorbachev's theory. They will order one or (wo missiles launched. The computer guidance system on both will shut down the system. They will try two or three more, with the same result. They will attempt to launch one from a submarine, with the same result.

The President brings in senior Congressional officials and the remaining Joint Chiefs member to the White House.

Exactly 90 minutes after he had hung up, Gorbachev telephones back. He presents his list of demands. First, the immediate removal of U.S. troops from Europe. Second, the withdrawal of personnel from Diego Garcia Island in the Indian Ocean. Third, the breaking of diplomatic relations with Red China and Taiwan. Fourth, the removal of all U.S. troops from Korea. Fifth, a moratorium on all debts owed to U.S. banks by the Soviet Union and its client states. Sixth, the removal of all Minuteman III missiles from their silos. Seventh, the return of all U.S. submarines to port. If he agrees, and the orders are delivered within two hours, the Soviet Union will delay launching a first strike. The President complies.

They might do it with our communications satellites, Tom says. You might do it with any aspect of U.S. data transmission. The virus could sit dormant in a system for years, and no one would know. Triggered, it would then strike.

THE WEST'S VULNERABILITY

The West has become increasingly dependent on computers. We can no longer function without them. The Third world hasn't. Neither has the U.S.S.R. Their technology is still pre-computer. They are inefficient, but they are far less vulnerable.

Tom says that the world of computers presumes that almost everyone is essentially honest, and that all the brightest programmers must be honest. They aren't. Thus, the members of the entire system — banks, national defense, large and small businesses, public utilities — have opened themselves to attack. The attackers are invisible.

"Nothing I have seen in all my years of computers scares me as much as this does," he says. "The system has been designed in terms of a far older set of standards, especially with respect to security. It is totally vulnerable."

He compares it to plague, or venereal disease. People copy each other's software to save a few bucks. They use public access databases. They use "loops" — the phone lines. Yet these transmission belts of information can become transmission belts of collapse.

This is what I have harped on for twenty years: the potential for a collapse of the division of labor. We become rich by means of a brilliant technology, yet we become dependent on it to an extent that no previous society ever has.

Centralized institutions are most vulnerable, but because we use public transmission lines, from microwave transmissions to cables in the ground, each local unit is vulnerable. Those who would choose to bring down the system need only plant electronic viruses in a handful of major common-use databases or transmission sources, and live years or ten years later, the disease hits.

It could bring down the system if technological defenses are not developed. Nothing on the immediate horizon points to a solution, he says. The silence of those who should know what to do indicates that they don't know what to do, but they don't want panic to spread.

Is this fantasy? Last summer a 23-person team broke in (by phone) to Chase Manhattan Bank's computer.

Break-in: - Continuation of part 1, a treatise on worms and viruses in cybernetic systems.

"Maybe you saw the article buried somewhere in your newspaper. I saw it in the New York Times (Oct. 19):

> "A group of at least 23 teen-age computer users broke into a Chase Manhattan Bank computer installation by telephone in July and August and "significantly damaged" bank records, the Federal Bureau of Investigation said yesterday.
> Chase officials insisted that no money was stolen or transferred out of customer accounts as a result of the break-ins, and said no intrusions have been detected recently. But Federal officials, in an affidavit, said that in several cases the youths changed passwords, preventing customers — and in one case a unit of the bank itself — from gaining access to their own computer files."

And where were these teen-agers located? In San Diego, across the continent! It gets even more ludicrous:

Federal officials said that most of the offenders were probably too young to be prosecuted.

Robert D. Rose, the assistant United States Attorney handling the case, said: "We're not yet sure what we are going to do. But these things can get out of hand — it did get out of hand — and we have to treat them seriously."

Treat what seriously! "These things?" What things? If they can't legally treat the electronic trespassers seriously, just what is the man talking about? He is talking about the topic, above all topics, that bank and government officials don't want to face: the vulnerability of their computer records.

I have seen no follow-up on this story in the conventional press. A brief article did appear in the computer-oriented tabloid, Info World (Oct. 28). It turns out that the students had broken into the fifes of Interactive Data Corp. of Waltham, Massachusetts, which maintains the bank's financial records. The break-ins were discovered in late July. They had obtained the toll-free 800 number which was restricted (Ha!) to Interactive Data subscribers. As late as October 9, an illegal entry was observed. In short, it took ten weeks after the break-ins were discovered to put a stop to them.

The response of the bank's bureaucracy was predictable. It will ever be thus: "Bank officials are claiming that the FBI exaggerated the nature of the activities of the suspected individuals. A spokesperson for Chase Manhattan said that Interactive's customers were not prevented from accessing their accounts and that none of Interactive's data was altered or manipulated in any way." In response, FBI supervisory agent John Kelso said that the FBI has sworn affidavits from bank officials that say data has been manipulated or damaged. "That sounds pretty serious to me," he volunteered.

Here is the capper: Interactive Data has 25,000 subscribers who are tied into that toll-free phone line. Try keeping tight security on a system with 25,000 users. Chase Manhattan couldn't. If they can't, who can?

And if Chase Manhattan Bank was vulnerable to 23 teenagers who are too young to prosecute, consider its vulnerability to just one envy driven genius who knows all about electronic viruses. The students that did this were apparently just goofing around. But what if just one malevolent computer freak decided to "get even" with Chase Manhattan? What if he had phoned in just once or twice, implanted a long-dormant data-killing virus, and quit? What if he had tied its detonation to, say, a calendar clock in the Interactive computer? If it took security forces from July until early October 15 to raid the 23 students' homes, they would never have spotted one break-in. They could not have traced it, either. Conclusion: we have a risk-free opportunity for electronic arson. We face a potential electronic epidemic. And when I say "we" I mean the entire financial system of the West.

Sure, all the bank "spokespersons" in the world will tell you, "No problem." But there is a problem. A horrendous problem.

At this point, it really gets interesting. Chase Manhattan Bank has just announced that we will be able to set up our own personal electronic banking facilities with them by buying an expanded version of Managing Your Money, Andrew Tobias' home financial management.

Citicorp and Bank of America have opted for Dollars and Sense a rival program. You will be able to pay monthly bills electronically, balance your "checkbook," monitor your net worth, buy and sell stocks, etc., etc., just by dialing Citicorp or Chase Manhattan. Fantastic! But despite all the assurances, I get nervous. Yes, I know no one will be able to break in and tamper with the numbers. But 23 teenagers shouldn't have been able to do it, either. And now we're talking about a lot more subscribers than 25,000.

Obviously, the master program used by the banks will prohibit easy entry. Unfortunately, someone has to write the program. Can you imagine the blackmail possibilities? Some hotshot programmer could build-in a bomb, and then threaten to detonate it. In fact, he could merely pretend to have inserted a virus. Who would want to call his bluff? Not Chase Manhattan, I would bet.

CORE WARS REVISITED

In May of 1984, A. K. Dewdney published an article in Scientific American's "Computer Recreations" column. It was a light-hearted-piece on how computer experts can get involved in playing this exciting game of "blow up your opponent's defenses." You know: recreation! In the March 1985 issue, he wrote a follow-up. It begins:

"When the column about Core War appeared last may, it had not occurred to me how serious a topic I was raising. My descriptions of machine-language programs, moving about in memory and trying to destroy each other, struck a resonant chord. According to many readers, whose stories I shall tell, there are abundant examples of worms, viruses and other software creatures living in every conceivable computing environment. Some of the possibilities are so horrifying that I hesitate to set them down at all."(emphasis added.)

It turns out that tne French nave been enjoying a novel on the international implications, Softwar: La Guerre Douce, by Breton and Beneich. A translation is scheduled for publication here by Holt, Rinehart & Winston. The study revolves around the sale of a high-power computer to the Soviet Union. The U.S. allows its export because it has a "software bomb" in it. When the U.S. Weather Service announces a certain temperature at St. Thomas in the Yirgin Islands, the program proceeds to subvert every piece of software in the Soviet Union.

A pair of Italian programmers was "inspired" by the translation of Dewdney's original article to dream up a virus (a virus is a computer-to-computer killer, whereas a worm is resident in one man's computer). They figured out that by infecting a disk operating system disk (these start computers and tell them what to do with programs and electronics), and then installing it on disks used by the biggest computer shop in the city, they could create an epidemic. They decided not to do it. In short, the only restraint is self-restraint.

A high school student in Pittsburg wrote a virus that was subtler than a data-destroying virus, which at least tells us that we have a problem. His virus created a plague of very subtle errors in the disk operating system. "All of this seems pretty juvenile," he wrote, but "Oh woe to me! I have never been able to get rid of my electronic plague. It infested all of my disks, and all of my friends' disks." He wrote a program to destroy the virus (an "antidote" to it) but it is not anywhere near as effective as the virus is.

Warning: do not copy disks from your friends' copies. This act of piracy could cost you plenty.

A COMMERCIAL WORM

Just a few days after I wrote "Electronic AIDS, Part 1," 1 read a column in the Washington Times, the conservative (Moonie-owned) daily newspaper. One of the reporters has a computer. He had purchased a newly released program from Microsoft Co., called "Access." Understand that Microsoft supplies the disk operating system that is used by the IBM PC, the most popular microcomputer. In other words, this is no backyard company. It is one of the two or three software giants in the U.S. (Its owner is under age 30, which tells you something about who is pioneering the microcomputer revolution).

As he was setting up his computer to take advantage of this telecommunications program, a warning flashed on his screen: "The weed of crime bears bitter fruit. Now trashing your program disk." Wham! He lost all his files — probably a couple of year's worth of work. Sure, he was probably smart enough to have made back-up copies, but think of the risk. And what if it had been a worm that kept silent for a few years, infecting all of his back-up disks?

He called Microsoft, and they gave him the runaround. They told him that they were not responsible. Some programmer had put in the worm in order to zap program pirates, but the journalist insisted that he was an original buyer. Tough luck, they told him. Obviously, they didn't know that he was a reporter.

Then he published his article. All of a sudden, the victim was not some average buyer. He was big trouble. Things started moving. InfoWorld (Oct. 28) reports that Microsoft has admitted that a programmer put in the worm, but without permission. The offending text has now been removed, we are assured. But what if it had sat in the master for three years? Here is the premier firm in the software.

This is not idle speculation. It has already happened, verifying my hypothetical scenario within a few days after I published it.

Can you imagine the absolute havoc that a dormant worm or virus could create if it were imbedded in all updates of Microsoft's masters of PC DOS and MS DOS, the operating systems for all IBM microcomputers and IBM-compatible microcomputers? It could cost the U.S. economy billions, and some microcomputer-dependent firms wouldn't survive. Any Microsoft spokesman who says, "It's impossible; it could never happen," has to explain how it already did happen to "Access."

ADAM OSBORNE'S WARNING

You may know the name Adam Osborne. He invented the revolutionary portable computer, the Osborne 1. Before there was an Osborne 2, the company went bankrupt. Compaq, the most successful first-year firm in U.S. history (over $100 million in sales in its 12 months of operations) and others built imitations that were far superior.

That isn't my point, however. Adam Osborne was "present at the creation" of the microcomputer industry. He created Osborne publications, and then sold out to McGraw Hill. He knows what is going on. In his delightful paperback book, Running Wild, which is a history of the microcomputer (desk top) revolution, 1975-82, he offers this warning. He says that three areas should not be allowed to be computerized: 1) bank money transfers; 2) the stock market; 3) elections.

All three are just about fully computerized. Another ten years, or maybe five, and they will be 100% computerized. Several firms allow microcomputer buying and selling of stocks (e.g., Charles Schwab), and New York Stock Exchange floor transactions eventually will be fully computerized, at which time it will be pressured to get rid of the "specialists" who make (and sometimes manipulate) the market, short-term — Richard Ney's hated "Wall Street Gang" — but the price of getting rid of them may turn out to be horrendously high.

"The great fortunes of the 21st century," Osborne predicts, "will be the legacies of the great computer thieves of the 20th."

Three years ago, I used a firm to supply computer services I needed. The head of it was a former businessman, quite young, and a true "space cadet." I've quoted him in the last issue. I call him Tom. He operated in a world far removed mentally from the rest of us. He is a nice fellow, a Christian, and a moral philosopher of sorts.

He ran the operations of the local elections. He did it fairly inexpensively. He told me why: "I want to keep these elections honest. It would be incredibly simple to rig the program to produce whatever outcome I wanted in close races. If I can do it, anyone with enough skill to set up the system could do it."

I asked him if he thought Osborne was correct in his predictions about bank theft. "It would be a piece of cake for me to steal three or four million from any local bank. I could go in the next week, offer to give the money back, keep 10% as a finder's fee, and promise not to tell the press how easy it was to steal. They would probably pay me my 10% just to keep me quiet."

Look, These people are geniuses. Worse, they are geniuses in a very narrow field technically, which is now being used to control darned near everything. This unique intellectual-technical skill is the possession of literally a handful of people, mostly under 35 years of age. They are "fooling around" with Chase Manhattan Bank's computers. What happens when a few of them stop fooling around and get deadly serious?

Computer program designers keep telling us that there is no 100% secure way to defend data banks. Maybe there will be a 98% secure system someday, but not now. To defend itself, the system relies on the integrity of youth. In short, self-government is the major defense.

And where have they learned self-discipline? In the public schools?

"NOW YOU'VE DONE IT!"

About four years ago, I read an article in the Rolling Stone, the tabloid aimed at rock music fans. It was the only article I ever read in that periodical. It was a gem.

It described a subculture of students at Stanford University, "hackers." These people are computer freaks. The mainframe computer at Stanford was cheaper to use after midnight, so from midnight to 6 a.m., the hackers gathered at their terminals. They lived on candy bars, junk food, and high-technology dreams.

One of the games they played was breaking into each other's programs. It was considered the mark of a master hacker to be able to crack another hacker's defenses. They would spend hours trying. They were "hacker-crackers."

One bright fellow then designed a classic booby trap. He wrote a program that warned trespassers not to tamper with it. This, of course, alerted every would-be electronic safe cracker to the challenge. It was a complex program, and it took days to crack it. Then, after repeated warnings, the successful trespasser got a surprise. Japanese letters appeared on his screen. Roughly translated, the words proclaimed, "Now you've done it!"

At that point, the victim's computer screen went blank. Then the names of all his own computer files appeared on the screen — files that may have taken years to assemble. One by one, they blipped off the screen. In horror, the victim would stare at the screen, unable to stop the process.

As it turned out, the booby trap was only a practical joke. It really didn't erase all the victim's files. It only listed the names, and then erased them. But for a horrifying few minutes, the victim wouldn't know this.

Hackers play games. Very interesting games.

The kind of people who spend six hours, midnight to 6 a.m., trying to break into each other's programs are different from the rest of us. Among their ranks are some highly individualistic people. Some of them are libertarians. I mean anarchists. They are electronic "don't tread on me" sorts of people. They do not appreciate bureaucracy. They appreciate being pushed around even less.

The folks at Chase Manhattan really do have a problem. Do you attempt to prosecute a legally un-prosecutable kid? A kid who has already cracked your computer system? I don't think you do. You play the role of stern but appreciative banker. "Son, I am impressed by your ability to break in. But understand, we are honest people. There is a code of honor here. You wouldn't want to break that code — of honor, I mean — would you?" Because if this kid gets angry, he can do it again. Quietly. And next time, he deposits a virus.

Of course, Chase may hire a programming team to create an unbreakable system. Sure. "Hire fox A. Give him chain link fence B. Hire him to build fence B around chicken coop C."

TEEN CHALLENGE

Suppose that the public gets wind of the threat to the whole banking system that is posed by viruses. What do the bankers (or anyone else) announce to the public? "We want to assure you that our computer program is impenetrable. No one can break in. It is foolproof."

Here is the challenge — rather like the Stanford program that announced: "Do not trespass." These kids see breaking-in as a challenge, a kind of sport. They do not regard it as theft. They do not regard it as vandalism, even if it costs a company millions of dollars to unscramble. They may be ethical in other respects, but they think of "core wars" as a game.

How would you like to be the 60-year-old banker who doesn't know a byte from usury, but whose public relations department tells him to inform the public that nobody can crack his bank's code? To cite Mr. T in "Rocky III," that bank is dead meat. So are its depositors.

But if he keeps quiet, and the story still gets out about the vulnerability of the system, one or two small "virus-demolished" banks could trigger a collapse of the system, as people do the only smart thing: run for cash. The whole fractional reserve banking system would deflate; only the FED's printing presses could "save the day," in a wave of fiat money.

What I am saying is this: I think that we will see the end of fractional reserve banking in our day. At the very least, I think we will see it subjected to tremendous shocks. People will lose faith in electronic promises made by bureaucrats who do not know anything about the monsters that their efficient computers can be turned into.

Attack on Martinsburg. Now, let's take it a step farther. Some day some state or Federal bureaucrat is going to step on the toes of some genius entrepreneur who has created a software development firm. The bureaucrat will try to wrap this entrepreneur in red tape. Or maybe — just maybe — he will try to sock him with a tax bill that the entrepreneur regards as unfair.

In Martinsburg, West Virginia, there is a large computer. It is owned and operated by the Internal Revenue Service. Into it, over the next five years, the I.R.S. apparently intends to deposit all the records it can assemble on every U.S. taxpayer. This computer database will be the biggest in the world. It is the tool by which the I.R.S. hopes to increase taxpayer compliance. And it may succeed. For a while.

This is one reason for saving all letters to and from the I.R.S. If the I.R.S. becomes dependent on its computer system, which is likely, then any short-circuiting of its database could create havoc for tax collecting. If word gets out that a major failure has hit the I.R.S., the tax revolt could multiply overnight. You would see the deficit become astronomical. If the I.R.S. continues to tie its "voluntary" compliance program to the myth of the "all-seeing computer," then news of the computer's scrambling could backfire.

It is possible that the story of the I.R.S. database is a myth. Maybe they aren't going to build it. But if the public believes that such computer power is at the disposal of the I.R.S., and taxpayers then learn either that the system has been blown, or that it was mythical from the start, the tax revolt could spread like an epidemic. The electronic epidemic-could trigger a tax revolt epidemic.

He who lives on the cutting edge of technology eventually dies on the cutting edge of technology.

"PEOPLE ARE BASICALLY GOOD"

Let's return to my taped interview with "Tom." In a 90-minute interview, we covered a lot of ground. But one topic that stands out in my mind is our discussion of the pre-supposition that goes into the creation of a computer-based society. The computer people have all adopted the assumption that undergirds modern science, namely that, participants are well meaning, that they will not fake their experiments, and that they will play fair. If scientists had to check every aspect of every article, science could not advance very fast.

What about the computer industry? The whole system rests on faith: "Men are not malevolent. They are not envy-driven. They will not deliberately seek to destroy the work of some random victim." Tom says categorically that this assumption is false. There are bad people with tremendous computer skills, and modern society has not restructured its economic institutions to protect itself.

Here is one example of a break-in technique. Someone phones in to a computer, which has been left open temporarily by some user. The lock is unlatched; he needs no key to get in. He then seeks to penetrate the inner core of the program, such as a bank's program. He creates a deliberate error, which all too often triggers a kind of electronic explosion. The protective shell self-destructs, and the invader now finds himself inside the system, where far fewer defense mechanisms exist.

Tom designed his own firm's defense against this tactic. His program automatically records the source of the error, and throws the user out of the program. The program has protection against deliberate errors, but most of them don't, he says. A major error simply collapses the program's outer shell.

In my previous issue, I speculated that a Soviet spy or agent could penetrate U.S. computers. Note: I did not assume that he would simply phone in; I assumed that a disloyal programmer, or a team, could plant the virus as insiders. From there, the virus would spread through the system through normal telecommunications. Several people have written in to tell me that a wrecker cannot destroy the system by penetrating it from the outside. They may be correct. But when informed that I am assuming an inside job by someone with access to a major computer, the critics have admitted that this might be possible.

The weed of crime bears bitter fruit: for honest, computer-dependent people.

FEDERAL FUNDS

The Federal Funds bank transfer lines allow banks to borrow money overnight. Hundreds of billions of dollars go across these lines every working day. The bank's computers communicate with each other by means of this telecommunications hook-up. What if someone were to plant a long-delay virus in the software that operates these transfers? And what banker has even thought about this problem?

What if this scenario was to take place: a virus triggers the disruption of bank records — not a total breakdown initially, but disruptions in the data? It might be weeks or months before auditors recognized the extent of the problem.

As rumors begin to leak out about complex accounting or other data-management problems of major banks all over the U.S. (including off-shore branches), the various banking regulatory agencies would be swamped with crises and outside rumors. Then, all at once, bank computers begin breaking down.

The rumors then explode. The lines appear in front of banks. The only answer at this point is to print up paper money. It would be printed by the hundreds of billions in order to offset the deflationary effects of bank runs (paper money that is pulled out but not re-deposited in another bank).

You could topple the fractional reserve banking system all over the world. The entire payments system could easily become engulfed in chaos. Debits and credits would no longer be meaningful. A pure paper money inflation would replace the manipulated, "fine-tuned" monetary inflation of modern central banking.

All of a sudden, market-created alternative currencies would be revived. It would then be metallic cash that talks loudest. Silver dimes are not electronic. "They can't be infected electronically." They still circulate when banks are "temporarily closed, due to circumstances beyond our control."

The loss of efficiency would be initially horrendous, I would guess. The division of labor would break down. You could then have the crash that lurks in the minds and suspicions of average depositors. Who says it cannot happen? A lot of public relations firms hired by the banks — computer illiterates in high places?

What we have is an internal bank money wire system that is totally vulnerable to some vindictive programmer. There is little doubt in my mind that the bankers are desperately fearful of this sort of vandalism. It could topple people's confidence in the fractional reserve banking system, and confidence is the only thing that keeps it going.

Conclusion. Technologically, there is no solution at this point. I have no heartening message. Maybe later; not now. Keep precious metal coins. Don't assume that it can't happen here. It can. The only thing holding it back is the restraining hand of God, through the temporary self-restraint of a technological priesthood.

[Reviewer's comment: I was unaware of the problem of computer worms and viruses until I read Gary North's two articles. His open release of this important information is appreciated.]

SCALAR EM INNOCULATION AND ITS IMPLICATIONS

My appreciation goes to Gary North for his openly sharing the above important information with the public. Human nature being what it is, one or more of his more dire scenarios is going to happen sooner or later.

The problem becomes enormously more compounded if the hostile agent or agents possesses sophisticated scalar EM technology.

With scalar technology, there exists the potential that the worm or virus can be implanted from a distance. If scalar-scanning devices of sufficient precision can be developed, then major software residing in a chip, a computer, or on a disk can be read from a distance. With scalar EM methods, the ordinary software "guards" are totally ineffective. The scalar "reader" could simply read off the software directly as the disk or device goes about its normal operations.

After the software is read, a germ or a virus is designed to produce a particular problem as desired and upon special stimulus. Then a scalar "imprinter" device is used to produce the necessary digital pulses directly upon the media in which the software resides. The required code has now been implanted. In effect, the operating system has been injected from a distance, and contaminated with the desired "sleeping agent" — germ or virus. From there on, it's just like Gary North's scenarios.

So the scalar EM technology can probably be used (at least eventually) to place "mines" in systems in advance, for damage or destruction at a future date. At least it's possible in principle.

However, it's not the injection of computers and equipment that bothers me. It's the injection of human beings. Here's generally how it can be done (and possibly is being done).

Basically, human brains have various rhythmic waves, which represent "envelope pulsations" of the entire electrical system. However, it is not the Et, force fields represented by these pulsations which are important: it is the summed-zero (scalar) patterning of the entire complex of neuron firings which represents the real activity of the brain — and represents its thoughts and emotions. A storage system for these patternings exists, but it's a scalar pattern storage, not an E and B field storage. The storage system is in the nuclei of the tissues of the nervous system itself, not in electrical or electrochemical potentials.

At any rate, the human brain rhythms are also "riding along" relatively entrained to the Schumann resonance of the earth's magnetic field. So all the patterning of the brain is grouped together into giant overall orders, and one or more of these is normally synchronized to our natural environment.

If a varying magnetic signal of extremely low frequency — say 10 hertz — bombards the brain with greater power than the earth's magnetic field, it is possible for the brain's rhythm to be "forcibly entrained" to synchronize with that signal, rather than with the normal Schumann resonance. If a large number of brains are forcibly entrained to such a signal, and the signal is artificial, then a nester coherent phasing of all the brains to the transmitted signal has been accomplished.

And that can be utilized — and is utilized — by the Soviet Union. On the Woodpecker signals, Bob Beck has detected up to 16 carriers, each with a 10-Hertz modulation, and with all the 10 Hz modulations in phase.

Let s stress what we're saying here. At times, the Woodpecker signals have shown 16 carrier frequencies that contain the same 10-Hertz modulation, and which are all kept coherently sync-locked.

If those signals and the modulations are strong enough, the brains in a targeted area demodulate the 10-Hertz signal and phase-lock to it — actually, to them. At that point, the brains are entrained to a 10-Hertz driver, and 16 channels of multimegahertz frequencies are locked-in to the brain.

Now, if the Soviets have broken the genetic code of the human brain (which they have) and succeeded in developing the ability to implant thoughts, emotions, pictures, etc. (which at least to a degree they have), then they can simply record the proper signals from human guinea pigs, using scalar technology and instrumentation.

They can tailor those signals and add them onto the Woodpecker carriers, using scalar EM techniques. By using most of the sixteen carriers as a means to express Fourier frequency expansions, specific areas and functions of the brain can be targeted.

"Notice that the distant transmitters already "know" the correct phasing, just use the 10 Hertz modulation signal as a reference. In that case, phasing takes care of itself inside the captured human brains.

The brain has a unique characteristic. If a signal arises inside it, it interprets that it itself originated the signal. Thus for the first time in history, true unwitting robot actions and emotions can be engendered in masses of human beings.

But it's still worse. The Kaznacheyev experiments (see references) proved conclusively that electromagnetic signals can carry and transmit cellular disease and death patterns into a targeted biosystem. You can rest assured that the Soviets continued on to actually measure and determine a wide variety of death and disease scalar patterns. All of that can be added on to the Woodpecker carriers so that the population in the intersection grid area is devastated. One can even test it out in advance by producing a modified pattern of a disease in the targeted populace, and keeping the percentage of brains entrained down to a small level. This lowers the number of persons "injected" from a distance to a small percentage of the populace. Then the outbreak of the "new strain" of a familiar disease — such as influenza, pneumonia, and something like AIDS — can be monitored to provide targeting and effectiveness data. Notice that a series of diseases was experienced by U.S. personnel assigned to the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, probably as a result of the so-called "weak microwave radiation" of the Embassy by the Soviet Union.

But that's not all. Much more subtle effects can be produced in the targeted populace, without anyone getting wise. Cancers and leukemia should be relatively easy to induce. Also, the immune system can simply be attacked directly. If done slowly, a series of common, ordinary diseases will just seem to get "tougher and tougher to cure." Actually it's not the disease that got tougher, it is the immune systems that got weaker. It is my opinion that precisely that sort of testing — against the immune system — has been accomplished by the Soviet Union against the U.S. since about October 1985. A great percentage of influenza patients during the period from then until now have had complications. So much so that multiple sessions — as many as 3 to 5 — of antibiotics are necessary before the patient recovers. At least in the Huntsville, Alabama "hinge pin" area, that seems to have been the case. This author personally experienced this, having influenza and follow-on complications for a period of seven months — something quite different indeed for him.

But it's even worse.

The human scalar EM nervous system ("inside" the ordinary EM signals and functioning of the system) also has its own resident "software." It has special storage media contained in its brain, its cells, and its genetic material, and its actual nucleons. All of these storage media are continually telecommunicated with via scalar EM means. Those recordings, largely condition the "stability" of what each of us is. As personalities we literally "are" what we have experienced, felt, thought, and did. Our whole "functioning conscious system" has been evolved by our experience, and it continues to be "us" by means of continual reference to the record base.

I hope you now realize that the actual record base itself can conceivably be altered by scalar electromagnetic means, even from a distance. Even by the hidden scalar EM content of 16 Woodpecker carriers, rocked into a captured brain and pouring in their deadly content. It is conceivable that even what one is can be taken from him, and what someone decides he will be, he will be.

A totally new — and ultimate — form of "slavery" has emerged.

Also, look at all this scalar EM functioning of the human system as a special kind of cybernetics. A scalar EM computing software and hardware system.

What if scalar techniques are used to plant "worms" and "viruses" in this system? With hidden triggers? What about a series of them, so that a range of eruptive software diseases can be stimulated at will?

And guess what. Such scalar EM "worms" and "viruses" can even be induced by contact with or consumption of "contaminated" water and food. Or saliva. Or other body fluid.

So you can see the possibilities of "seeding" a population with a staggering variety of time-bombs.

I think you begin to see the point. Now you can change North's "Soviet blackmail" scenario drastically. In a new scenario, Gorbachev simply announces to Reagan that a graduated series of specific sweeping changes are going to happen in our population — changes which we are absolutely powerless to stop. The last stages are various deaths. The master "trigger" for this series has already been initiated. Incidentally, the Soviet populace has been carefully "seeded" with the proper antidotes. The Russian leader demands certain things (very similar to what North's scenario utilized). Unless his demands are met, a "killer virus" will be activated by a special signal. If so, everyone dies. The first step change in the series will start to occur in a few hours. And it does.

In fact, this scenario could be added to North's scenario, and both used simultaneously. What do you think the President and the Congress would do? Or could do?

There are other even more diabolical possibilities, but these should be quite sufficient to illustrate the point.

Pandora's box has already been spilled, and the end of humanity is ticking away like a time bomb. It's already nearly midnight, and the watchman hasn't even sounded the alarm yet.

I certainly can anticipate the next question: Have the Soviets already "seeded" the populations of the U.S. and other selected western nations with scalar EM viruses and germs7

The answer is, I simply don't know. And just like Gary North, I don't know what if anything can be done about it if they have. This researcher certainly doesn't have all the answers. An immediate national crash program to develop scalar EM defenses is essential if we are not simply to be crushed beneath the hammer and sickle. It takes funding, people, facilities, and time.

In some 22 years of unrelenting struggle to convince the system we've got a terrible problem, I've hardly been able to move it off dead-center (no pun intended). This book, produced under extreme workload stress, is all I can do to raise the alarm. I've given it my very best shot.

What happens now remains to be seen. Other hands, hearts and minds are going to have to take up the task and carry it forward. This researcher has reached his limit, and has no more left to give.

APPENDIX III: CONTINUING THE SCENARIO

On May 3, 1986 a stunning loss of a U.S. Delta rocket carrying a critically-needed weather satellite occurred. The rocket suffered a shutdown of its main engine during launch and began to veer off course, causing the range safety officer to destroy it.

The takeoff of the blue and white Delta "workhorse" from launch Pad A at Cape Canaveral at first appeared picture-perfect. About a minute later, six of the nine booster rockets were expended and the remaining three switched on. Shortly after that, the rocket seemed to lose power. The main liquid-fueled engine had suddenly shut down, with the three strap-on boosters still burning. The rocket then had no stability and started to slowly drift off course, creating an increasing angle of attack. Within a few seconds, the nose cone snapped off under the severe stress. The U.S. Air Force range safety officer then sent a destruct command to the stricken rocket, which exploded in a ball of flame.

The Delta, built by McDonnell Douglas, had previously piled up a continuous string of 43 successful launches. Since 1960, 177 launches have occurred, and the success rate has been 94%. The Delta is one of the most reliable rockets ever built.

The unexpected shutdown of the main engine was perplexing. At a news conference following the mishap, William Russell. NASA's Delta project manager. stated: "It was a very sharp shutdown. almost as if it were a command shutdown."

Preliminary data, such as turbine speed and temperatures in and around the engine, "all appeared to be very normal." Russell said.

It may well have been a "command shutdown," unknown to Bill Russell and his NASA engineers.

Preliminary runs of the videotapes of the incident, aired by the national TV news media, show that during liftoff, a mysterious light approached the rocket from below and from the side. rising and striking the vehicle. This light and its path are strongly reminiscent of the first anomalous "light streak and ball" photo taken by Bob Gladwin just prior to the shuttle launch on November 26, 1985.

Let' s suppose that on May 3 the Soviet scalar EM grid was in the launch Phase ABM system mode and was tracking the launch of the Delta rocket.

If the anomalous light that moved up and contacted the rocket was a small ball of continuous electromagnetic energy formed by a distant Soviet scalar EM howitzer, then the rocket's main engine control circuits would have received a sudden and continuous pulse of EM power. This would probably have shutdown the engine by an actual "command" signal, artificially delivered. *

---

*Engineers have now determined that such a shorting of the engine circuitry occurred, causing engine shutdown.

Certainly such mysterious switching of satellite circuits has occurred before, probably due to Soviet scalar EM precision testing. For example, the British Ariel VI satellite has exhibited very strange anomalies in its command and control circuitry -- in fact, with very precise control switching being exhibited as if from an external source.

Thus a very small scalar EM missile may have been utilized by the Soviets to disrupt the control circuits in the rocket. A resulting pulse of power in the engine shutdown command circuit could have "ordered" the shutdown of the main engine -- just as it appeared.

It remains to be seen whether or not the Soviets used a "marker beacon" associated with the disruption of the Delta launch. One news photograph seems to contain a suggestion of such a light, but the videotapes must be studied frame by frame before it can be ascertained exactly what if anything is really there.

If a marker beacon was not used, the distant Soviet operator could simply have "popped out" the continuous EM ball of energy, tracked it and the ascending rocket exhaust, and "joysticked" the scalar EM missile up into the rocket.

Analysis of this incident is continuing, so nothing is certain as we go to press.

However, if this incident was indeed another Soviet kill, then it will have served the Russians well. Much of the world's media attention will now be focused on NASA's launch difficulties, and away from the recent Chernobyl nuclear reactor disaster in the Soviet Union. It's bound to take some of the media pressure off the Soviets.

In addition, it further cripples the U.S. satellite program. Loss of this critical weather satellite payload seriously reduces U.S. weather monitoring capabilities.

Further, the U.S. space program now appears to be all but grounded by the Challenger, Titan, and Delta explosions. For example, it will require about 18 months for the U.S. to redesign the shuttle so that America's shuttle program can get going again. So things are delayed until summer of 1987 at the earliest.

Meanwhile, the Russians are set to grasp the lead in the space race. In 1985 they launched about 100 rockets, five times as many as the U.S. They have a shuttle program of their own, well underway, with a flight expected within months. Earlier this year, they launched Mir, a second generation space station; a U.S. version is still some eight years away.

Charles Vick, of Huntsville, Alabama's Space and Rocket Center, summed it up: "They have their standard military program, a shuttle program and the equivalent of an Apollo program, all within a 10-year period. It's awesome."

An experienced propagandist like Gorbachev certainly understands the advantages of a strong Soviet push into space, such as (1) military advantage, (2) national prestige, (3) scientific achievement, and (4) projecting an image in the world's news media that the Soviets are first in space exploration.

So the failure of the Delta rocket provides many benefits to the Soviet Union.

It also continues to exercise and demonstrate Soviet mastery of the skies over North America itself.

Meanwhile, two U.S. nuclear submarines have "inadvertently" run aground in the last month or so.

Gorbachev again seems disposed toward a summit meeting soon.

If it's held, the agenda may be quite different from the one President Reagan is prepared for.

The clock ticks on toward midnight.

7. In T. E. Bearden, Gravitobiology: A New Biophysics, Cheniere Press, Santa Barbara, Ca. www.cheniere.org, 1991 we first exposed the quantum potential weapon and some of its uses and characteristics.

8. A negative energy EMP weapons strikes the target or target area with an extreme pulse of negative energy empty Dirac Sea 4-holes. As a result, the free electrons flowing in electrical currents in the struck target instantly disappear by re-absorption into the Dirac Sea. A living body struck by such a blast is totally and instantly dead in every smallest part, since all its brain and nervous system currents, cellular currents, etc. are instantly and totally extinguished. The Russians tested this weapon in the 1980s in their war in Afghanistan, against two Afghan villages. I spent two hours in Washington D.C. with the then-representative of the Mujahedin to the U.S. Government, verifying the incidents and going over the exact characteristics of the instantaneous deaths of those villagers. With such a sudden death, the mind-body interconnection loop is instantly severed, so that the mind is instantly snapped loose from its connection to the body—hence my use of the term "MindSnapper." The struck body usually emits longitudinal EM waves for an extended period, so that vultures and other predators will not approach the bodies and eat them. All bacteria, viruses, etc. in the body are also killed instantly, and the body does not decay, even in 30 or 60 days.

9. As can be seen, the negative energy EMP weapon is an all-purpose weapon extremely effective against every kind of target: missiles, aircraft, communications, satellites, ships and particularly aircraft carriers, personnel, generators, power systems, the electronics of nuclear warheads, submarines, tanks and vehicles, and the electrical and electronic controls of any kind of machinery or equipment. Such weapons are the second most powerful weapons on earth. In the first part of 2002, a U.S. 2-carrier task force maneuvered in the South China Sea as a precautionary warning to the Chinese that we would defend Taiwan. Unknown to that fleet, tracking it and trained on it were the newly deployed Chinese negative energy EMP weapons, which could have destroyed the entire task force—everything in it—with a few shots in less than 10 minutes.

On DoE restricted website http://www.ott.doe.gov/electromagnetic/ and on www.cheniere.org. The problem of the source charge can be solved by treating (with the modern quantum field theory viewpoint) the "isolated" observable charge and its cluster of virtual charges of opposite sign as a composite dipole. Because of the broken symmetry of its opposite charges, any dipole or dipolarity continuously receives virtual energy from the seething vacuum, transduces it into real observable EM energy, and pours out observable photons in all directions at the speed of light. See also E. T. Whittaker, 1903, ibid. There is a scalar potential between the ends of each dipole. The scalar potential may be decomposed into a bidirectional set of longitudinal EM phase conjugate energy from the time dimension (from the imaginary plane) and outputs that EM energy in the real 3-space. 3-space conservation of energy flow is violated, but 4-space conservation of energy flow is upheld. This rigorously follows from the discovery of broken symmetry of opposite charges in 1957—one of the types of asymmetry for which Lee and Yang received the Nobel Prize.

In classical electrodynamics, the charged particle itself is assumed to be the source of its own fields and potentials. In other words, the charge is implicitly considered to be creating—right out of nowhere—the Poynting energy flow it continuously pours out across the universe in all directions. That makes the charge a perpetual motion machine of the grossest kind, violating the maxim that energy can neither be created nor destroyed.

So the greatest perpetual motion advocates of all times are our own classical electrodynamicists and electrical engineering departments and professors who still ignore the active vacuum interaction that is missing from the classical model. They thereby ignore that the charge is a broken 3-symmetry in its violent exchange of virtual energy with the active vacuum, and merely organizes and emits in observable form a fraction of the energy it continuously receives from the imaginary plane (from the time domain). Yet, that broken symmetry has been known in particle physicists, both experimentally and theoretically, for 45 years.

When Maxwell wrote his theory, neither the electron, the atom, nor the nucleus had been discovered. There was no knowledge of the Drude electron gas, electron spin, etc. There was no knowledge of the nucleus of the atom, and even the atom itself was still contentious. A thin material ether (fluid) was believed to fill all space, so that no point in all the universe was empty of mass. Consequently, E and B were conceived as physical force fields in a material medium—the luminiferous ether. All Maxwell's equations—including the subset selected and modified by Heaviside that today are called "Maxwell's equations"—assume this material ether to this day.

Electricity was thought to be a "thin material electric fluid" running through wires like water through a pipe. The magnitude of the potential was not used; its reaction cross-section was calculated and erroneously used as its magnitude, as it is today (although a good electrodynamicist does know that it is only the intensity of the potential, not its magnitude).

Faraday believed that his "lines of force" were taut physical "strings" in this material ether, and that EM perturbations were the vibrations of these taut strings. As he clearly states in his 1873 Treatise..., Maxwell sought to capture Faraday's work exactly. He simply assumed Faraday's "plucked taut string" waves. Later the measurement in instruments of what was actually the lateral gyroprecession of electrons in receiving wires was thought to prove that the incoming ether vibrations were transverse, like those string waves, because the detected electric fluid (electron precession) waves in the receiving wire were transverse. The drift velocity of electrons longitudinally in a wire (in a typical case, several inches per hour) was unknown. A charge q was just a piece of electric fluid, much like a cubic centimeter or other volume of fluid; it had no connotation of "charged particle." There was no concept in all of physics of EM energy flowing through space. There was no knowledge that the same fields created in the transmission wire, which perturbs the Drude electrons laterally, also perturbs the positively charged nuclei laterally, in the opposite direction, highly damped but with equal energy.

There was no way to realize that the energetic perturbation of the curvature of spacetime around the sending wire antenna, by the Drude electron perturbation energy, is simultaneously accompanied by an equal and opposite perturbation of the curvature of spacetime in the opposite direction (energy density, not amplitude of the disturbing wave, determines the degree of curvature of the surrounding spacetime). Hence Maxwell omitted precisely one half the EM energy, one half the EM wave, and one-half the electrodynamics. As a consequence, the "Newton's third law recoil" of the nuclei today is thought to spontaneously arise as if some mystical demon observes the Drude electron perturbations, and simultaneously kicks the positively charged nuclei in the equal and opposite direction. Hence Newton's third law, so to speak, is erroneously still omitted from classical electrodynamics, and the better texts say so.

In the 1880s, the Michelson-Morley experiments falsified the material ether. Not a single one of the Maxwell-Heaviside equations were ever changed to this day. Instead, the electrodynamicists eventually announced that, since there was no longer an ether, they were not using one! Then a total non sequitur was incorporated: that in massfree space, the same E and B fields (defined as material entities and thus existing only in mass) still remain but the forces go to zero. Simple algebra reveals this clever, insidious faux pas, using the E-field as an example: First, F == d/dt(mv), so mass is a component of force. (This reveals the great error due to the hoary old notion that a separate force acts upon a separate mass; the mass is a component of the force, and the force is a coupled system of a curvature of spacetime and a charged mass.). Then E == F/q, which rigorously holds when mass is present.

Now for whatever reason, let F = 0. Then F/q = 0 and E = 0 also, else we must discard algebra. What actually remains is easily explained in general relativity terms (available since before 1920). The couplet of a curvature of spacetime and a charged mass is broken up by absenting the mass. What remains is that specific curvature of spacetime. GR assures us that curved ST acts upon mass, and that any force involves a curvature of ST. Yet in more than 80 years, this erroneous old "material ether remnant" in electrodynamics has been fiercely defended. Every textbook today uses and confuses the E and B fields in two dichotomous fashions: (1) as massive force fields existing only in the presence of mass, and as "massless force-free fields" existing only in the absence of mass. This of course is a non sequitur.

The "scalar" potential itself is not even a scalar entity, as shown rigorously by Whittaker. Instead, it is a harmonic series of bidirectional EM longitudinal phase conjugate wavepairs, and it decomposes into that series. Hence it is a multiwave, multivectorial entity.

15. The term "energetics" simply means energy as the primary thing in the universe. Rankine first used it. G. Helm in 1887 revived Rankine's term "energetics" and factored energy into an intensity factor and an extensity factor (which today we would call potential and kinetic energies). William Ostwald in 1893, 1895, and 1901 raised the concept of "energetics" (energy as the primary thing in the universe) to the forefront. Thus when the Russians developed new extensions and principles in weapons physics, they simply used the historical notion of "energy as the primary thing in the universe" and adopted the earlier name for it: energetics.

16. Later when Khrushchev demanded a 100% antimissile defense, famed Russian Nobelist Petr Kapitsa answered, "If a means of total neutralization of foreign missiles is to be found, it can only come from a group of new principles in physics, called energetics".

It appears that Sachs' unified GR and EM approach is perhaps the best Western physics model to apply to analysis of the KGB energetics weapons. However, because of the third branch (psychoenergetics: engineering the mind directly), Sachs' work would appear to need further extension along the lines indicated by the present author in the cited paper.

New Energy,* 3(2/3), 1998, p. 12-28; — Energy from the Vacuum, 2002, ibid. For nuclear transmutation at a distance (e.g., dudding all nuclear weapons by transmuting U235 and weapons grade plutonium), extension is required along the lines indicated by the present author in these references.

19. See M. Sachs, ibid., also M. Sachs, "Relativistic Implications of Electromagnetic Field Theory," in T. W. Barrett and D. M. Grimes, eds., Advanced Electromagnetism, World Scientific, 1995, p. 551. The Sachs theory already expresses the greatest generalization possible of electrodynamics, and fully justifies the preceding view.

20. See Whittaker, 1903, ibid.; — "On an Expression of the Electromagnetic Field Due to Electrons by Means of Two Scalar Potential Functions," Proc. Lond. Math. Soc, Series 2, Vol. 1, 1904, p. 367-372. The latter paper was published in 1904 and orally delivered in 1903. Per these two Whittaker papers, it is known that (i) ordinary EM fields and waves are the result of interference of two or more scalar potential functions, (ii) scalar potentials are comprised of harmonic sets of bidirectional EM phase conjugate wavepairs, (iii) all ordinary EM fields and waves and potentials have LW EM dynamics internally, and (iv) in theory, this "infolded" electrodynamics can be engineered. Sachs' theory dramatically extends the richness of that internal electrodynamics ignored in the West, and highlights the general relativity (sets of spacetime curvatures, or "engines", involved).

There are several other AIAS papers in the same issue of JNE, dealing with interferometry and with the implications of the Whittaker papers.

25. As an example, the U.S.S. Skylark, surface companion of the Thresher, was beset by mysterious "jamming" of multiple types of EM systems in multiple bands. So bad was it that it required more than an hour to get an emergency message to Naval headquarters that the Thresher was in serious difficulty. Later, as the scalar interferometry died away, all the EM systems aboard the Skylark resumed normal functioning. The Skylark was in fact in a "splatter zone" of the underwater interference zone around the Thresher.

26. Circa the end of 1989, the earlier longitudinal EM wave weapons on site in Russia were leased to a rogue Japanese group comprised of Aum Shinrikyo and Yakuza, who have been operating those weapon systems—on site in Russia—since then. Senator Sam Nunn's investigations revealed the presence of the Aum Shinrikyo in Russia, to include establishing a university there. His investigators missed the Yakuza involvement and also missed the exotic weaponry aspects as one might expect.

27. I concluded from this remark that TEMPEST techniques are probably used at some nearby site not too distant from my home here in Huntsville, to read and record my work as I write it on the computer. That appears to be a good assumption.

28. As a small example of what can be done, see a series of papers by M. W. Evans, P. K. Anastasovski, T. E. Bearden et al, published in J. New Energy, 4(3), Special Issue, Winter 1999. 29. As an example, one part of the strategic deception plan was devoted to convincing the West that Soviet psychoenergetics was nothing but a technical wrinkle upon the rather harmless Western parapsychology. This part of the program was completely successful for decades. Another very clever use of deception is to allow release of some real scientific advances that lead the West, but are not too important to the KGB in the weapons arena. The increasing emphasis on torsion fields is an example of this "deception by giving good information that directs the adversary upon a path one wishes him to take", effectively steering him away from the path one wishes him to avoid. Lately, however, there is an uproar amongst the academicians in the Russian Academy of Sciences over this very point, that torsion fields being presented as the "end all, be all" is simply disinformation.

30. With their deployment of QP weapons in 2002, the Chinese are also on the way to having this capability.

31. The multiply connected spacetime (MCS) or quantum potential weapons went on site circa latter 1989. A laboratory prototype had been tested against the U.S. air attack on Libya in April 1986. For details of the extremely anomalous jamming of aircraft and missile guidance and control systems in that attack on Libya, see Mark Thompson, "Mixed signals may have misguided U.S. weapons," The Washington Post, Jan. 22, 1989, p. A-4.

32. One or more QP weapons also apparently induced the Gulf War Disease in MidEast forces in the Gulf War. We have previously explained the peculiar anomalies, how it was done, why the endemic natives did not contract the disease, why the French forces did not contract it but U.S., British, and Canadian forces did, etc. We briefly discussed quantum potential weapons in T. E. Bearden, Gravitobiology: A New Biophysics, In T. E. Bearden, Gravitobiology: A New Biophysics, Cheniere Press, Santa Barbara, Ca. www.cheniere.org, 1991.

33. (a) Yossef Bodansky, "Soviets testing chemical agents in Afghanistan," Jane's Defence Weekly, 1(3), Apr. 7, 1984, p. 508 gives something of the two Soviet tests of this weapon in Afghanistan. In addition to the fierce blast of empty Dirac Sea 4-holes, these weapons produce a powerful time-polarized EM pulse in the area, producing a very sharp "jerk" in the rate of flow of time, (b) The mind-body coupling mechanism—which cannot withstand such a sharp jerk in the rate of flow of time—has been given by T. E. Bearden, "Mind Control and EM Wave Polarization Transductions," Explore, 1999, ibid. This sharp "jerk" in time-flow instantly snaps the mind-body coupling mechanism for any living thing in the struck area. A very small version of this weapon was tested twice in Afghanistan, where the bodies in the "mind-snapped" zone died instantly, fell like limp rags, never twitched, and did not decay or get molested by insects or scavengers for the 30 days it required the Mujahedin to fight their way back into the two struck villages. The Mujahedin thought it was some new, extremely fast acting nerve gas, which they dubbed "smerch" or "death wind".

The work of Vlail Kaznacheyev led to the understanding of how to electromagnetically transmit cellular death and disease into targeted cells (or bodies) at a distance, and involved thousands of lab experiments. Highly sanitized work revealing the results but not the mechanisms, were permitted in order to stimulate the West to see if it knew about energetics.

As a strange kind of "poetic justice" action the Chinese induced cancer into many Russian spies stationed in the Russian Embassy in China. Quoting Lunev, p. 160: "...I was not the only person who was stationed in Beijing to come down with cancer...Almost all of the GRU officers stationed in China with me have been diagnosed with cancer. People assigned to the embassy had told me that they were picking up high levels of radiation from the apartment building around the embassy compound. Whether it was a form of high-tech monitoring or a conscious effort to harm our health, it seems to have been successful. So much so that in 1992 the GRU was asked to investigate the high rate of cancer among embassy officials. The findings, however, have never been made public; in part, no doubt, because of the rapprochement between Russia and China."

Although Priore's own thesis was suppressed in 1973, Pautrizel nevertheless finally succeeded in getting this doctoral thesis by Perisse approved on the work, at the University of Bordeaux which had rejected Priore's thesis, after eleven more years had passed. Considering the viciousness of the suppression, this was a major accomplishment.

41. The photo was taken by George Suchary of the registration point (ball of light) high over the Nov. 1985 night shuttle launch from Cape Canaveral. 48. But see Craig F. Bohren, "How can a particle absorb more than the light incident on it?" Am. J. Phys., 51(4), Apr. 1983, p. 323-327. By resonating the intercepting charged particle, its reaction cross section increases, and more EM energy is collected and re-radiated by the charge than is input to it by the conventional accounting (which only accounts the input Poynting energy that would be intercepted by a static charge). The conventional input energy calculation therefore ignores the huge nondiverged Heaviside component surrounding the Poynting component and wasted. The resonant particle sweeps out past the usual Poynting component into the unaccounted Heaviside input component, and collects excess energy. The Bohren experiment with resonant charged particles produces COP =18. Metallic particles at ultraviolet frequencies are one class of such particles and insulating particles at infrared frequencies are another. For independent confirmation of the Bohren experiment, see H. Paul and R. Fischer, {Comment on "How can a particle absorb more than the light incident on it?'}," Am. J. Phys., 51(4), Apr. 1983, p. 327.

50. A beneficial use, e.g., would be to use such CSRs to investigate and report the interior of the sun and planets, including the Earth and its core. Since a CSR can also travel "through" the interior of a light beam, in theory such could be dispatched back into some of the nearer stars to also explore and report their interior.

51. This is no more curious than stating that sets of waves and their dynamics can exist in space, without interacting with mass, and that they can then later interact with a mass system to change it in specifically designed manner. Since longitudinal EM waves and their dynamics are "infolded" inside ordinary EM waves, fields, and potentials, they are also infolded "inside" the ambient vacuum potential, which itself is a part of the local vacuum potential. In short, one forms highly complex LW wavesets and functional dynamics, in essentially a sort of "subspace" as popularized by the Star Trek television series. The LW "engines" are identically ST curvature engines. A close colleague of the present author has in fact already invented and rigorously demonstrated such a communication system, but his former funding by several very large communications companies collapsed before he could develop and employ this system for the commercial market.

52. This is easily understood if one shifts one's vision from "space" to "subspace." Subspace is filled with (literally is composed of) longitudinal EM waves and their dynamics. The CSR's are quite unique, enormous systems "singing away" with longitudinal EM waves. So a longitudinal EM wave interferometer can easily locate them by sweeping its beams through subspace, as a radar sweeps to track aircraft in space. Once the CSR target "pings", the system automatically hits it with a profusion of interacting LWs, completing disrupting and destroying its dynamics. Scratch one system. Probably several million such systems were destroyed throughout the West (command centers, power grids, submarines, nuclear bombers, etc.) in rapid fire order, all without any external "spatial" sign other than perhaps a wee bit of very low level "EM noise" briefly as a struck CSR fractured.

53. See M. Sachs, Quantum Mechanics from General Relativity, Reidel, 1986. Sachs'unified field theory, e.g., applies equally to the quarks and gluons, as it does to the nucleons, the atoms, molecules, and macroscopic objects and phenomena. See also M. Sachs, "Symmetry in Electrodynamics: From Special to General Relativity, Macro to Quantum Domains," in Modern Nonlinear Optics, Second Edition, 3 vols., M. W. 55. The tragic death of Captain Hess was also very probably such a test. Hess, perfectly normal and happy, laid out his uniform in the early morning and then went for his customary morning jog. He suddenly veered aside, sat down in a path and stabbed himself 26 times, all deep stab wounds, four of which would be totally incapacitating (two right through the heart) to any normal individual experiencing normal shock, etc. To a psychoenergetically controlled individual where shock does not occur nor does emotion or pain, this is understandable. Add this to the incidents involving Captains Button and Svoboda, and one begins to see the picture.

56. W. Heitman and G. Nimtz, "On Causality Proofs of Superluminal Barrier Transversal of Frequency Band Limited Wave Packets," Phys. Lett. A196, 1994, p. 154-158. Aichmann and Nimtz and co-workers at the University of Cologne have transmitted 8.7 GHz microwaves (free space wavelength 3.4 cm) traveling in a rectangular wave-guide that contains a "barrier" section of reduced dimensions. They have recently transmitted Mozart's 40th Symphony as frequency modulated microwaves through a barrier wave-guide at an FTL group velocity of 4.7 c, receiving audibly recognizable music from the microwave photons that survived their barrier passage. The transit time through the barrier was about 81 picoseconds and was observed to be constant for barriers with widths varying from 4.0 cm to 11.4 cm.

57. Quantum mechanics in fact requires instantaneous transmission of effects. A mishmash of learned contention would have us believe one can "transmit" energy instantly, but not intelligence. This argument has essentially stymied our scientific establishment so that it has not really funded strong investigation in this area. It is a stupid argument: Simply transmit one change, then a second one, then a third one, in serial order, where the "order" contains the intelligence. No different from Morse code. Somehow the pundits so certain that intelligence cannot be superluminally transmitted seem to have forgotten what "intelligence" is. They also seem to have assumed that one superluminal change can be transmitted on order, but a second, third, and fourth cannot.

58. Feynman and Wheeler tried very hard to formulate a new absorber theory of electrodynamics to eliminate many of the fierce foundations problems. Wheeler described the effort this way: "...we may summarize the account of radiation reaction given by Wheeler and Feynman in 1945. In it every charged particle is envisaged as coupled to every other charged particle by a field that is symmetric in time: half advanced, half retarded. Interconnections run forward and backward in time in such numbers as to make an unbelievable maze. That weaving together of past and future seems to contradict every normal idea of causality. However, when the number of particles is great enough to absorb completely the signal starting out from any source, then this myriad of couplings adds up to a simple result: the familiar retarded actions of everyday experience, plus the familiar force of radiative reaction with its familiar sign." [John Archibald Wheeler, "Law without law," in Quantum Theory and Measurement., preprint, p. 39].

Unfortunately, when the foundations of any science are closely examined in their roots, one runs into the age-old bane of the philosopher: ultimately opposites are identical, at least prior to the observation (separation) action to separate them. It follows that all scientific reasoning is circular at its most primary basis.

59. See Charles W. Misner, Kip S. Thorne and John Archibald Wheeler, Gravitation, W. H. Freeman, San Francisco, CA., 1973, p. 71. Wheeler spoke of that inescapable fact in this manner: "Here and elsewhere in science, as stressed not least by Henry Poincare, that view is out of date which used to say, 'Define your terms before you proceed.' All the laws and theories of physics, including the Lorentz force law, have this deep and subtle character, that they both define the concepts they use (here B and E) and make statement about these concepts. Contrariwise, the absence of some body of theory, law and principle deprives one of the means properly to define or even to use concepts. Any forward step in human knowledge is truly creative in this sense: that theory, concept, law, and method of measurement—forever inseparable—are born into the world in union."

60. Also see T. E. Bearden, Energy from the Vacuum: Concepts and Principles, 2001, ibid, for a rework and extension of Aristotelian logic to eliminate its present fatal flaw, extending it into a 5-law logic.

61. The very notion of "propagation of energy through space" is radically extended in the extended unified EM and GR being pursued by AIAS and Sachs. Time-like EM energy currents dominate in the vacuum. E.g., see M. W. Evans et al., "Representation of the Vacuum Electromagnetic Field in Terms of Longitudinal and Time-like Potentials: Canonical Quantization," J. New Energy, 4(3), Winter 1999, p. 82.

62. Multiwave interactions (between transverse EM waves) produce time-reversed EM waves (phase conjugate replicas of the signal wave input). That method time-reverses EM energy in waveform. To time-reverse EM energy in mass form, simply pump that mass with time-polarized EM waves. As an alternative, it may be pumped with longitudinal EM waves (which are always accompanied by time-polarized EM waves anyway), and the pumped mass is also pumped in the time-domain because of the presence of the time-polarized EM waves in the pumping. We previously filed an invention disclosure with the U.S. Patent Office dealing with how to do that.

66. F. Mandl and G. Shaw, Quantum Field Theory, Wiley, 1984, Revised Edition 1993, under the heading "5.2 Covariant Quantization" and "5.3 The Photon Propagator" in Chapter 5. The longitudinal and scalar photon polarizations are not directly observable, but only in combination, where they manifest as the instantaneous Coulomb (i.e., electrostatic) potential interaction, "which emerges as an exchange of longitudinal and scalar photons." So the common old electrostatic scalar potential is actually comprised of longitudinal EM waves and time-polarized EM waves.

67. With the MidEast increasingly set to explode, we may be facing the unleashing of weapons of mass destruction, a vast shortage and curtailment of available oil and energy, and a total collapse of the Western economy and therefore most of the world economy, in as little as three or four years, if the impending energy crisis worldwide is not resolved quickly. See T. E. Bearden, ADAS position paper, "The Unnecessary Energy Crisis: How to Solve It Quickly," ibid. As this is written, we have already had a warning shot across our bow: the vicious terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001. We are in Afghanistan and elsewhere in a war against terrorism, and anyone can see the escalation in the MidEast toward war between the U.S. and Iraq, and almost certainly a resulting explosion in the MidEast and unleashing of the hostile terrorists assets and mass destruction weapons already inside the United States. Since modern economies are based on cheap energy, and cheap energy is largely based on cheap oil, then with surging energy demands worldwide we shall see "oil wars" erupt and rage worldwide, with terrorist retaliations and attacks—using weapons of mass destruction—occurring in U.S. cities. Unless energy from the vacuum is quickly developed and deployment begun at high speed, we risk the coming collapse of the world economy, great destruction of populaces, and a new Dark Ages.

70. Superpotential theory was initiated by E. T. Whittaker, extending earlier concepts advanced by G. Johnstone Stoney. See E. T. Whittaker, Proc. Lond. Math. Soc, Series 2, Vol. 1, 1904, p. 367-372. Nisbet extended the Whittaker and Debye two-potential solutions of Maxwell's equations to points within the source distribution. This is a full generalization of the vector superpotentials (for media of arbitrary properties) together with their relations to such scalar potentials as those of Debye. See A. Nisbet, Physica, Vol. 21, 1955, p. 799. Also, A. Ricci in 1901 introduced what might be called the magnetization potential, satisfying a certain equation, as an alternate to the Hertz vector. This was a part of early vector superpotentials. For an excellent overview discussion of superpotentials and related things, see Melba Phillips, "Classical Electrodynamics," in Principles of Electrodynamics and Relativity, Vol. IV of Encyclopedia of Physics, edited by S. Flugge, Springer-Verlag, 1962. Phillips discusses, for example, that Whittaker 1903 (note: oral delivery; paper was published in 1904) was the first to prove that one can derive a general electromagnetic field from two scalar functions, which are really components of the vector superpotentials, with proper choices of the gauge functions. Whittaker's method is well known in the treatment of transverse electric and transverse magnetic modes of a cylindrical cavity or a waveguide. Nisbet has shown that this result may be extended within the source distribution (assumed given) by a suitable choice of stream functions. The Debye potentials and the Bromwich potentials are essentially radial components of the vector potentials of which Whittaker potentials are the real parts. So in general the particular integral (the stream potentials) of the inhomogeneous Maxwell equations may be so chosen that the complementary function can be expressed in terms of only two scalars, which are components of the vector superpotentials. The Whittaker and the Debye-Bromwich potentials are special cases of two vector superpotentials.

By inadvertently using highly compressed time-energy, cold fusion researchers are actually using—on the tabletop—higher energy density than our present high-energy physics uses in its largest accelerators. The conventional scientific community does not have a single scientific program dedicated to using time as energy, even when one's physics model can legitimately be made of a single fundamental unit. When the joule is chosen as that unit, then time becomes totally a function of energy, just as is mass. The use of mass-energy gave us the nuclear age; the use of time-energy will give us a far greater age, if we can ever get the scientific community off its duff and moving.

74. Further, the second law of thermodynamics has long been known not to apply to a single charge, atom, or molecule or to a small group. For such microscopic phenomena, there will occur reversed reactions a certain small fraction of the time. But also see G. M. Wang, E. M. Sevick, Emil Mittag, Debra J. Searles, and Denis J. Evans, "Experimental Demonstration of Violations of the Second Law of Thermodynamics for Small Systems and Short Time Scales," Phys. Rev. Lett., 89(5), 29 July 2002, 050601. These researchers have experimentally proven that the second law can be and is violated for much larger scales—up to micro (colloidal) size—and for much longer times (up to two seconds). Hence it is now proven that such "reversed zones" where reactions run backwards for quite a bit, can and do in fact occur on the colloidal scale, sufficient for the formation of large clusters of like charges. Evans and his colleagues have pointed out that these results dramatically affect chemistry.

83. Basically, the choice between distant heating in the interference zone, or distant cooling, is as simple as how one biases the ground potential used for the electrical grounds of the interferometer transmitters. Biasing well above the ambient potential in the distant IZ produces divergent EM energy (heat) forming and radiating in the distant zone. Biasing well below the ambient IZ potential produces convergent EM energy (cold) forming and radiating in the distant zone.

84. Mass is mostly empty space filled with EM potentials, fields, and waves. Since these potentials, fields, and waves are simply bundles of longitudinal EM waves and their impressed dynamics, it follows that mass itself is mostly a "giant superhighway" for the transmission of LWs. This is actually a sort of "subspace" transmission "right through" matter, so to speak.

85. As demonstrated by such dual serial usage by a giant interferometer in the anomalous and explosive "cloud" phenomena near the Kurils in April 1984. For excellent descriptive articles and a hard look at the phenomena, see Walker et al., Science, ibid.

Study Inst. on Advances in Biological Effects and Dosimetry of Low Energy Electromagnetic Fields,* Plenum Press, New York, 1983, p. 359-391. Adey apparently was aware only of ordinary U(l) electrodynamics. He describes the LIDA device as follows: "Soviet investigators have also developed a therapeutic device utilizing low frequency square wave modulation of a radiofrequency field. This instrument know as the LIDA, was developed by L. Y. Rabichev and his colleagues in Soviet Armenia, and is designed for the 'treatment of neuropsychic and somatic disorders, such as neuroses, psychoses, insomnia, hypertension, stammering, bronchial asthma, and asthenic and reactic disturbances.' It is covered by U.S. Patent #3,773,049. In addition to the pulsed RF field, the device also delivered pulsed light, pulsed sound, and pulsed heat. Each stimulus train can be independently adjusted in intensity and frequency. The radiofrequency field has a nominal carrier frequency of 40 MHz and a maximum output of approximately 40 watts. The RF field is applied to the patient on the sides of the neck through two disc electrodes approximately 10 cm. in diameter. The electrodes are located at a distance of 2-4 cm from the skin. Optimal repetition frequencies are said to lie in the range from 40 to 80 pulses per minute. Pulse duration is typically 0.2 sec. In a 1-year trial period, the instrument was used on 740 patients, including adults and children. Positive therapeutic effects were claimed in more than 80 percent of the cases treated." We accent that this is one of the simplest Russian psychoenergetics devices, obsoleted very early on, and thus released very early for public use.

87. Since U.S. researchers are unaware of the EM wave polarization transduction mechanisms, and in general have no instruments for detecting longitudinal EM waves, the specific transduction effects on humans would not be measured by U.S. laboratories. Hence the U.S. scientists could only think of it in conventional electrodynamic terms, and remained totally unknowledgeable about the specific transduction mechanisms in the human body producing time-polarized EM waves and effects from the device.

90. One of the serious goals of the die-hard KGB psychoenergetics scientists appears to be to achieve the capability of directly engineering the entire human collective unconscious mind. The plan envisioned is to convert the human species into a sort of "giant ant species" where each one has perfect, machine-like niche and function (except, of course, for the elite Communist masters). In short, they conceived back there in the 1960s that such a "perfect communist state" for all humanity was in fact possible to achieve technically, with sufficient development of psychoenergetic technology. They are apparently well along the way toward achieving that goal. [The U.S. has not even conceived such a scientific possibility, and modern cognitive science in the West seems bent on the rather astounding proposition that mind itself does not even exist!]. We point out that no type of physical defense is even possible against such a capability engineered into the collective human unconscious, once it is achieved. The only "counter" is to use the same technology (it has to first be developed) to "re-engineer" what will have been done. But our fellows have not even conceived the possibility of the threat, much less the cause or the counter. Hence they continue to totally misunderstand what happened to Captains Button, Svoboda, and Hess in successful mind-control tests achieved perfectly at great distance.

91. To see the nature of the time-density wave (which is basically a longitudinal EM wave along the time axis), due to the perfect correlation between time-energy flow currents and variations with respect to longitudinal EM waves, see T.E. Bearden, "Giant Negentropy from the Common Dipole," 2000, ibid. Not stressed in the paper is the fact that the same dipolar negentropy with correlated EM time-energy currents and EM spatial energy currents, exists in the "individual" photon. Further, they can occur in coupled photon-antiphoton pairs, yielding the graviton. For time-polarized EM photons, it appears that two photon-antiphoton pairs are coupled, yielding the "supergraviton." Elsewhere we have briefly and addressed these novel formations as hypotheses.

92. Induction of specific diseases and health changes in the U.S. Embassy in Moscow over four decades, included causing the deaths of three U.S. Ambassadors. It was accomplished by implementing desired disease-pattern "engines" infolded inside field-free potentials. The Johns Hopkins study of the radiation patterns revealed a most significant finding: All the affected persons were in regions of the Embassy where the Russian microwave radiation fields were absent. In short, where the field-free—and thus very stable—potentials existed. Since these scientists (and most others in classical EM) consider that EM effects are caused only by fields, they concluded (totally erroneously) that these health changes could not have been caused by the microwave radiation. To the contrary, they had just clearly proven that the radiation was indeed the cause. They showed a 100% correlation to the presence of field-free potentials, and a 100% anticorrelation to where the fields were present. This was for induced phenomena over several years. Had the radiation not been the culprit, then some health changes would have occurred where the fields were present, and some would have occurred where they were absent. That is not what happened at all, and this inexplicable logical non sequitur against common statistical inference was the accepted decision. The truly revealing aspect was that apparently the entire U.S. Intelligence community had no competence or capability in higher group symmetry electrodynamics.

microwaves through a barrier wave-guide at an FTL group velocity of 4.7c, receiving audibly recognizable music from the microwave photons that survived their barrier passage.

Figure 25 on p. 185 shows the Lorentz concept of integrating the energy flow vector around a closed cylindrical surface surrounding a volumetric element. This is the procedure which arbitrarily selects only a small component of the total energy flow in space outside a circuit and associated with it—specifically, the small Poynting component diverged by the surface charges into the conductors to power the electrons—and then treats that tiny component as the "entire" vast energy flow (which may be a trillion or more times greater in magnitude). Thereby Lorentz arbitrarily discarded all the huge Heaviside energy transport component that does not strike the circuit at all, is not diverged into the conductors, and is just wasted. See Oliver Heaviside, Electrical Papers, Vol. 2, 1887, p. 94. Quoting: "It [the energy transfer flow] takes place, in the vicinity of the wire, very nearly parallel to it, with a slight slope towards the wire... . Prof. Poynting, on the other hand, holds a different view, representing the transfer as nearly perpendicular to a wire, i.e., with a slight departure from the vertical. This difference of a quadrant can, I think, only arise from what seems to be a misconception on his part as to the nature of the electric field in the vicinity of a wire supporting electric current. The lines of electric force are nearly perpendicular to the wire. The departure from perpendicularity is usually so small that I have sometimes spoken of them as being perpendicular to it, as they practically are, before I recognized the great physical importance of the slight departure. It causes the convergence of energy into the wire."

103. When it is associated with positive energy fields and potentials from positive mass, positive energy source charges, we have nominated that long-unaccounted Heaviside energy flow component as the source of the excess gravity holding the arms of the spiral galaxies together (a solution to the dark matter problem). When it is associated with negative energy fields and potentials from negative-energy Dirac Sea holes in 4-space, we have nominated that unaccounted energy flow component as the source of the excess antigravity responsible for accelerating the expansion of the universe (a solution to the dark energy problem).

104. About a year from now, Bedini and I will also release a very novel use of this Heaviside energy flow component in inverted circuits—circuits that operate almost completely in reverse from normal textbook circuits. This is a totally new kind of circuit that we hope will revolutionize power systems and electronic control systems. Until our intellectual property rights are secured, we are not releasing any details at all.

Most waves caused by a single frequency source have a galloping motion. The only exceptions are the very special cases of absolutely pure moving waves or absolutely pure standing waves. The superposition and resulting interference of two oppositely moving waves generally yield a wave having nonuniform motion; in short, the wave rushes forward rapidly, then slows appreciably, etc. A relativistic example is given in which the source frame observes a very nonuniformly galloping wave whose velocity varies between 0.01 c and 100 c, even though its average velocity is c. Relativistic properties of interfering electromagnetic plane waves are discussed.

111. I.e., one may speak of the "potential" of a specific engine of a former life form, and then realize that the potential for that form reduces in magnitude inversely as the radial distance from the Earth. However, it does not reduce to zero until an infinite distance is reached.

112. As an example, a great EM energy flow—produced by the cross product ExH of the earth's magnetic field and the earth-to-electrosphere electric field—flows from West to East around the earth, nearly parallel to the equator. Infolded in that great EM energy flow are all the structures of all the genetics and life forms on earth, or that have ever been on earth and conditioned the natural scalar potential of the earth. The vials in the laboratory experiments of Miller, Fox, and Urey were all continually bathed in that great energy flow, which within it contained the entire life structure and dynamics of the planet. So no "inert" experiments were ever performed, contrary to the interpretations of the scientific community.

114. Specifically, the down payment was $900 million in gold. The lease is probably about $1 billion per year. Thus the Yakuza acquired very powerful strategic weapons, and became a secret power to be reckoned with internationally and strategically. Since 1990, weather engineering over the U.S. and occasional shootdown of aircraft (such as the TWA-800) have been by rogue Japanese fingers on the scalar interferometer weapon triggers, on site in Russia.

115. The Yakuza has also transferred some of the longitudinal EM wave interferometry technology to their Japanese facilities. One such system has apparently been deployed in the power grid, and has been used to kill some government officials who opposed the Yakuza. This information was obtained by some brave Japanese risking their lives to get the information to the present author.

116. Many important KGB weapon tests happened in April of various years; the KGB weapons folks were simply preparing for their May Day reports, and each wished to have a good one.

117. Sen. Sam Nunn's investigation teams verified that the Aum Shinrikyo were actively seeking the "Tesla Weapons", with the Aum Shinrikyo even visiting the Tesla Museum in Beograd for that purpose. We have 100% certain confirmation of the Yakuza and Aum Shinrikyo leasing of the scalar interferometers from the KGB and Russian Mafia (working for the KGB) at the end of 1989 or first few days of 1990. Sen. Nunn's report confirms that the Aum Shinrikyo set up a University in Moscow. Our comment is that this is where the Russians actually taught the Japanese crews the science and technical functions so that they could successfully man and use the scalar (longitudinal EM wave) interferometry weapons.

118. Recall that in the 1950s and early 1960s, Kaznacheyev et al., ibid., had already clearly proven that nearly any form of cellular change, damage, or disease could be induced in cells at a distance by purely electrodynamic means.

119. In the kill of the Arrow DC-8 at Gander, Newfoundland on 12 Dec. 1985, the struck aircraft did charge up with time-density charging, and many pieces of the wreckage did indeed emit longitudinal EM waves thereafter for some time. Consequently, the Canadian recovery crews working the site and handling the materials, were exposed to longitudinal EM wave radiation for varying degrees of exposure. It follows that many of those on-site handlers should have later come down with physical ailments, with symptoms such as flu-like features, weakness, heart palpitations, headaches, dizziness, disturbance of equilibrium, and with various infections because of weakened immune systems. They also should have had weakened cellular regenerative (healing) systems, so their physical problems would endure and largely remain. About five dozen of the recovery personnel did come down with those exact symptoms, and many remained disabled or debilitated for some years.

120. We have also explained (a) why the French forces in the Gulf War did not get GWS, while American, British, and Canadian forces did, (b) why the native population did not exhibit GWS, and (c) the remaining anomalous phenomena associated, such as the semen "infecting" the wife, the children catching similar or related conditions from sustained close proximity to their father's biofields (transmission of engines), etc.

123. Two examples of inane articles and actions in this respect, revealing no knowledge that every charge in the universe already exhibits COP = oo, are (a)

Graham P. Collins, "There's No Stopping Them: Perpetual Motion is alive and well at the U.S. Patent Office," and (b) Resolution by the Executive Board at the June 2002 meeting of the American Physical Society (APS) as follows: "The Executive Board of the American Physical Society is concerned that in this period of unprecedented scientific advance, misguided or fraudulent claims of perpetual motion machines and other sources of unlimited free energy are proliferating. Such devices directly violate the most fundamental laws of nature, laws that have guided the scientific progress that is transforming our world." So the learned APS has just declared the source charge as an unacceptable "free energy" machine and perpetual motion machine, since the charge simply sits there and continuously pours out real observable EM energy in all directions at the speed of light, without any observable EM energy input. Thus the APS has implicitly declared all EM fields and potentials and their energy—which includes every joule of EM energy in the universe, in matter or in space—to be unacceptable byproducts of perpetual motion nonsense. We heartily call upon the APS in the name of science to enforce their resolution in the orthodox academic community, who are the greatest perpetual motion advocates in history. To be consistent with their own resolution, they must root out and destroy—from all texts and universities and from the scientific literature—any mention whatsoever of charge, field, potential, and EM energy. Either they must do that, or stand hoisted on their own petard as a dogmatic group still very much unaware of why the Nobel Prize was awarded to Lee and Yang in 1957 and what the proof—by Wu et al.—of the asymmetry of opposite charges means with respect to the source charge considered in its modern quantum field theory view as a dipolarity of a bare infinite central charge surrounded by clustering virtual charges (also infinite charge) of opposite sign in the active vacuum. Every electrical engineering department and professor and textbook still uses a model and teaches a subject assuming that every charge in the universe freely creates energy from nothing at all. Further, the APS in every annual meeting also tolerates, encourages, and publishes multiple papers and presentations with the same such unacceptable perpetual motion assumptions in them. Such is the lofty understanding of our present organized scientific community, which seems much more politically bent than scientifically bent. The simple Bohren experiment and the entire area of negative resonance absorption of the medium has long been established in nonlinear optics, and such experiments widely yield a nominal COP = 18. In other words, the experiments nominally output 18 times as much energy as the operator inputs, and the excess input energy is furnished absolutely for free from the active vacuum's exchange. In this case the Executive Board of the APS is not even aware of what its own physics discipline has long proven and accepted in particle physics, for nearly a half century. Neither are the self-appointed defenders of the faith, who also are totally unaware of what physics has already proven with a Nobel Prize awarded nearly a half century ago.

129. Roy Brewer was very active in Hollywood Unions against Communists when they were busily penetrating the Hollywood complex. He was a staunch anti-communist, fighting them out of control of the unions, way back when. Ronald Reagan was a personal friend of his of long standing, and Roy had open access to the White House when Reagan was President.

Roy briefed Reagan on the Russian scalar weapons, and Reagan believed him. Three times, Reagan ordered his Secretary of Defense to take action in that area, but neither of the three did so because the U.S. Intelligence Community did not believe it and adamantly opposed any such action. We took quite a beating in those days, for quite a long time (some years), before certain key parts of the Government finally believed us, checked it out experimentally, and found that it worked.

Roy also introduced me to the Duke de Grantsmesnil, one of the last of the great old British intelligence men, now unfortunately deceased. In the hectic 1997 days when we were trying desperately to warn a little friendly nation (and our own) against a coming great strategic strike on the U.S. and other allies, the Duke played a major role in introducing us directly to higher political levels in that little nation - which was the only nation on earth that could counter the pending strike. The first planned strike scheduled in February 1997 was successfully countered, only to be immediately rescheduled. In the second incident, the attack was scheduled for May 1, 1997. We finally realized why the hostile nation could reschedule and go ahead, and needed then to warn the little nation of the reason in some detail. We had tried everything to get certain information through, and all means had failed. A former ambassador of that nation to Great Britain was also assassinated during that struggle. Roy Brewer was one of the key fellows assisting in that attempt, as were other personal colleagues of mine who also were witnesses and direct participants in those desperate events. When all else failed, I finally just faxed the Prime Minister directly, in the clear, some five days before the attack, urging the most urgent and immediate action possible by the Prime Minister. A complete change in command and control of the weapon was required, and that change had to be made and then the hostile nation had to be notified that the change was in place (and probably shown that it was). The Prime Minister accepted the message and the necessary action was carried out immediately. So two days or so before the actual attack was scheduled, that great hostile armada began standing down. Oh, the hostile nation and its leaders could have easily destroyed the entire United States in two hours or so, without fail! But then their own country would have promptly disappeared from the face of the earth. So they stood down. And our own Intel community never even picked it up (they did get my messages alerting the U.S. Government, but thought it was a joke or something). They, of course, also intercepted my open fax to the Prime Minister, and so were all over me for that one for a while thereafter.

Interestingly, at the very time that great armada was just beginning to stand down, then Secretary of Defense William Cohen made the following statement at a conference in Georgia: "Others are engaging even in an eco-type of terrorism whereby they can alter the climate, set off earthquakes, volcanoes remotely through the use of electromagnetic waves...so there are plenty of ingenious minds out there that are at work finding ways in which they can wreak terror upon other nations...It's real, and that's the reason why we have to intensify our efforts, and that's why this is so important." Secretary of Defense William Cohen at an April 1997 counterterrorism conference sponsored by former Senator Sam Nunn. Quoted from DoD News Briefing, Secretary of Defense William S. Cohen, Q&A at the Conference on Terrorism, Weapons of Mass Destruction, and U.S. Strategy, University of Georgia, Athens, Apr. 28, 1997.

Ironically, the Secretary was referring to the earlier scalar interferometer weapons, and now the quantum potential weapons etc. He was completely unaware that a great strategic strike had actually been scheduled and was just being aborted as he was speaking those words.

Roy Brewer is one of those fellows who has been a great American, has served his country admirably during his lifetime, and contributed greatly to preventing a planned take-over by the Communists of the labor unions of America. In addition, he helped set up the contacts with the friendly liltle foregn nation, so that on four occasions planned attacks to destroy the United States have been successfully aborted or handled.

As you know, one of the great failures in the Communist plan to have America go communist was their failure with the labor unions. And we owe that failure to the steadfast efforts of some staunch folks like Roy Brewer. He helped save our nation when many of us were still wearing knee pants.

130. Wheeler's principle, as stated in W. Misner, K. S. Thorne, and J. A. Wheeler, Gravitation, W.H. Freeman and Co., San Francisco, 1973, p. 5.

131. With the new improvements we uncovered, treatment time can be reduced to 5 minutes per patient. Three such treatments one week apart would be what are required. Hence one machine station could treat a patient every five minutes, around the clock. With sufficient portable treatment units, mass treatment for mass casualties would become a practical reality.

The Evidence of Earth's Lost Civilization

FINGERPRINTS OF THE GODS

BY THE AUTHOR OF THE SIGN AND THE SEAL

GRAHAM HANCOCK

$17.00

Could the story of mankind be far older than we have previously believed? Using tools as varied as archaeo-astronomy, geology, and computer analysis of ancient myths, Graham Hancock presents a compelling case to suggest that it is.

In Fingerprints of the Gods, Hancock embarks on a worldwide quest to put together all the pieces of the vast and fascinating jigsaw of mankind's hidden past. In ancient monuments as far apart as Egypt's Great Sphinx, the strange Andean ruins of Tiahuanaco, and Mexico's awe-inspiring Temples of the Sun and Moon, he reveals not only the clear fingerprints of an as-yet-unidentified civilization of remote antiquity, but also startling evidence of its vast sophistication, technological advancement, and evolved scientific knowledge.

A record-breaking number one best-seller in Britain, Fingerprints of the Gods contains the makings of an intellectual revolution, a dramatic and irreversible change in the way that we understand our past—and so our future.

And Fingerprints of the Gods tells us something more. As we recover the truth about prehistory, and discover the real meaning of ancient myths and monuments, it becomes apparent that a warning has been handed down to us, a warning of terrible cataclysm that afflicts the Earth in great cycles at irregular intervals of time — a cataclysm that may be about to recur.

GRAHAM HANCOCK was formerly East Africa correspondent for The Economist and a correspondent for the London Sunday Times. His The Sign and the Seal (Crown, 1992), an international best-seller, documented his real-life quest for the Ark of the Covenant. He has appeared on television with Michael Palin in his recent Pole to Pole series, and on the BBC and CNN, as well as the National Geographic's Explorer series. His next book is The Message of the Sphinx, written with Robert Bauval.

Praise for Graham Hancock's The Sign and the Seal

"A reading experience of pure gold . . . History buffs, Bible scholars, anyone who likes a great intellectual detective yarn will plunge into The Sign and the Seal and not come up for air until the end." —Seattle Times

Praise for Fingerprints of the Gods

"A fancy piece of historical sleuthing . . . intriguing and entertaining and sturdy enough to give a long pause for thought." —Kirkus Reviews

"Readers will hugely enjoy their quest in these pages of inspired storytelling." —The Times, London

Fingerprints of the Gods could not have been written without the generous, warm-hearted and sustaining love of my partner Santha Faiia—who always gives more than she takes and who enriches the lives of everyone around her with creativity, kindness and imagination. All the photographs in the book are her work.

I am also grateful for the support and encouragement of our six children—Gabrielle, Leila, Luke, Ravi, Sean and Shanti—each one of whom I feel privileged to know.

My parents, Donald and Muriel Hancock, have been incredibly helpful, active and involved through this and many other difficult times and projects. Together with my uncle James Macaulay they have also patiently read the drafts of the evolving manuscript, offering a wealth of positive suggestions. Thanks, too, to my oldest and closest friend, Peter Marshall, with whom I have weathered many storms, and to Rob Gardner, Joseph and Sherry Jahoda, Roel Oostra, Joseph and Laura Schor, Niven Sinclair, Colin Skinner and Clem Vallance, all of whom gave me good advice.

In 1992 I suddenly found that I had a friend in Lansing, Michigan. His name is Ed Ponist and he got in touch with me soon after the publication of my previous book, The Sign and the Seal. Like a guardian angel he volunteered to devote a hefty chunk of his spare time to helping me out in the US with research, contacts and the collection of documentary resources of relevance to Fingerprints of the Gods. He did a brilliant job, always sending me the right books just when I needed them and finding references that I didn't even know existed. He was also an accurate weather-vane on the quality of my work, whose judgement I quickly learned to trust and respect. Last but not least, when Santha and I went to Arizona, to the Hopi Nation, it was Ed who came with us and who opened the way.

Ed's initial letter was part of an overwhelming deluge of mail that I received from around the world after writing The Sign and the Seal. For a while I tried to answer all the letters individually. Eventually, however, I got swamped with the new work on Fingerprints and had to stop replying. I feel bad about this, and would like to take this opportunity to thank everybody who wrote to me and to whom I did not write back. I'm intending to be more systematic in the future because I enormously value this correspondence and appreciate the high-quality information that it frequently turns out to contain ...

Other researchers who have helped me on Fingerprints of the Gods have been Martin Slavin, David Mestecky and Jonathan Derrick. In addition I would like to thank my Anglophone editors on both sides of the Atlantic,

Tom Weldon at Heinemann, Jim Wade at Crown and John Pearce at Doubleday Canada, as well as my literary agents Bill Hamilton and Sara Fisher, for their continuing commitment, solidarity and wise counsel.

My warmest appreciation also to those co-researchers and colleagues who have become my friends during the course of this investigation: Robert Bauval in Britain (with whom I shall be co-authoring two future books on related subjects), Colin Wilson, John Anthony West and Lew Jenkins in the United States, Rand and Rose Flem-Ath and Paul William Roberts in Canada.

Finally I want to pay tribute to Ignatius Donnelly, Arthur Posnansky, R.A. Schwaller de Lubicz, Charles Hapgood and Giorgio de Santillana—investigators who saw that something was badly wrong with the history of mankind, who had the courage to speak out against intellectual adversity, and who pioneered the momentous paradigm shift that is now irrevocably under way.

Introduction

The Mystery of the Maps

Chapter 1

A Map of Hidden Places

8 RECONNAISSANCE TECHNICAL SQUADRON (SAC)
UNITED STATES AIRFORCE
Westover Airforce Base
Massachusetts

6 July 1960

SUBJECT: Admiral Piri Reis World Map

To: Professor Charles H. Hapgood,
Keene College,
Keene, New Hampshire.

Dear Professor Hapgood,

Your request for evaluation of certain unusual features of the Piri Reis World Map of 1513 by this organization has been reviewed.

The claim that the lower part of the map portrays the Princess Martha Coast of Queen Maud Land Antarctica, and the Palmer Peninsula, is reasonable. We find this is the most logical and in all probability the correct interpretation of the map.

The geographical detail shown in the lower part of the map agrees very remarkably with the results of the seismic profile made across the top of the ice-cap by the Swedish-British Antarctic Expedition of 1949.

This indicates the coastline had been mapped before it was covered by the ice-cap.

The ice-cap in this region is now about a mile thick.

We have no idea how the data on this map can be reconciled with the supposed state of geographical knowledge in 1513.

HAROLD Z. OHLMEYER
Lt Colonel, USAF
Commander

Despite the deadpan language, Ohlmeyer's letter[1] is a bombshell. If Queen Maud Land was mapped before it was covered by ice, the original cartography must have been done an extraordinarily long time ago.

How long ago exactly?

Conventional wisdom has it that the Antarctic ice-cap, in its present extent and form, is millions of years old. On closer examination, this notion turns out to be seriously flawed—so seriously that we need not assume the map drawn by Admiral Piri Reis depicts Queen Maud Land as it looked millions of years in the past. The best recent evidence suggests that Queen Maud Land, and the neighbouring regions shown on the map, passed through a long ice-free period which may not have come completely to an end until about six thousand years ago.[2] This evidence, which we shall touch upon again in the next chapter, liberates us from the burdensome task of explaining who (or what) had the technology to undertake an accurate geographical survey of Antarctica in, say, two million BC, long before our own species came into existence. By the same token, since map-making is a complex and civilized activity, it compels us to explain how such a task could have been accomplished even six thousand years ago, well before the development of the first true civilizations recognized by historians.

Ancient sources

In attempting that explanation it is worth reminding ourselves of the basic historical and geological facts:

1. The Piri Reis Map, which is a genuine document, not a hoax of any kind, was made at Constantinople in AD 1513.[3]
2. It focuses on the western coast of Africa, the eastern coast of South America and the northern coast of Antarctica.
3. Piri Reis could not have acquired his information on this latter region from contemporary explorers because Antarctica remained undiscovered until AD 1818,[4] more than 300 years after he drew the map.
4. The ice-free coast of Queen Maud Land shown in the map is a colossal puzzle because the geological evidence confirms that the latest date it could have been surveyed and charted in an ice-free condition is 4000 BC.[5]
5. It is not possible to pinpoint the earliest date that such a task could have been accomplished, but it seems that the Queen Maud Land littoral may have remained in a stable, unglaciated condition for at least 9000 years before the spreading ice-cap swallowed it entirely.[6]

---

[2] Ibid., pp. 93-98, 235. The period lasted from about 13000 BC to 4000 BC according, for example, to the findings of Dr Jack Hough of Illinois University, supported by experts at the Carnegie Institution, Washington DC. John G. Weiphaupt, a University of Colorado specialist in seismology and gravity and planetary geology, is another who supports the view of a relatively late ice-free period in at least parts of Antarctica. Together with a number of other geologists, he places that period in a narrower band than Hough et al.—from 7000 BC to 4000 BC.

6 There is no civilization known to history that had the capacity or need to survey that coastline in the relevant period: between 13,000 BC and 4000 BC.[7]

In other words, the true enigma of this 1513 map is not so much its inclusion of a continent not discovered until 1818 but its portrayal of part of the coastline of that continent under ice-free conditions which came to an end 6000 years ago and have not since recurred.

How can this be explained? Piri Reis obligingly gives us the answer in a series of notes written in his own hand on the map itself. He tells us that he was not responsible for the original surveying and cartography. On the contrary, he admits that his role was merely that of compiler and copyist and that the map was derived from a large number of source maps.[8] Some of these had been drawn by contemporary or near-contemporary explorers (including Christopher Columbus), who had by then reached South America and the Caribbean, but others were documents dating back to the fourth century BC or earlier.[9]

Piri Reis did not venture any suggestion as to the identity of the cartographers who had produced the earlier maps. In 1963, however, Professor Hapgood proposed a novel and thought-provoking solution to the problem. He argued that some of the source maps the admiral had made use of, in particular those said to date back to the fourth century BC, had themselves been based on even older sources, which in turn had been based on sources originating in the furthest antiquity. There was, he asserted, irrefutable evidence that the earth had been comprehensively mapped before 4000 BC by a hitherto unknown and undiscovered civilization which had achieved a high level of technological advancement:[10]

> It appears [he concluded] that accurate information has been passed down from people to people. It appears that the charts must have originated with a people unknown and they were passed on, perhaps by the Minoans and the Phoenicians, who were, for a thousand years and more, the greatest sailors of the ancient world. We have evidence that they were collected and studied in the great library of Alexandria [Egypt] and that compilations of them were made by the geographers who worked there.[11]

From Alexandria, according to Hapgood's reconstruction, copies of these compilations and of some of the original source maps were transferred to other centres of learning—notably Constantinople. Finally, when Constantinople was seized by the Venetians during the Fourth Crusade in 1204, the maps began to find their way into the hands of European sailors and adventurers:

> Most of these maps were of the Mediterranean and the Black Sea. But maps of other areas survived. These included maps of the Americas and maps of the Arctic and Antarctic Oceans. It becomes clear that the ancient voyagers travelled from pole to pole. Unbelievable as it may appear, the evidence nevertheless indicates that some ancient people explored Antarctica when its coasts were free of ice. It is clear, too, that they had an instrument of navigation for accurately determining longitudes that was far superior to anything possessed by the peoples of ancient, medieval or modern times until the second half of the eighteenth century.
> This evidence of a lost technology will support and give credence to many of the other hypotheses that have been brought forward of a lost civilization in remote times. Scholars have been able to dismiss most of that evidence as mere myth, but here we have evidence that cannot be dismissed. The evidence requires that all the > other evidence that has been brought forward in the past should be re-examined with an open mind.[12]

Despite a ringing endorsement from Albert Einstein (see below), and despite the later admission of John Wright, president of the American Geographical Society, that Hapgood had ‘posed hypotheses that cry aloud for further testing’, no further scientific research has ever been undertaken into these anomalous early maps. Moreover, far from being applauded for making a serious new contribution to the debate about the antiquity of human civilization, Hapgood until his death was cold-shouldered by the majority of his professional peers, who couched their discussion of his work in what has accurately been described as ‘thick and unwarranted sarcasm, selecting trivia and factors not subject to verification as the bases for condemnation, seeking in this way to avoid the basic issues’.[13]

A man ahead of his time

The late Charles Hapgood taught the history of science at Keene College, New Hampshire, USA. He wasn’t a geologist, or an ancient historian. It is possible, however, that future generations will remember him as the man whose work undermined the foundations of world history—and a large chunk of world geology as well.

Albert Einstein was among the first to realize this when he took the unprecedented step of contributing the foreword to a book Hapgood wrote in 1953, some years before he began his investigation of the Piri Reis Map:

> I frequently receive communications from people who wish to consult me concerning their unpublished ideas [Einstein observed]. It goes without saying that these ideas are very seldom possessed of scientific validity. The very first communication, however, that I received from Mr. Hapgood electrified me. His idea is original, of great simplicity, and—if it continues to prove itself—of great importance to everything that is related to the history of the earth’s surface.[14]

The ‘idea’ expressed in Hapgood’s 1953 book is a global geological theory which elegantly explains how and why large parts of Antarctica could have remained ice-free until 4000 BC, together with many other anomalies of earth science. In brief the argument is:

1 Antarctica was not always covered with ice and was at one time much warmer than it is today.

[14] From Einstein's foreword (written in 1953) to Charles H. Hapgood, Earth's Shifting Crust: A Key to Some Basic Problems of Earth Science, Pantheon Books, New York, 1958, pp. 1-2.

2 It was warm because it was not physically located at the South Pole in that period. Instead it was approximately 2000 miles farther north. This 'would have put it outside the Antarctic Circle in a temperate or cold temperate climate'.[15]
3 The continent moved to its present position inside the Antarctic Circle as a result of a mechanism known as 'earth-crust displacement'. This mechanism, in no sense to be confused with plate-tectonics or 'continental drift', is one whereby the lithosphere, the whole outer crust of the earth, 'may be displaced at times, moving over the soft inner body, much as the skin of an orange, if it were loose, might shift over the inner part of the orange all in one piece'.[16]
4 During the envisaged southwards movement of Antarctica brought about by earth-crust displacement, the continent would gradually have grown colder, an ice-cap forming and remorselessly expanding over several thousands of years until it attained its present dimensions.'[17]

Further details of the evidence supporting these radical proposals are set out in Part VIII of this book. Orthodox geologists, however, remain reluctant to accept Hapgood's theory (although none has succeeded in proving it incorrect). It raises many questions.

Of these by far the most important is: what conceivable mechanism would be able to exert sufficient thrust on the lithosphere to precipitate a phenomenon of such magnitude as a crustal displacement?

We have no better guide than Einstein to summarize Hapgood's findings:

> In a polar region there is continual deposition of ice, which is not symmetrically distributed about the pole. The earth's rotation acts on these unsymmetrically deposited masses, and produces centrifugal momentum that is transmitted to the rigid crust of the earth. The constantly increasing centrifugal momentum produced in this way will, when it has reached a certain point, produce a movement of the earth's crust over the rest of the earth's body ..."[18]

The Piri Reis Map seems to contain surprising collateral evidence in support of the thesis of a geologically recent glaciation of parts of Antarctica following a sudden southward displacement of the earth's crust. Moreover since such a map could only have been drawn prior to 4000 BC, its implications for the history of human civilization are staggering. Prior to 4000 BC there are supposed to have been no civilizations at all.

At some risk of over-simplification, the academic consensus is broadly:

- Civilization first developed in the Fertile Crescent of the Middle East.

[16] Ibid., p. 187.
[17] Ibid., p. 189.
[18] Einstein's foreword to Earth's Shifting Crust, p. 1

- This development began after 4000 BC, and culminated in the emergence of the earliest true civilizations (Sumer and Egypt) around 3000 BC, soon followed by the Indus Valley and China.
- About 1500 years later, civilization took off spontaneously and independently in the Americas.
- Since 3000 BC in the Old World (and about 1500 BC in the New) civilization has steadily 'evolved' in the direction of ever more refined, complex and productive forms.
- In consequence, and particularly by comparison with ourselves, all ancient civilizations (and all their works) are to be understood as essentially primitive (the Sumerian astronomers regarded the heavens with unscientific awe, and even the pyramids of Egypt were built by 'technological primitives').

The evidence of the Piri Reis Map appears to contradict all this.

Piri Reis and his sources

In his day, Piri Reis was a well-known figure; his historical identity is firmly established. An admiral in the navy of the Ottoman Turks, he was involved, often on the winning side, in numerous sea battles around the mid-sixteenth century. He was, in addition, considered an expert on the lands of the Mediterranean, and was the author of a famous sailing book, the Kitabi Bahriye, which provided a comprehensive description of the coasts, harbours, currents, shallows, landing places, bays and straits of the Aegean and Mediterranean Seas. Despite this illustrious career he fell foul of his masters and was beheaded in AD 1554 or 1555.[19]

The source maps Piri Reis used to draw up his 1513 map were in all probability lodged originally in the Imperial Library at Constantinople, to which the admiral is known to have enjoyed privileged access. Those sources (which may have been transferred or copied from even more ancient centres of learning) no longer exist, or, at any rate, have not been found. It was, however, in the library of the old Imperial Palace at Constantinople that the Piri Reis Map was rediscovered, painted on a gazelle skin and rolled up on a dusty shelf, as recently as 1929.[20]

Legacy of a lost civilization?

As the baffled Ohlmeyer admitted in his letter to Hapgood in 1960, the Piri Reis Map depicts the subglacial topography, the true profile of Queen Maud Land Antarctica beneath the ice. This profile remained completely hidden from view from 4000 BC (when the advancing ice sheet covered it) until it was revealed again as a result of the comprehensive seismic survey of Queen Maud Land carried out during 1949 by a joint British-Swedish scientific reconnaissance team.[21]

If Piri Reis had been the only cartographer with access to such anomalous information, it would be wrong to place any great weight on his map. At the most one might say, 'Perhaps it is significant but, then again, perhaps it is just a coincidence.' However, the Turkish admiral was by no means alone in the possession of seemingly impossible and inexplicable geographical knowledge. It would be futile to speculate further than Hapgood has already done as to what 'underground stream' could have carried and preserved such knowledge through the ages, transmitting fragments of it from culture to culture and from epoch to epoch. Whatever the mechanism, the fact is that a number of other cartographers seem to have been privy to the same curious secrets.

Is it possible that all these map-makers could have partaken, perhaps unknowingly, in the bountiful scientific legacy of a vanished civilization?

Chapter 2

Rivers in the Southern Continent

In the Christmas recess of 1959-60 Charles Hapgood was looking for Antarctica in the Reference Room of the Library of Congress, Washington DC. For several consecutive weeks he worked there, lost in the search, surrounded by literally hundreds of medieval maps and charts.

> I found [he reported] many fascinating things I had not expected to find, and a number of charts showing the southern continent. Then, one day, I turned a page and sat transfixed. As my eyes fell upon the southern hemisphere of a world map drawn by Oronteus Finaeus in 1531, I had the instant conviction that I had found here a truly authentic map of the real Antarctica.
> The general shape of the continent was startlingly like the outline of the continent on our modern maps. The position of the South Pole, nearly in the center of the continent, seemed about right. The mountain ranges that skirted the coasts suggested the numerous ranges that have been discovered in Antarctica in recent years. It was obvious, too, that this was no slapdash creation of somebody's imagination. The mountain ranges were individualized, some definitely coastal and some not. From most of them rivers were shown flowing into the sea, following in every case what looked like very natural and very convincing drainage patterns. This suggested, of course, that the coasts may have been ice-free when the original map was drawn. The deep interior, however, was free entirely of rivers and mountains, suggesting that the ice might have been present there.[1]

Closer investigation of the Oronteus Finaeus Map by Hapgood, and by Dr Richard Strachan of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, confirmed the following:

1. It had been copied and compiled from several earlier source maps drawn up according to a number of different projections.[2]
2. It did indeed show non-glacial conditions in coastal regions of Antarctica, notably Queen Maud Land, Enderby Land, Wilkes Land, Victoria Land (the east coast of the Ross Sea), and Marie Byrd Land.[3]
3. As in the case of the Piri Reis Map, the general profile of the terrain, and the visible physical features, matched closely seismic survey maps of the subglacial land surfaces of Antarctica.[4]

The Oronteus Finaeus Map, Hapgood concluded, appeared to document 'the surprising proposition that Antarctica was visited and perhaps settled by men when it was largely if not entirely non-glacial. It goes without saying that this implies a very great antiquity ... [Indeed] the Oronteus Finaeus Map takes the civilization of the original map-makers back to a time contemporary with the end of the last Ice Age in the northern hemisphere.'[5]

Ross Sea

Further evidence in support of this view arises from the manner in which the Ross Sea was shown by Oronteus Finaeus. Where today great glaciers like the Beardmore and the Scott disgorge themselves into the sea, the 1531 map shows estuaries, broad inlets and indications of rivers. The unmistakable implication of these features is that there was no ice on the Ross Sea or its coasts when the source maps used by Oronteus Finaeus were made: 'There also had to be a considerable hinterland free of ice to feed the rivers. At the present time all these coasts and their hinterlands are deeply buried in the mile-thick ice-cap, while on the Ross Sea itself there is a floating ice-shelf hundreds of feet thick.'[6]

The Ross Sea evidence provides strong corroboration for the notion that Antarctica must have been mapped by some unknown civilization during the extensively ice-free period which ended around 4000 BC. This is emphasized by the coring tubes used, in 1949, by one of the Byrd Antarctic Expeditions to take samples of sediment from the bottom of the Ross Sea. The sediments showed numerous clearly demarcated layers of stratification reflecting different environmental conditions in different epochs: ‘coarse glacial marine’, ‘medium glacial marine’, ‘fine glacial marine’, and so on. The most surprising discovery, however, ‘was that a number of the layers were formed of fine-grained, well-assorted sediments, such as are brought down to the sea by rivers flowing from temperate (that is, ice-free) lands ...’[7]

[6] Ibid., p. 93-6.

Using the ionium-dating method developed by Dr W. D. Urry (which makes use of three different radioactive elements found in sea water[8]), researchers at the Carnegie Institute in Washington DC were able to establish beyond any reasonable doubt that great rivers carrying fine-grained well-assorted sediments had indeed flowed in Antarctica until about 6000 years ago, as the Oronteus Finaeus Map showed. It was only after that date, around 4000 BC, ‘that the glacial kind of sediment began to be deposited on the Ross Sea bottom ... The cores indicate that warm conditions had prevailed for a long period before that.’[9]

Mercator and Buache

The Piri Reis and Oronteus Finaeus Maps therefore provide us with a glimpse of Antarctica as no cartographer in historical times could possibly have seen it. On their own, of course, these two pieces of evidence should not be sufficient to persuade us that we might be gazing at the fingerprints of a lost civilization. Can three, or four, or six such maps, however, be dismissed with equal justification?

The Mercator map, showing Antarctica's mountains and rivers covered by ice.

Is it safe, or reasonable, for example, for us to continue to ignore the historical implications of some of the maps made by the sixteenth-century's most famous cartographer: Gerard Kremer, otherwise known as Mercator? Best remembered for the Mercator projection, still used on most world maps today, this enigmatic individual (who paid an unexplained visit to the Great Pyramid of Egypt in 1563[10]) was reportedly 'indefatigable in searching out ... the learning of long ago', and spent many years diligently accumulating a vast and eclectic reference library of ancient source maps.[11]

Significantly, Mercator included the Oronteus Finaeus map in his Atlas of 1569 and also depicted the Antarctic on several he himself drew in the same year. Identifiable parts of the then undiscovered southern continent on these maps are Cape Dart and Cape Herlacher in Marie Byrd Land, the Amundsen Sea, Thurston Island in Ellsworth Land, the Fletcher Islands in the Bellinghausen Sea, Alexander I Island, the Antarctic (Palmer) Peninsula, the Weddell Sea, Cape Norvegia, the Regula Range in Queen Maud Land (as islands), the Muhlig-Hoffman Mountains (as islands), the Prince Harald Coast, the Shirase Glacier as an estuary on Prince Harald Coast, Padda Island in Lutzow-Holm Bay, and the Prince Olaf Coast in Enderby Land. 'In some cases these features are more distinctly recognisable than on the Oronteus Finaeus Map,' observed Hapgood, 'and it seems clear, in general, that Mercator had at his disposal source maps other than those used by Oronteus Finaeus.'[12]

[11] Maps, p. 102.

And not only Mercator.

Philippe Buache, the eighteenth-century French geographer, was also able to publish a map of Antarctica long before the southern continent was officially 'discovered'. And the extraordinary feature of Buache's map is that it seems to have been based on source maps made earlier, perhaps thousands of years earlier, than those used by Oronteus Finaeus and Mercator. What Buache gives us is an eerily precise representation of Antarctica as it must have looked when there was no ice on it at all.[13] His map reveals the subglacial topography of the entire continent, which even we did not have full knowledge of until 1958, International Geophysical Year, when a comprehensive seismic survey was carried out.

That survey only confirmed what Buache had already proclaimed when he published his map of Antarctica in 1737. Basing his cartography on ancient sources now lost, the French academician depicted a clear waterway across the southern continent dividing it into two principal landmasses lying east and west of the line now marked by the Trans-Antarctic Mountains.

Such a waterway, connecting the Ross, Weddell and Bellinghausen Seas, would indeed exist if Antarctica were free of ice. As the 1958 IGY Survey shows, the continent (which appears on modern maps as one continuous landmass) consists of an archipelago of large islands with mile-thick ice packed between them and rising above sea level.

The epoch of the map-makers

As we have seen, many orthodox geologists believe that the last time any waterway existed in these ice-filled basins was millions of years ago. From the scholarly point of view, however, it is equally orthodox to affirm that no human beings had evolved in those remote times, let alone human beings capable of accurately mapping the landmasses of the Antarctic. The big problem raised by the Buache/IGY evidence is that those landmasses do seem to have been mapped when they were free of ice. This confronts scholars with two mutually contradictory propositions.

CARTE
DES TERRES AUSTRALES

The Buache map, with landmasses which show Antarctica very much as it would have looked before it became covered by ice.

Which one is correct?

If we are to go along with orthodox geologists and accept that millions of years have indeed elapsed since Antarctica was last completely free of ice, then all the evidence of human evolution, painstakingly accumulated by distinguished scientists from Darwin on, must be wrong. It seems inconceivable that this could be the case: the fossil record makes it abundantly clear that only the unevolved ancestors of humanity existed millions of years ago—low-browed knuckle-dragging hominids incapable of advanced intellectual tasks like map-making.

Are we therefore to assume the intervention of alien cartographers in orbiting spaceships to explain the existence of sophisticated maps of an ice-free Antarctica? Or shall we think again about the implications of Hapgood’s theory of earth-crust displacement which allows the southern continent to have been in the ice-free condition depicted by Buache as little as 15,000 years ago?[14]

Above left and right Redrawings of the Mercator and Oronteus Finaeus maps showing the progressive glaciation of Antarctica. Below left Redrawing of the Buache map. Below right The subglacial topography of Antarctica, according to modern seismic surveys.

An early nineteenth-century Russian map showing that the existence of Antarctica was at that time unknown. The continent was 'discovered' in AD 1818. But could it have been mapped thousands of years earlier than that by the cartographers of an as yet unidentified high civilization of prehistory?

Is it possible that a human civilization, sufficiently advanced to have mapped Antarctica, could have developed by 13,000 BC and later disappeared? And, if so, how much later?

The combined effect of the Piri Reis, Oronteus Finaeus, Mercator and Buache Maps is the strong, though disturbing, impression that Antarctica may have been continuously surveyed over a period of several thousands of years as the ice-cap gradually spread outwards from the interior, increasing its grip with every passing millennium but not engulfing all the coasts of the southern continent until around 4000 BC. The original sources for the Piri Reis and Mercator Maps must therefore have been prepared towards the end of this period, when only the coasts of Antarctica were free of ice; the source for the Oronteus Finaeus Map, on the other hand, seems to have been considerably earlier, when the ice-cap was present only in the deep interior of the continent; and the source for the Buache Map appears to originate in even earlier period (around 13,000 BC), when there may have been no ice in Antarctica at all.

South America

Were other parts of the world surveyed and accurately charted at widely separated intervals during this same epoch; roughly from 13,000 BC to 4000 BC? The answer may lie once again in the Piri Reis Map, which contains more mysteries than just Antarctica:

- Drawn in 1513, the map demonstrates an uncanny knowledge of South America—and not only of its eastern coast but of the Andes mountains on the western side of the continent, which were of course unknown at that time. The map correctly shows the Amazon River rising in these unexplored mountains and thence flowing eastwards.[15]
- Itself compiled from more than twenty different source documents of varying antiquity,[16] the Piri Reis Map depicts the Amazon not once but twice (most probably as a result of the unintentional overlapping of two of the source documents used by the Turkish admiral[17]). In the first of these the Amazon's course is shown down to its Para River mouth, but the important island of Marajo does not appear. According to Hapgood, this suggests that the relevant source map must have dated from a time, perhaps as much as 15,000 years ago, when the Para River was the main or only mouth of the Amazon and when Marajo Island was part of the mainland on the northern side of the river.[18] The second depiction of the Amazon, on the other hand, does show Marajo (and in fantastically accurate detail) despite the fact that this island was not discovered until 1543.[19] Again, the possibility is raised of an unknown civilization which undertook continuous surveying and mapping operations of the changing face of the earth over a period of many thousands of years, with Piri Reis making use of earlier and later source maps left behind by this civilization.
- Neither the Orinoco River nor its present delta is represented on the Piri Reis Map. Instead, as Hapgood proved, 'two estuaries extending far inland (for a distance of about 100 miles) are shown close to the site of the present river. The longitude on the grid would be correct for the Orinoco, and the latitude is also quite accurate. Is it possible that these estuaries have been filled in, and the delta extended this much, since the source maps were made?'[20]

- Although they remained undiscovered until 1592, the Falkland Islands appear on the 1513 map at their correct latitude.[21]
- The library of ancient sources incorporated in the Piri Reis Map may also account for the fact that it convincingly portrays a large island in the Atlantic Ocean to the east of the South American coast where no such island now exists. Is it pure coincidence that this 'imaginary' island turns out to be located right over the sub-oceanic Mid-Atlantic Ridge just north of the equator and 700 miles east of the coast of Brazil, where the tiny Rocks of Sts. Peter and Paul now jut above the waves?[22] Or was the relevant source map drawn deep in the last Ice Age, when sea levels were far lower than they are today and a large island could indeed have been exposed at this spot?

Sea levels and ice ages

Other sixteenth-century maps also look as though they could have been based on accurate world surveys conducted during the last Ice Age. One was compiled by the Turk Hadji Ahmed in 1559, a cartographer, as Hapgood puts it, who must have had access to some 'most extraordinary' source maps.[23]

The strangest and most immediately striking feature of Hadji Ahmed's compilation is that it shows quite plainly a strip of territory, almost 1000 miles wide, connecting Alaska and Siberia. Such a 'land-bridge', as geologists refer to it, did once exist (where the Bering Strait is now) but was submerged beneath the waves by rising sea levels at the end of the last Ice Age.[24]

The rising sea levels were caused by the tumultuous melting of the ice-cap which was rapidly retreating everywhere in the northern hemisphere by around 10,000 BC.[25] It is therefore interesting that at least one ancient map appears to show southern Sweden covered with remnant glaciers of the kind that must indeed have been prevalent then in these latitudes. The remnant glaciers are on Claudius Ptolemy's famous Map of the North. Originally compiled in the second century AD, this remarkable work from the last great geographer of classical antiquity was lost for hundreds of years and rediscovered in the fifteenth century.[26]

Ptolemy was custodian of the library at Alexandria, which contained the greatest manuscript collection of ancient times,[27] and it was there that he consulted the archaic source documents that enabled him to compile his own map.[28] Acceptance of the possibility that the original version of at least one of the charts he referred to could have been made around 10,000 BC helps us to explain why he shows glaciers, characteristic of that exact epoch, together with 'lakes ... suggesting the shapes of present-day lakes, and streams very much suggesting glacial streams ... flowing from the glaciers into the lakes.'[29]

It is probably unnecessary to add that no one on earth in Roman times, when Ptolemy drew his map, had the slightest suspicion that ice ages could once have existed in northern Europe. Nor did anyone in the fifteenth century (when the map was rediscovered) possess such knowledge. Indeed, it is impossible to see how the remnant glaciers and other features shown on Ptolemy's map could have been surveyed, imagined or invented by any known civilization prior to our own.

The implications of this are obvious. So, too, are the implications of another map, the 'Portolano' of Iehudi Ibn Ben Zara, drawn in the year 1487.[30] This chart of Europe and North Africa may have been based on a source even earlier than Ptolemy's, for it seems to show glaciers much farther south than Sweden (roughly on the same latitude as England in fact)[31] and to depict the Mediterranean, Adriatic and Aegean Seas as they might have looked before the melting of the European ice-cap.[32] Sea level would, of course, have been significantly lower than it is today. It is therefore interesting, in the case for instance of the Aegean section of the map, to note that a great many more islands are shown than currently exist.[33] At first sight this seems odd. However, if ten or twelve thousand years have indeed elapsed since the era when Ibn Ben Zara's source map was made, the discrepancy can be simply explained: the missing islands must have been submerged by rising sea levels at the end of the last Ice Age.

Once again we seem to be looking at the fingerprints of a vanished civilization—one capable of drawing impressively accurate maps of widely separated parts of the earth.

What kind of technology, and what state of science and culture, would have been required to do a job like that?

Chapter 3

Fingerprints of a Lost Science

We saw that the Mercator World Map of 1569 included an accurate portrayal of the coasts of Antarctica as they would have looked thousands of years ago when they were free of ice. Interestingly enough, this same map is considerably less accurate in its portrayal of another region, the west coast of South America, than an earlier (1538) map also drawn by Mercator.[1]

The reason for this appears to be that the sixteenth-century geographer based the earlier map on the ancient sources which we know he had at his disposal, whereas for the later map he relied upon the observations and measurements of the first Spanish explorers of western South America. Since those explorers had supposedly brought the latest information back to Europe, Mercator can hardly be blamed for following them. In so doing the accuracy of his work declined: instruments capable of finding longitude did not exist in 1569, but appear to have been used to prepare the ancient source documents Mercator consulted to produce his 1538 map.[2]

The mysteries of longitude

Let us consider the problem of longitude, defined as the distance in degrees east or west of the prime meridian. The current internationally accepted prime meridian is an imaginary curve drawn from the North Pole to the South Pole passing through the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, London. Greenwich therefore stands at o° longitude while New York, for example, stands at around 74° west, and Canberra, Australia, at roughly 150° east.

Longitude
Latitude

It would be possible to write an elaborate explanation of longitude and of what needs to be done to fix it precisely for any given point on the earth's surface. What we are concerned with here, however, is not so much technical detail as the accepted historical facts about humanity's growing knowledge of the mysteries of longitude. Among these facts, this is the most important: until a breakthrough invention in the eighteenth century, cartographers and navigators were unable to fix longitude with any kind of precision. They could only make guesses which were usually inaccurate by many hundreds of miles, because the technology had not yet been developed to allow them to do the job properly.

Latitude north or south of the equator did not pose such a problem: it could be worked out by means of angular measurements of the sun and stars taken with relatively simple instruments. But to find longitude equipment of an altogether different and superior calibre was needed, which could combine position measurements with time measurements. Throughout the span of known history the invention of such equipment had remained beyond the capacities of scientists, but by the beginning of the eighteenth century, with rapidly increasing sea traffic, a mood of impatience and urgency had set in. In the words of an authority on the period, 'The search for longitude overshadowed the life of every man afloat, and the safety of every ship and cargo. Accurate measurement seemed an impossible dream and "discovering the longitude" had become a stock phrase in the press like "pigs might fly".'[3]

What was needed, above all else, was an instrument that would keep the time (at the place of departure) with perfect accuracy during long sea journeys despite the motion of the ship and despite the adverse conditions of alternating heat and cold, wet and dry. ‘Such a Watch’, as Isaac Newton told the members of the British government’s official Board of Longitude in 1714, ‘hath not yet been made’.[4]

Indeed not. The timepieces of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries were crude devices which typically lost or gained as much as a quarter of an hour per day. By contrast, an effective marine chronometer could afford to lose or gain that much only over several years.[5]

It was not until the 1720s that the talented English clockmaker John Harrison began work on the first of a series of designs which resulted in the manufacture of such a chronometer. His objective was to win the prize of £20,000 offered by the Board of Longitude ‘for the inventor of any means of determining a ship’s longitude within 30 nautical miles at the end of a six weeks’ voyage’.[6] A chronometer capable of fulfilling this condition would have to keep time to within three seconds per day. It took almost forty years, during which several prototypes were completed and tested, before Harrison was able to meet these standards. Finally, in 1761, his elegant Chronometer No. 4 left Britain on board HMS Deptford bound for Jamaica, accompanied by Harrison’s son William. Nine days into the voyage, on the basis of longitude calculations made possible by the chronometer, William advised the captain that they would sight the Madeira Islands the following morning. The captain offered five to one that he was wrong but agreed to hold the course. William won the bet. Two months later, at Jamaica, the instrument was found to have lost just five seconds.[7]

Harrison had surpassed the conditions set by the Board of Longitude. Thanks to the British government’s bureaucratic dithering, however, he was not awarded the £20,000 prize money until three years before his death in 1776. Understandably, it was only when he had the funds in his hands that he divulged the secrets of his design. As a result of this delay, Captain James Cook did not have the benefit of a chronometer when he made his first voyage of discovery in 1768.[8] By the time of his third voyage, however (1778-9), he was able to map the Pacific with impressive accuracy, fixing not only the correct latitude but the correct longitude of every island and coastline.[9] Henceforward, ‘thanks to Cook’s care and Harrison’s chronometer ... no navigator could have an excuse for failing to find a Pacific island ... or for being wrecked on a coastline appearing from nowhere.'[10]

Indeed, with their accurate longitudes, Cook's Pacific maps must be ranked among the very first examples of the precise cartography of our modern era. They remind us, moreover, that the making of really good maps requires at least three key ingredients: great journeys of discovery; first-class mathematical and cartographic skills; sophisticated chronometers.

It was not until Harrison's chronometer became generally available in the 1770s that the third of these preconditions was fulfilled. This brilliant invention made it possible for cartographers to fix longitude precisely, something that the Sumerians, the Ancient Egyptians, the Greeks and the Romans, and indeed all other known civilizations before the eighteenth century were supposedly unable to do. It is therefore surprising and unsettling to come across vastly older maps which give latitudes and longitudes with modern precision.

Precision instruments

These inexplicably precise latitudes and longitudes are found in the same general category of documents that contain the advanced geographical knowledge I have outlined.

The Piri Reis Map of 1513, for example, places South America and Africa in the correct relative longitudes,[11] theoretically an impossible feat for the science of the time. But Piri Reis was candid in admitting that his map was based on far earlier sources. Could it have been from one of these sources that he derived his accurate longitudes?

Also of great interest is the so-called 'Dulcert Portulano' of AD 1339 which focuses on Europe and North Africa. Here latitude is perfect across huge distances and the total longitude of the Mediterranean and Black Seas is correct to within half a degree.[12]

Professor Hapgood comments that the maker of the original source from which the Dulcert Portulano was copied had 'achieved highly scientific accuracy in finding the ratio of latitude to longitude. He could only have done this if he had precise information on the relative longitudes of a great many places scattered all the way from Galway in Ireland to the eastern bend of the Don in Russia.'[13]

The Zeno Map[14] of AD 1380 is another enigma. Covering a vast area of the north as far as Greenland, it locates a great many widely scattered places at latitudes and longitudes which are 'amazingly correct'.[15] It is ‘unbelievable’, asserts Hapgood, ‘that anyone in the fourteenth century could have found accurate latitudes for these places, to say nothing of accurate longitudes’.[16]

The Oronteus Finaeus World Map also commands attention: it successfully places the coasts of Antarctica in correct latitudes and relative longitudes and finds a remarkably accurate area for the continent as a whole. This reflects a level of geographical knowledge not available until the twentieth century.[17]

The Portolano of Iehudi Ibn Ben Zara is another map notable for its accuracy where relative latitudes and longitudes are concerned.[18] Total longitude between Gibraltar and the Sea of Azov is accurate to half a degree, while across the map as a whole average errors of longitude are less than a degree.[19]

These examples represent only a small fraction of the large and challenging dossier of evidence presented by Hapgood. Layer upon layer, the cumulative effect of his painstaking and detailed analysis is to suggest that we are deluding ourselves when we suppose that accurate instruments for measuring longitude were not invented until the eighteenth century. On the contrary, the Piri Reis and other maps appear to indicate very strongly that such instruments were re-discovered then, that they had existed long ages before and had been used by a civilized people, now lost to history, who had explored and charted the entire earth. Furthermore, it seems that these people were capable not only of designing and manufacturing precise and technically advanced mechanical instruments but were masters of a precocious mathematical science.

The lost mathematicians

To understand why, we should first remind ourselves of the obvious: the earth is a sphere. When it comes to mapping it, therefore, only a globe can represent it in correct proportion. Transferring cartographic data from a globe to flat sheets of paper inevitably involves distortions and can be accomplished only by means of an artificial and complex mechanical and mathematical device known as map projection.

There are many different kinds of projection. Mercator’s, still used in atlases today, is perhaps the most familiar. Others are dauntingly referred to as Azimuthal, Stereographic, Gnomonic, Azimuthal Equidistant, Cordiform, and so on, but it is unnecessary to go into this any further here. We need only note that all successful projections require the use of sophisticated mathematical techniques of a kind supposedly unknown in the ancient world[20] (particularly in the deepest antiquity before 4000 BC when there was allegedly no human civilization at all, let alone one capable of developing and using advanced mathematics and geometry).

Charles Hapgood submitted his collection of ancient maps to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology for evaluation by Professor Richard Strachan. The general conclusion was obvious, but he wanted to know precisely what level of mathematics would have been required to draw up the original source documents. On 18 April 1965 Strachan replied that a very high level of mathematics indeed would have been necessary. Some of the maps, for example, seemed to express 'a Mercator type projection' long before the time of Mercator himself. The relative complexity of this projection (involving latitude expansion) meant that a trigonometric coordinate transformation method must have been used.

Other reasons for deducing that the ancient map-makers must have been skilled mathematicians were as follows:

1 The determination of place locations on a continent requires at least geometric triangulation methods. Over large distances (of the order of 1000 miles) corrections must be made for the curvature of the earth, which requires some understanding of spherical trigonometry.

2 The location of continents with respect to one another requires an understanding of the earth's sphericity, and the use of spherical trigonometry.

3 Cultures with this knowledge, plus the precision instruments to make the required measurements to determine location, would most certainly use their mathematical technology in creating maps and charts.'[21]

Strachan's impression that the maps, through generations of copyists, revealed the handiwork of an ancient, mysterious and technologically advanced civilization, was shared by reconnaissance experts from the US Airforce to whom Hapgood submitted the evidence. Lorenzo Burroughs, chief of the 8th Reconnaissance Technical Squadron's Cartographic Section at Westover Air Base, made a particularly close study of the Oronteus Finaeus Map. He concluded that some of the sources upon which it was based must have been drawn up by means of a projection similar to the modern Cordiform Projection. This, said Burroughs:

> suggests the use of advanced mathematics. Further, the shape given to the Antarctic Continent suggests the possibility, if not the probability, that the original source maps were compiled on a stereographic or gnomonic type of projection involving the use of spherical trigonometry.

history ...’22

Hapgood was to make one more important discovery: a Chinese map copied from an earlier original on to a stone pillar in AD 1137.[23] This map incorporates precisely the same kind of high quality information about longitudes as the others. It has a similar grid and was drawn up with the benefit of spherical trigonometry. Indeed, on close examination, it shares so many features with the European and Middle Eastern maps that only one explanation seems adequate: it and they must have stemmed from a common source.[24]

We seem to be confronted once again by a surviving fragment of the scientific knowledge of a lost civilization. More than that, it appears that this civilization must have been at least in some respects as advanced as our own and that its cartographers had ‘mapped virtually the entire globe with a uniform general level of technology, with similar methods, equal knowledge of mathematics, and probably the same sorts of instruments’.[25]

The Chinese map also indicates something else: a global legacy must have been handed down—a legacy of inestimable value, in all probability incorporating much more than sophisticated geographical knowledge.

Could it have been some portion of this legacy that was distributed in prehistoric Peru by the so-called ‘Viracochas’, mysterious bearded strangers said to have come from across the seas, in a ‘time of darkness’, to restore civilization after a great upheaval of the earth?

I decided to go to Peru to see what I could find.

Foam of the Sea

Peru and Bolivia

Chapter 4

Flight of the Condor

I'm in southern Peru, flying over the Nazca lines.

Below me, after the whale and the monkey, the hummingbird comes into view, flutters and unfolds her wings, stretches forward her delicate beak towards some imaginary flower. Then we turn hard right, pursued by our own tiny shadow as we cross the bleak scar of the Pan-American highway, and follow a trajectory that brings us over the fabulous snake-necked 'Alcatraz': a heron 900 feet long conceived in the mind of a master geometer. We circle around, cross the highway for a second time, pass an astonishing arrangement of fish and triangles laid out beside a pelican, turn left and find ourselves floating over the sublime image of a giant condor with feathers extended in stylized flight.

Just as I try to catch my breath, another condor almost close enough to touch materializes out of nowhere, a real condor this time, haughty as a fallen angel riding a thermal back to heaven. My pilot gasps and tries to follow him. For a moment I catch a glimpse of a bright, dispassionate eye that seems to weigh us up and find us wanting. Then, like a vision from some ancient myth, the creature banks and glides contemptuously backwards into the sun leaving our single-engined Cessna floundering in the lower air.

Below us now there's a pair of parallel lines almost two miles long, arrow straight all the way to vanishing point. And there, off to the right, a series of abstract shapes on a scale so vast—and yet so precisely executed—that it seems inconceivable they could have been the work of men.

The people around here say that they were not the work of men, but of demigods, the Viracochas,[1] who also left their fingerprints elsewhere in the Andean region many thousands of years ago.

The riddle of the lines

The Nazca plateau in southern Peru is a desolate place, sere and unwelcoming, barren and profitless. Human populations have never concentrated here, nor will they do so in the future: the surface of the moon seems hardly less hospitable.

If you happen to be an artist with grand designs, however, these high and daunting plains look like a very promising canvas, with 200 square miles of uninterrupted tableland and the certainty that your masterwork won't be carried away on the desert breeze or covered by drifting sand.

It's true that high winds do blow here, but by a happy accident of physics they are robbed of their sting at ground level: the pebbles that litter the pampa absorb and retain the sun's heat, throwing up a protective force-field of warm air. In addition, the soil contains enough gypsum to glue small stones to the subsurface, an adhesive regularly renewed by the moistening effect of early morning dews. Once things are drawn here, therefore, they tend to stay drawn. There's hardly any rain; indeed, with less than half an hour of miserly drizzle every decade, Nazca is among the driest places on earth.

If you are an artist, therefore, if you have something grand and important to express, and if you want it to be visible for ever, these strange and lonely flatlands could look like the answer to your prayers.

Experts have pronounced upon the antiquity of Nazca, basing their opinions on fragments of pottery found embedded in the lines and on radiocarbon results from various organic remains unearthed here. The dates conjectured range between 350 BC and AD 600.[2] Realistically, they tell us nothing about the age of the lines themselves, which are inherently as undatable as the stones cleared to make them. All we can say for sure is that the most recent are at least 1400 years old, but it is theoretically possible that they could be far more ancient than that—for the simple reason that the artefacts from which such dates are derived could have been brought to Nazca by later peoples.

[2] Pathways to the Gods, p. 21.

The principal figures of the Nazca plateau.

The majority of the designs are spread out across a clearly defined area of southern Peru bounded by the Rio Ingenio to the north and the Rio Nazca to the south, a roughly square canvas of dun-coloured desert with forty-six kilometres of the Pan-American highway running obliquely through it from top-centre to bottom right. Here, scattered apparently at random, are literally hundreds of different figures. Some depict animals and birds (a total of eighteen different birds). But far more take the form of geometrical devices in the form of trapezoids, rectangles, triangles and straight lines. Viewed from above, these latter resemble to the modern eye a jumble of runways, as though some megalomaniac civil engineer had been licensed to act out his most flamboyant fantasies of airfield design.

It therefore comes as no surprise, since humans are not supposed to have been able to fly until the beginning of the twentieth century, that the Nazca lines have been identified by a number of observers as landing strips for alien spaceships. This is a seductive notion, but Nazca is perhaps not the best place to seek evidence for it. For example, it is difficult to understand why extra-terrestrials advanced enough to have crossed hundreds of light years of interstellar space should have needed landing strips at all. Surely such beings would have mastered the technology of setting their flying saucers down vertically?

Besides, there is really no question of the Nazca lines ever having been used as runways—by flying saucers or anything else—although some of them look like that from above. Viewed at ground-level they are little more than grazes on the surface made by scraping away thousands of tons of black volcanic pebbles to expose the desert's paler base of yellow sand and clay. None of the cleared areas is more than a few inches deep and all are much too soft to have permitted the landing of wheeled flying vehicles. The German mathematician Maria Reiche, who devoted half a century to the study of the lines, was only being logical when she dismissed the extraterrestrial theory with a single pithy sentence a few years ago: 'I'm afraid the spacemen would have gotten stuck.'

If not runways for the chariots of alien 'gods', therefore, what else might the Nazca lines be? The truth is that no one knows their purpose, just as no one really knows their age; they are a genuine mystery of the past. And the closer you look at them the more baffling they become.

It's clear, for example, that the animals and birds antedate the geometry of the 'runways', because many of the trapezoids, rectangles and straight lines bisect (and thus partly obliterate) the more complex figures. The obvious deduction is that the final artwork of the desert as we view it today must have been produced in two phases. Moreover, though it seems contrary to the normal laws of technical progress, we must concede that the earlier of the two phases was the more advanced. The execution of the zoomorphic figures called for far higher levels of skill and technology than the etching of the straight lines. But how widely separated in time were the earlier and later artists?

Scholars do not address themselves to this question. Instead they lump both cultures together as 'the Nazcans' and depict them as primitive tribesmen who unaccountably developed sophisticated techniques of artistic self-expression, and then vanished from the Peruvian scene, many hundreds of years before the appearance of their better-known successors, the Incas.

How sophisticated were these Nazcan 'primitives'? What kind of knowledge must they have possessed to inscribe their gigantic signatures on the plateau? It seems, for a start, that they were pretty good observational astronomers—at least according to Dr Phillis Pitluga, an astronomer with the Adler Planetarium in Chicago. After making an intensive computer-aided study of stellar alignments at Nazca, she has concluded that the famous spider figure was devised as a terrestrial diagram of the giant constellation of Orion, and that the arrow-straight lines linked to the figure appear to have been set out to track through the ages the changing declinations of the three stars of Orion's Belt.[3]

The real significance of Dr Pitluga's discovery will become apparent in due course. Meanwhile, let us note that the Nazca spider also accurately depicts a member of a known spider genus—Ricinulei.[4] This, as it happens, is one of the rarest spider genera in the world, so rare indeed that it has only been found in remote and inaccessible parts of the Amazon rainforest.[5] How did the supposedly primitive Nazcan artists travel so far from their homeland, crossing the formidable barrier of the Andes, to obtain a specimen? More to the point, why should they have wanted to do such a thing and how were they able to duplicate minute details of Ricinulei's anatomy normally visible only under a microscope,[6] notably the reproductive organ positioned on the end of its extended right leg?

[3] Personal communications with Dr Pitluga.

Such mysteries multiply at Nazca and none of the designs, except perhaps the condor, really seems quite at home here. The whale and the monkey are, after all, as out of place in this desert environment as the Amazonian spider. A curious figure of a man, his right arm raised as though in greeting, heavy boots on his feet and round eyes staring owlishly forward, cannot be said to belong to any known era or culture. And other drawings depicting the human form are equally peculiar: their heads enclosed in halos of radiance, they do indeed look like visitors from another planet. Their sheer size is equally noteworthy and bizarre. The hummingbird is 165 feet long, the spider 150 feet long, the condor stretches nearly 400 feet from beak to tail-feathers (as does the pelican), and a lizard, whose tail is now divided by the Pan-American highway, is 617 feet in length. Almost every design is executed on the same cyclopean scale and in the same difficult manner, by the careful contouring of a single continuous line.

Similar attention to detail is to be found in the geometrical devices. Some of these take the form of straight lines more than five miles long, marching like Roman roads across the desert, dropping into dried-out river beds, surmounting rocky outcrops, and never once deviating from true.

This kind of precision is hard, but not impossible, to explain in conventional commonsense terms. More puzzling by far are the zoomorphic figures. How could they have been so perfectly made when, without aircraft, their creators could not have checked the progress of their work by viewing it in its proper perspective? None of the designs is small enough to be seen from ground level, where they appear merely as a series of shapeless ruts in the desert. They show their true form only when seen from an altitude of several hundred feet. There is no elevation nearby that provides such a vantage point.

[4] Firm identification of the Nazca spider with Ricinulei was first made by Professor Gerald S. Hawkins. See Gerald S. Hawkins, Beyond Stonehenge, Arrow Books, London, 1977, p. 143-4.

Linemakers, map-makers

I'm flying over the lines, trying to make sense of it all.

My pilot is Rodolfo Arias, lately of the Peruvian Airforce. After a career in jet fighters he finds the little Cessna slow and uninspiring and treats it like a taxi with wings. Once already we've been back to the airstrip at Nazca to remove a window so that my partner Santha can point her cameras vertically down at the alluring glyphs. Now we're experimenting with the view from different altitudes. At a couple of hundred feet above the plain Ricinulei, the Amazonian spider, looks like he's going to rear up and snatch us in his jaws. At 500 feet we can see several of the figures at once: a dog, a tree, a weird pair of hands, the condor, and some of the triangles and trapezoids. When we ascend to 1500 feet, the zoomorphs, hitherto predominant, are revealed merely as small scattered units surrounded by an astonishing scribble of vast geometric forms. These forms now look less like runways and more like pathways made by giants—pathways that crisscross the plateau in what seems at first a bewildering variety of shapes, angles and sizes.

As the ground continues to recede, however, and as the widening perspective on the lines permits more of an eagle's-eye view, I begin to wonder whether there might not after all be some method to the cuneiform slashes and scratches spread out below me. I am reminded of an observation made by Maria Reiche, the mathematician who has lived at Nazca and studied the lines since 1946. In her view

> The geometric drawings give the impression of a cipher-script in which the same words are sometimes written in huge letters, at another time in minute characters. There are line arrangements which appear in a great variety of size categories together with very similar shapes. All the drawings are composed of a certain number of basic elements ...[7]

As the Cessna bumps and heaves across the heavens, I also remember it is no accident that the Nazca lines were only properly identified in the twentieth century, after the era of flight had begun. In the late sixteenth century a magistrate named Luis de Monzon was the first Spanish traveller to bring back eyewitness reports concerning these mysterious 'marks on the desert' and to collect the strange local traditions that linked them to the Viracochas.[8] However, until commercial airlines began to operate regularly between Lima and Arequipa in the 1930s no one seems to have grasped that the largest piece of graphic art in the world lay here in southern Peru. It was the development of aviation that made the difference, giving men and women the godlike ability to take to the skies and see beautiful and puzzling things that had hitherto been hidden from them.

[8] Luis de Monzon was the corregidor, or magistrate, of Rucanas and Soras, near Nazca, in 1586. Pathways to the Gods, p. 36; Atlas of Mysterious Places, p. 100.

Rodolfo is steering the Cessna in a gentle circle over the figure of the monkey—a big monkey tied in a riddle of geometric forms. It's not easy to describe the eerie, hypnotic feeling this design gives me: it's very complicated and absorbing to look at, and slightly sinister in an abstract, indefinable way. The monkey's body is defined by a continuous unbroken line. And, without ever being interrupted, this same line winds up stairs, over pyramids, into a series of zig-zags, through a spiral labyrinth (the tail), and then back around a number of star-like hairpin bends. It would be a real tour de force of draughtsmanship and artistic skill on a sheet of notepaper, but this is the Nazca desert (where they do things on a grand scale) and the monkey is at least 400 feet long and 300 feet wide ...

Were the linemakers map-makers too?

And why were they called the Viracochas?

Chapter 5

The Inca Trail to the Past

No artefacts or monuments, no cities or temples, have endured in recognizable form for longer than the most resilient religious traditions. Whether expressed in the Pyramid Texts of Ancient Egypt, or the Hebrew Bible, or the Vedas, such traditions are among the most imperishable of all human creations: they are vehicles of knowledge voyaging through time.

The last custodians of the ancient religious heritage of Peru were the Incas, whose beliefs and ‘idolatry’ were ‘extirpated’ and whose treasures were ransacked during the thirty terrible years that followed the Spanish conquest in AD 1532.[1] Providentially, however, a number of early Spanish travellers made sincere efforts to document Inca traditions before they were entirely forgotten.

Though little attention was paid at the time, some of these traditions speak strikingly of a great civilization that was believed to have existed in Peru many thousands of years earlier.[2] Powerful memories were preserved of this civilization, said to have been founded by the Viracochas, the same mysterious beings credited with the making of the Nazca lines.

‘Foam of the Sea’

When the Spanish conquistadores arrived, the Inca empire extended along the Pacific coast and Andean highlands of South America from the northern border of modern Ecuador, through the whole of Peru, and as far south as the Maule River in central Chile. Connecting the far-flung corners of this empire was a vast and sophisticated road system: two parallel north-south highways, for example, one running for 3600 kilometres along the coast and the other for a similar distance through the Andes. Both these great thoroughfares were paved and connected by frequent links. In addition, they exhibited an interesting range of design and engineering features such as suspension bridges and tunnels cut through solid rock. They were clearly the work of an evolved, disciplined and ambitious society. Ironically, they played a significant part in its downfall: the Spanish forces, led by Francisco Pizarro, used them to great effect to speed up their ruthless advance into the Inca heartland.[3]

---

[1] See, for example, Father Pablo Joseph, The Extirpation of Idolatry in Peru (translated from the Spanish by L. Clark Keating), University of Kentucky Press, 1968.

[2] This is the view of Fernando Montesinos, expressed in his Memorias Antiguas Historiales del Peru (written in the seventeenth century). English edition translated and edited by P. A. Means, Hakluyt Society, London, 1920.

The capital of the Inca empire was the city of Cuzco, a name meaning 'the earth's navel' in the local Quechua language.[4] According to legend it was established by Manco Capac and Mama Occlo, two children of the Sun. Here, though the Incas worshipped the sun god, whom they knew as Inti, quite another deity was venerated as the Most Holy of all. This was Viracocha, whose namesakes were said to "have made the Nazca lines and whose own name meant 'Foam of the Sea.'[5]

No doubt it is just a coincidence that the Greek goddess Aphrodite, who was born of the sea, received her name because of 'the foam [aphros] out of which she was formed'.[6] Besides, Viracocha was always depicted uncompromisingly as a male by the peoples of the Andes. That much about him is known for certain. No historian, however, is able to say how ancient was the cult of this deity before the Spanish arrived to put a stop to it. This is because the cult seemed always to have been around; indeed, long before the Incas incorporated him into their cosmogony and built a magnificent temple for him at Cuzco, the evidence suggests that the high god Viracocha had been worshipped by all the civilizations that had ever existed in the long history of Peru.

Citadel of Viracocha

A few days after leaving Nazca, Santha and I arrived in Cuzco and made our way to the site of the Coricancha, the great temple dedicated to Viracocha in the pre-Colombian era. The Coricancha was of course long gone. Or, to be more exact, it was not so much gone as buried beneath layers of later architecture. The Spanish had kept its superb Inca foundations, and the lower parts of its fabulously strong walls, and had erected their own grandiose colonial cathedral on top.

Walking towards the front entrance of this cathedral, I remembered that the Inca temple that had once stood here had been covered with more than 700 sheets of pure gold (each weighing around two kilograms) and that its spacious courtyard had been planted with 'fields' of replica corn also fashioned out of gold.[7] I could not help but be reminded of Solomon's temple in far-off Jerusalem, also reputed to have been adorned with sheets of gold and a marvellous orchard of golden trees.[8]

Earthquakes in 1650 and again in 1950 had largely demolished the Spanish cathedral of Santo Domingo which stood on the site of the temple of Viracocha, and it had been necessary to rebuild it on both occasions. Its Inca foundations and lower walls survived these natural disasters intact, thanks to their characteristic design which made use of an elegant system of interlocking polygonal blocks. These blocks, and the general layout of the place, were almost all that was now left of the original structure, apart from an octagonal grey stone platform at the centre of the vast rectangular courtyard which had once been covered with 55 kilograms of solid gold.[9] On either side of the courtyard were ante-chambers, also from the Inca temple, with refined architectural features such as walls that tapered upwards and beautifully-carved niches hewn out of single pieces of granite.

We took a walk through the narrow, cobbled streets of Cuzco. Looking around, I realized it was not just the cathedral that reflected Spanish imposition on top of an earlier culture: the whole town was slightly schizophrenic. Spacious, balconied, pastel-shaded colonial homes and palaces towered above me but almost all of them stood on Inca foundations or incorporated complete Inca structures of the same beautiful polygonal architecture used in the Coricancha. In one alleyway, known as Hatunrumiyoc, I paused to examine an intricate jigsaw puzzle of a wall made of countless drystone blocks all perfectly fitted together, all of different sizes and shapes, interlocking in a bewildering array of angles. The carving of the individual blocks, and their arrangement into so complicated a structure could only have been achieved by master craftsmen possessed of very high levels of skill, with untold centuries of architectural experimentation behind them. On one block I counted twelve angles and sides in a single plane, and I could not slip even the edge of a piece of thin paper into the joints that connected it to the surrounding blocks.

The bearded stranger

It seemed that in the early sixteenth century, before the Spanish began to demolish Peruvian culture in earnest, an idol of Viracocha had stood in the Holy of Holies of the Coricancha. According to a contemporary text, the Relacion anonyma de los costumbres antiguos de los naturales del Piru, this idol took the form of a marble statue of the god—a statue described ‘as to the hair, complexion, features, raiment and sandals, just as painters represent the apostle Saint Bartholomew'.[10] Other accounts of Viracocha likened his appearance to that of the Saint Thomas.[11] I examined a number of illustrated ecclesiastical manuscripts in which these two saints appeared; both were routinely depicted as lean, bearded white men, past middle age, wearing sandals and dressed in long, flowing cloaks. As we shall see, the records confirmed this was exactly the appearance ascribed to Viracocha by those who worshipped him. Whoever he was, therefore, he could not have been an American Indian: they are relatively dark-skinned people with sparse facial hair.[12] Viracocha's bushy beard and pale complexion made him sound like a Caucasian.

Back in the sixteenth century the Incas had thought so too. Indeed their legends and religious beliefs made them so certain of his physical type that they initially mistook the white and bearded Spaniards who arrived on their shores for the returning Viracocha and his demigods,[13] an event long prophesied and which Viracocha was said in all the legends to have promised. This happy coincidence gave Pizarro's conquistadores the decisive strategic and psychological edge that they needed to overcome the numerically superior Inca forces in the battles that followed.

Who had provided the model for the Viracochas?

Chapter 6

He Came in a Time of Chaos

Through all the ancient legends of the peoples of the Andes stalked a tall, bearded, pale-skinned figure wrapped in a cloak of secrecy. And though he was known by many different names in many different places he was always recognizably the same figure: Viracocha, Foam of the Sea, a master of science and magic who wielded terrible weapons and who came in a time of chaos to set the world to rights.

The same basic story was shared in many variants by all the peoples of the Andean region. It began with a vivid description of a terrifying period when the earth had been inundated by a great flood and plunged into darkness by the disappearance of the sun. Society had fallen into disorder, and the people suffered much hardship. Then > there suddenly appeared, coming from the south, a white man of large stature and authoritative demeanour. This man had such great power that he changed the hills into valleys and from the valleys made great hills, causing streams to flow from the living stone ...[1]

The early Spanish chronicler who recorded this tradition explained that it had been told to him by the Indians he had travelled among on his journeys in the Andes:

> And they heard it from their fathers, who in their turn had it from the old songs which were handed down from very ancient times ... They say that this man travelled along the highland route to the north, working marvels as he went and that they never saw him again. They say that in many places he gave men instructions how they should live, speaking to them with great love and kindness and admonishing them to be good and to do no damage or injury one to another, but to love one another and show charity to all. In most places they name him Ticci Viracocha ...[2]

Other names applied to the same figure included Huaracocha, Con, Con Ticci or Kon Tiki, Thunupa, Taapac, Tupaca and Illa.[3] He was a scientist, an architect of surpassing skills, a sculptor and an engineer: ‘He caused terraces and fields to be formed on the steep sides of ravines, and sustaining walls to rise up and support them. He also made irrigating channels to flow ... and he went in various directions, arranging many things.’[4]

Viracocha was also a teacher and a healer and made himself helpful to people in need. It was said that 'wherever he passed, he healed all that were sick and restored sight to the blind.'[5]

This gentle, civilizing, 'superhuman', Samaritan had another side to his nature, however. If his life were threatened, as it seems to have been on several occasions, he had the weapon of heavenly fire at his disposal:

> Working great miracles by his words, he came to the district of the Canas and there, near a village called Cacha ... the people rose up against him and threatened to stone him. They saw him sink to his knees and raise his hands to heaven as if beseeching aid in the peril which beset him. The Indians declare that thereupon they saw fire in the sky which seemed all around them. Full of fear, they approached him whom they had intended to kill and besought him to forgive them ... Presently they saw that the fire was extinguished at his command, though stones were consumed by fire in such wise that large blocks could be lifted by hand as if they were cork. They narrate further that, leaving the place where this occurred, he came to the coast and there, holding his mantle, he went forth amidst the waves and was seen no more. And as he went they gave him the name Viracocha, which means 'Foam of the Sea'.'[6]

The legends were unanimous in their physical description of Viracocha. In his Suma y Narracion de los Incas, for example, Juan de Betanzos, a sixteenth-century Spanish chronicler, stated that according to the Indians, he had been 'a bearded man of tall stature clothed in a white robe which came down to his feet and which he wore belted at the waist'.[7]

Other descriptions, collected from many different and widely separated Andean peoples, all seemed to identify the same enigmatic individual. According to one he was:

> A bearded man of medium height dressed in a rather long cloak ... He was past his prime, with grey hair, and lean. He walked with a staff and addressed the natives with love, calling them his sons and daughters. As he traversed all the land he worked miracles. He healed the sick by touch. He spoke every tongue even better than the natives. They called him Thunupa or Tarpaca, Viracocha-rapacha or Pachaccan ...[8]

In one legend Thunupa-Viracocha was said to have been a 'white man of large stature, whose air and person aroused great respect and veneration'.[9] In another he was described as 'a white man of august appearance, blue-eyed, bearded, without headgear and wearing a cusma, a jerkin or sleeveless shirt reaching to the knees'. In yet another, which seemed to refer to a later phase of his life, he was revered as 'a wise counsellor in matters of state' and depicted as 'an old man with a beard and long hair wearing a long tunic'.[10]

Civilizing mission

Above all else, Viracocha was remembered in the legends as a teacher. Before his coming, it was said, ‘men lived in a condition of disorder, many went naked like savages; they had no houses or other dwellings than caves, and from these they went forth to gather whatever they could find to eat in the countryside.’[11]

Viracocha was credited with changing all this and with initiating the long-lost golden age which later generations looked back on with nostalgia. All the legends agreed, furthermore, that he had carried out his civilizing mission with great kindness and as far as possible had abjured the use of force: careful instruction and personal example had been the main methods used to equip the people with the techniques and knowledge necessary for a cultured and productive life. In particular, he was remembered for bringing to Peru such varied skills as medicine, metallurgy, farming, animal husbandry, the art of writing (said by the Incas to have been introduced by Viracocha but later forgotten), and a sophisticated understanding of the principles of engineering and architecture.

I had already been impressed by the quality of Inca stonework in Cuzco. As my research in the old town continued, however, I was surprised to discover that by no means all the so-called Inca masonry could be attributed with any degree of archaeological certainty to the Incas. It was true that they had been masters in the manipulation of stone, and many monuments in the Cuzco area were indisputably their work. It seemed, however, that some of the more remarkable structures routinely attributed to them could have been erected by earlier civilizations; the evidence suggested that the Incas had often functioned as the restorers of these structures rather than their original builders.

The same appeared to be true of the highly developed system of roads connecting the far-flung parts of the Inca empire. The reader will recall that these roads took the form of parallel highways running north to south, one along the coast and the other through the Andes. All in all more than 15,000 miles of surfaced tracks had been in regular and efficient use before the time of the Spanish conquest, and I had assumed that the Incas had been responsible for all of them. I now learned that it was much more likely that they had inherited the system. Their role had been to restore, maintain and unify a pre-existing network. Indeed, though it was not often admitted, no expert could safely estimate how old these incredible highways were or who had built them.[12]

The mystery was deepened by local traditions which stated not only that the road system and the sophisticated architecture had been ‘ancient in the time of the Incas’, but that both ‘were the work of white, auburn-haired men' who had lived thousands of years earlier.[13]

One legend described Viracocha as being accompanied by 'messengers' of two kinds, 'faithful soldiers' (huaminca) and 'shining ones' (hayhuaypanti). Their role was to carry their lord's message 'to every part of the world'.[14]

Elsewhere there were phrases such as: 'Con Ticci returned ... with a number of attendants'; 'Con Ticci then summoned his followers, who were called viracocha'; 'Con Ticci commanded all but two of the viracocha to go east ...'[15]; 'There came forth from a lake a Lord named Con Ticci Viracocha bringing with him a certain number of people ...'[16]; 'Thus those viracochas went off to the various districts which Viracocha had indicated for them ...'.[17]

The work of demons?

The ancient citadel of Sacsayhuaman lies just north of Cuzco. We reached it late one afternoon under a sky almost occluded by heavy clouds of tarnished silver. A cold grey breeze was blowing across the high-altitude tundra as I clambered up stairways, through lintelled stone gates built for giants, and walked along the mammoth rows of zig-zag walls.

I craned my neck and looked up at a big granite boulder that my route now passed under. Twelve feet high, seven feet across, and weighing considerably more than 100 tons, it was a work of man, not nature. It had been cut and shaped into a symphonic harmony of angles, manipulated with apparent ease (as though it were made of wax or putty) and stood on its end in a wall of other huge and problematic polygonal blocks, some of them positioned above it, some below it, some to each side, and all in perfectly balanced and well-ordered juxtaposition.

Since one of these astonishing pieces of carefully hewn stone had a height of twenty-eight feet and was calculated to weigh 361 tons[18] (roughly the equivalent of five hundred family-sized automobiles), it seemed to me that a number of fundamental questions were crying out for answers.

How had the Incas, or their predecessors, been able to work stone on such a gargantuan scale? How had they cut and shaped these Cyclopean boulders so precisely? How had they transported them tens of miles from distant quarries? By what means had they made walls of them, shuffling the individual blocks around and raising them high above the ground with such apparent ease? These people weren't even supposed to have had the wheel, let alone machinery capable of lifting and manipulating dozens of irregularly shaped 100-ton blocks, and sorting them into three-dimensional jigsaw puzzles.

I knew that the chroniclers of the early colonial period had been as perplexed as I was by what they had seen. The respected Garcilaso de la Vega, for example, who came here in the sixteenth century, had spoken with awe about the fortress of Sacsayhuaman:

> Its proportions are inconceivable when one has not actually seen it; and when one has looked at it closely and examined it attentively, they appear to be so extraordinary that it seems as though some magic had presided over its construction; that it must be the work of demons instead of human beings. It is made of such great stones, and in such great number, that one wonders simultaneously how the Indians were able to quarry them, how they transported them ... and how they hewed them and set them one on top of the other with such precision. For they disposed of neither iron nor steel with which to penetrate the rock and cut and polish the stones; they had neither wagon nor oxen to transport them, and, in fact, there exist neither wagons nor oxen throughout the world that would have sufficed for this task, so enormous are these stones and so rude the mountain paths over which they were conveyed ...[19]

Garcilaso also reported something else interesting. In his Royal Commentaries of the Incas he gave an account of how, in historical times, an Inca king had tried to emulate the achievements of his predecessors who had built Sacsayhuaman. The attempt had involved bringing just one immense boulder from several miles away to add to the existing fortifications: 'This boulder was hauled across the mountain by more than 20,000 Indians, going up and down very steep hills ... At a certain spot, it fell from their hands over a precipice crushing more than 3000 men.'[20] In all the histories I surveyed, this was the only report which described the Incas actually building, or trying to build, with huge blocks like those employed at Sacsayhuaman. The report suggested that they possessed no experience of the techniques involved and that their attempt had ended in disaster.

This, of course, proved nothing in itself. But Garcilaso's story did intensify my doubts about the great fortifications which towered above me. As I looked at them I felt that they could, indeed, have been erected before the age of the Incas and by some infinitely older and more technically advanced race.

Not for the first time I was reminded of how difficult archaeologists found it to provide accurate dates for engineering works like roads and drystone walls which contained no organic compounds. Radiocarbon was redundant in such circumstances; thermo-luminescence, too, was useless.

[19] Royal Commentaries of the Incas, p. 233.

[20] Ibid., p. 237.

And while promising new tests such as Chlorine-36 rock-exposure dating were now being developed their implementation was still some way off. Pending further advances in the latter field, therefore, 'expert' chronology was still largely the result of guesswork and subjective assumptions. Since it was known that the Incas had made intensive use of Sacsayhuaman I could easily understand why it had been assumed that they had built it. But there was no obvious or necessary connection between these two propositions. The Incas could just as well have found the structures already in place and moved into them.

If so, who had the original builders been?

The Viracochas, said the ancient myths, the bearded, white-skinned strangers, the 'shining ones', the 'faithful soldiers.'

As we travelled I continued to study the accounts of the Spanish adventurers and ethnographers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries who had faithfully recorded the ancient, pre-contact traditions of the Peruvian Indians. What was particularly noticeable about these traditions was the repeated emphasis that the coming of the Viracochas had been associated with a terrible deluge which had overwhelmed the earth and destroyed the greater part of humanity.

Chapter 7

Were There Giants Then?

Just after six in the morning the little train jerked into motion and began its slow climb up the steep sides of the valley of Cuzco. The narrow-gauge tracks were laid out in a series of Z shapes. We chugged along the lower horizontal of the first Z, then shunted and went backwards up the oblique, shunted again and went forward along the upper horizontal—and so on, with numerous stops and starts, following a route that eventually took us high above the ancient city. The Inca walls and colonial palaces, the narrow streets, the cathedral of Santo Domingo squatting atop the ruins of Viracocha's temple, all looked spectral and surreal in the pearl-grey light of a dawn sky. A fairy pattern of electric lamps still decorated the streets, a thin mist seeped across the ground, and the smoke of domestic fires rose from the chimneys over the tiled roofs of countless small houses.

Eventually the train turned its back on Cuzco and we proceeded for a while in a straight north-westerly direction towards our destination: Machu Picchu, the lost city of the Incas, some three hours and 130 kilometres away. I had intended to read, but lulled by the rocking motion of the carriage, I dropped off to sleep instead. Fifty minutes later I awoke to find that we were passing through a painting. The foreground, brightly sunlit, consisted of flat green meadows sprinkled with little patches of thawing frost, distributed on either side of a stream across a long, wide valley.

In the middle of my view, dotted with bushes, was a large field on which a handful of black and white dairy cows grazed. Nearby was a scattered settlement of houses outside which stood small, dark-skinned Quechua Indians dressed in ponchos, balaclavas and colourful woollen hats. More distant were slopes canopied in fir trees and exotic eucalyptus. My eye followed the rising contours of a pair of high green mountains, which then parted to reveal folded and even more lofty uplands. Beyond these soared a far horizon surmounted by a jagged range of radiant and snowy peaks.

Casting down the giants

It was with understandable reluctance that I turned at last to my reading. I wanted to look more closely at some of the curious links I thought I had identified connecting the sudden appearance of Viracocha to the deluge legends of the Incas and other Andean peoples.

Before me was a passage from Fr. Jose de Acosta's Natural and Moral History of the Indies, in which the learned priest set out 'what the Indians themselves report of their beginning':

> They make great mention of a deluge, which happened in their country ... The Indians say that all men were drowned in the deluge, and they report that out of Lake Titicaca came one Viracocha, who stayed in Tiahuanaco, where at this day there are to be seen the ruins of ancient and very strange buildings, and from thence came to Cuzco, and so began mankind to multiply ...[1]

Making a mental note to find out more about Lake Titicaca, and the mysterious Tiahuanaco, I read the following passage summarizing a legend from the Cuzco area:

> For some crime unstated the people who lived in the most ancient times were destroyed by the creator ... in a deluge. After the deluge the creator appeared in human form from Lake Titicaca. He then created the sun and moon and stars. After that he renewed the human population of the earth ...[2]

In another myth

> The great Creator God, Viracocha, decided to make a world for men to live in. First he made the earth and sky. Then he began to make people to live in it, carving great stone figures of giants which he brought to life. At first all went well but after a time the giants began to fight among themselves and refused to work. Viracocha decided that he must destroy them. Some he turned back into stone ... the rest he overwhelmed with a great flood.[3]

Very similar notions were, of course, found in other, quite unconnected, sources, such as the Jewish Old Testament. In Chapter six of the Book of Genesis, for example, which describes the Hebrew God's displeasure with his creation and his decision to destroy it, I had long been intrigued by one of the few descriptive statements made about the forgotten era before the Flood. According to the enigmatic language of that statement, 'There were giants in the earth in those days ...'.[4] Could the 'giants' buried in the biblical sands of the Middle East be connected in some unseen way to the 'giants' woven into the fabric of pre-Colombian native American legends? Adding considerably to the mystery was the fact that the Jewish and Peruvian sources both went on, with many further details in common, to depict an angry deity unleashing a catastrophic flood upon a wicked and disobedient world.

On the next page of the sheaf of documents I had assembled was this Inca account of the deluge handed down by a certain Father Molina in his Relacion de las fabulas y ritos de los Yngas:

> In the life of Manco Capac, who was the first Inca, and from whom they began to > boast themselves children of the Sun and from whom they derived their idolatrous worship of the Sun, they had an ample account of the deluge. They say that in it perished all races of men and created things insomuch that the waters rose above the highest mountain peaks in the world. No living thing survived except a man and a woman who remained in a box and, when the waters subsided, the wind carried them ... to Tiahuanaco [where] the creator began to raise up the people and the nations that are in that region ...[5]

Garcilaso de la Vega, the son of a Spanish nobleman and an Inca royal woman, was already familiar to me from his Royal Commentaries of the Incas. He was regarded as one of the most reliable chroniclers of the traditions of his mother's people and had done his work in the sixteenth century, soon after the conquest, when those traditions had not yet been contaminated by foreign influences. He, too, confirmed what had obviously been a universal and deeply impressed belief: 'After the waters of the deluge had subsided, a certain man appeared in the country of Tiahuanaco ...'[6]

That man had been Viracocha. Wrapped in his cloak, he was strong and august of countenance' and walked with unassailable confidence through the most dangerous badlands. He worked miracles of healing and could call down fire from heaven. To the Indians it must have seemed that he had materialized from nowhere.

Ancient traditions

We were now more than two hours into our journey to Machu Picchu and the panorama had changed. Huge black mountains, upon which not a trace of snow remained to reflect the sunlight, towered darkly above us and we seemed to be running through a rocky defile at the end of a narrow valley filled with sombre shadows. The air was cold and so were my feet. I shivered and resumed reading.

One thing was obvious amid the confused web of legends I had reviewed, legends which supplemented one another but also at times conflicted. All the scholars agreed that the Incas had borrowed, absorbed and passed on the traditions of many of the different civilized peoples over whom they had extended their control during the centuries of expansion of their vast empire. In this sense, whatever the outcome of the historical debate over the antiquity of the Incas themselves, nobody could seriously dispute their role as transmitters of the ancient belief systems of all the great archaic cultures—coastal and highland, known and unknown—that had preceded them in this land.

And who could say just what civilizations might have existed in Peru in the unexplored regions of the past? Every year archaeologists come up with new finds which extend the horizons further and further back in time. So why shouldn't they one day discover evidence of the penetration into the Andes, in remote antiquity, of a race of civilizers who had come from overseas and gone away again after completing their work? That was what the legends seemed to me to be suggesting, legends that most of all, and most clearly, had immortalized the memory of the man/god Viracocha striding the high windswept byways of the Andes working miracles wherever he went:

> Viracocha himself, with his two assistants, journeyed north ... He travelled up the cordillera, one assistant went along the coast, and the other up the edge of the eastern forests ... The Creator proceeded to Urcos, near Cuzco, where he commanded the future population to emerge from a mountain. He visited Cuzco, and then continued north to Ecuador. There, in the coastal province of Manta, he took leave of his people and, walking on the waves, disappeared across the ocean.[7]

There was always this poignant moment of goodbye at the end of every folk memory featuring the remarkable stranger whose name meant 'Foam of the Sea':

> Viracocha went on his way, calling forth the races of men ... When he came to the district of Puerto Viejo he was joined by his followers whom he had sent on before, and when they had joined him he put to sea in their company and they say that he and his people went by water as easily as they had traversed the land.[8]

Always this poignant goodbye ... and often a hint of science or magic.

Time capsule

Outside the window of the train things were happening. To my left, swollen with dark water, I could see the Urubamba, a tributary of the Amazon and a river sacred to the Incas. The air temperature had warmed-up noticeably: we had descended into a relatively low-lying valley with its own tropical micro-climate. The mountain slopes rising on either side of the tracks were densely covered in green forests and I was reminded that this was truly a region of vast and virtually insuperable obstacles. Whoever had ventured all this way into the middle of nowhere to build Machu Picchu must have had a very strong motive for doing so.

Whatever the reason had been, the choice of such a remote location had at least one beneficial side-effect: Machu Picchu was never found by the conquistadores and friars during their days of destructive zeal. Indeed, it was not until 1911, when the fabulous heritage of older races was beginning to be treated with greater respect, that a young American explorer, Hiram Bingham, revealed Machu Picchu to the world. It was realized at once that this incredible site opened a unique window on pre-

Colombian civilization; in consequence the ruins were protected from looters and souvenir hunters and an important chunk of the enigmatic past was preserved to amaze future generations.

Having passed through a one-horse town named Agua Caliente (Hot Water), where a few broken-down restaurants and cheap bars leered at travellers from beside the tracks, we reached Machu Picchu Puentas Ruinas station at ten minutes past nine in the morning. From here a half-hour bus ride on a winding dirt road up the side of a steep and forbidding mountain brought us to Machu Picchu itself, to the ruins, and to a bad hotel which charged us a nonsensical amount of money for a not very clean room. We were the only guests. Though it had been years since the local guerrilla movement had last bombed the Machu Picchu train, not many foreigners were keen to come here any more.

Machu Picchu dreaming

It was two in the afternoon. I stood on a high point at the southern end of the site. The ruins stretched out northwards in lichen-enshrouded terraces before me. Thick clouds were wrapped in a ring around the mountain tops but the sunlight still occasionally burst through here and there.

Way down on the valley floor I could see the sacred river curled in a hairpin loop right around the central formation on which Machu Picchu was based, like a moat surrounding a giant castle. The river showed deep green from this vantage point, reflecting the greenness of the steep jungle slopes. And there were patches of white water and wonderful sparkling gleams of light.

I gazed across the ruins towards the dominant peak. Its name is Huana Picchu and it used to feature in all the classic travel agency posters of this site. To my astonishment I now observed that for a hundred metres or so below its summit it had been neatly terraced and sculpted: somebody had been up there and had carefully raked the near-vertical cliffs into a graceful hanging garden which had perhaps in ancient times been planted with bright flowers.

It seemed to me that the entire site, together with its setting, was a monumental work of sculpture composed in part of mountains, in part of rock, in part of trees, in part of stones—and also in part of water. It was a heartachingly beautiful place, certainly one of the most beautiful places I have ever seen.

Despite its luminous brilliance, however, I felt that I was gazing down on to a city of ghosts. It was like the wreck of the Marie Celeste, deserted and restless. The houses were arranged in long terraces. Each house was tiny, with just one room fronting directly on to the narrow street, and the architecture was solid and functional but by no means ornate. By way of contrast certain ceremonial areas were engineered to an infinitely higher standard and incorporated giant blocks similar to those I had seen at Sacsayhuaman. One smoothly polished polygonal monolith was around twelve feet long by five feet wide by five feet thick and could not have weighed less than 200 tons. How had the ancient builders managed to get it up here?

Machu Picchu.

There were dozens of others like it too, and they were all arranged in the familiar jigsaw puzzle walls of interlocking angles. On one block I was able to count a total of thirty-three angles, every one intermeshed faultlessly with a matching angle on an adjoining block. There were massive polygons and perfect ashlars with razor-sharp edges. There were also natural, unhewn boulders integrated into the overall design at a number of points. And there were strange and unusual devices such as the Intihuatana, the ‘hitching post of the sun’. This remarkable artefact consisted of an elemental chunk of bedrock, grey and crystalline, carved into a complex geometrical form of curves and angles, incised niches and external buttresses, surmounted at the centre by a stubby vertical prong.

Jigsaw puzzle

How old is Machu Picchu? The academic consensus is that the city could not have been built much earlier than the fifteenth century AD.[9] Dissenting opinions, however, have from time to time been expressed by a number of more daring but respectable scholars. In the 1930s, for example, Rolf Muller, professor of Astronomy at the University of Potsdam, found convincing evidence to suggest that the most important features of Machu Picchu possessed significant astronomical alignments. From these, through the use of detailed mathematical computations concerning star positions in the sky in previous millennia (which gradually alter down the epochs as the result of a phenomenon known as precession of the equinoxes), Muller concluded that the original layout of the site could only have been accomplished during ‘the era of 4000 BC to 2000 BC’.[10]

In terms of orthodox history, this was a heresy of audacious proportions. If Muller was right, Machu Picchu was not a mere 500 but could be as much as 6000 years old. This would make it significantly older than the Great Pyramid of Egypt (assuming, of course, that one accepted the Great Pyramid’s own orthodox dating of around 2500 BC).

There were other dissenting voices concerning the antiquity of Machu Picchu, and most, like Muller, were convinced that parts of the site were thousands of years older than the date favoured by orthodox historians.[11]

Like the big polygonal blocks that made up the walls, this was a notion that looked as though it might fit with other pieces of a jigsaw puzzle—in this case the jigsaw puzzle of a past that didn't quite make sense any more. Viracocha was part of that same puzzle. All the legends said his capital had been at Tiahuanaco. The ruins of this great and ancient city lay across the border in Bolivia, in an area known as the Collao, twelve miles south of Lake Titicaca.

[11] Another scholar, Maria Schulten de D'Ebneth, also worked with mathematical methods (as opposed to historical methods which are heavily speculative and interpretive). Her objective was to rediscover the ancient grid used to determine Machu Picchu's layout in relation to the cardinal points. She did this after first establishing the existence of a central 45° line. In the process she stumbled across something else: ‘The sub-angles that she calculated between the central 45° line and sites located away from it ... indicated to her that the earth's tilt ("obliquity") at the time this grid was laid out was close to 24° o’. This means that the grid was planned (according to her) 5125 years before her measurements were done in 1953; in other words in 3172 BC.’ The Last Realms, pp. 204-5.

We could get there, I calculated, in a couple of days, via Lima and La Paz.

The Lake at the Roof of the World

La Paz, the capital city of Bolivia, nestles in the uneven bottom of a spectacular hole in the ground more than two miles above sea level. This plunging ravine, thousands of feet deep, was carved in some primeval age by a tremendous downrush of water that carried with it an abrasive tide of loose rocks and rubble.

Provided by nature with such an apocalyptic setting, La Paz possesses a unique though slightly sleazy charm. With its narrow streets, dark-walled tenements, imposing cathedrals, garish cinemas and hamburger bars open till late, it generates an atmosphere of quirky intrigue which is oddly intoxicating. It’s hard going for the pedestrian, however, unless equipped with lungs like bellows, because the whole of the central district is built up and down the sides of precipitous hills.

La Paz airport is almost 5000 feet higher than the city itself on the edge of the Altiplano—the cold, rolling uplands that are the dominant topographical feature of this region. Santha and I landed there well after midnight on a delayed flight from Lima. In the draughty arrivals hall we were offered coca tea in little plastic cups as a prophylactic against altitude sickness. After considerable delay and exertion, we extracted our luggage from customs, hailed an ancient American-made taxi, and clanked and rattled down towards the dim yellow lights of the city far below.

Rumours of a cataclysm

Around four o'clock the next afternoon we set off for Lake Titicaca in a rented jeep, fought our way through the capital's incomprehensible permanent rush-hour traffic-jams, then drove up out of the skyscrapers and slums into the wide, clear horizons of the Altiplano.

At first, still close to the city, our route took us through a zone of bleak suburbs and sprawling shantytowns where the sidewalks were lined with auto-repair shops and scrap yards. The more distance we put between ourselves and La Paz, however, the more attenuated the settlements became, until almost all signs of human habitation ceased. The empty, treeless, undulating savannahs, distantly bordered by the snow-covered peaks of the Cordillera Real, created an unforgettable spectacle of natural beauty and power. But there was also a feeling of otherworldliness about this place, which seemed to float above the clouds like an enchanted kingdom.

Although our ultimate destination was Tiahuanaco, we were aiming that night for the town of Copacabana on a promontory near the southern end of Lake Titicaca. To reach it we had to cross a neck of water by improvised car ferry at the fishing town of Tiquine. Then, with dusk descending, we followed the main highway, now little more than a narrow and uneven track, up a series of steep hairpin bends and on to the shoulder of a mountain spur. From this point a contrasting panorama unfolded: the dark, dark waters of the lake below appeared to lie at the edge of a limitless ocean drowned in sombre shadows, and yet the jagged peaks of the snowcapped mountains in the distance were still drenched in dazzling sunlight.

From the very beginning Lake Titicaca seemed to me a special place. I knew that it lay some 12,500 feet above sea level, that the frontier between Peru and Bolivia passed through it, that it covered an area of 3200 square miles and was 138 miles long by about 70 miles wide. I also knew it was deep, reaching almost 1000 feet in places, and had a puzzling geological history.

Here are the mysteries, and some of the solutions that have been proposed:

1 Though now more than two miles above sea level, the area around Lake Titicaca is littered with millions upon millions of fossilized sea shells. This suggests that at some stage the whole of the Altiplano was forced upwards from the sea-bed, perhaps as part of the general terrestrial rising that formed South America as a whole. In the process great quantities of ocean water, together with countless myriads of living marine creatures, were scooped up and suspended among the Andean ranges.[1] This is thought to have happened not more recently than about 100 million years ago.[2]

2 Paradoxically, despite the mighty antiquity of this event, Lake Titicaca has retained, until the present day, ‘a marine icthyofauna’[3], in other words, though now located hundreds of miles from any ocean, its fish and crustacea feature many oceanic (rather than freshwater) types. Surprising creatures brought to the surface in fishermen’s nets have included examples of Hippocampus (the seahorse).[4] In addition, as one authority has pointed out, 'The various species of Allorquestes (hyalella inermis, etc.) and other examples of marine fauna leave no doubt that this lake in other periods was much saltier than today, or, more accurately, that the water which formed it was from the sea and that it was damned up and locked in the Andes when the continent rose.'[5]

Sometime in the past the entire Altiplano, with its lakes, rose from the bottom of the ocean ...’

3 So much, then, for the events which may have created Lake Titicaca in the first place. Since its formation this great 'interior sea', and the Altiplano itself, has undergone several other drastic and dramatic changes. Of these by far the most notable is that the lake's extent appears to have fluctuated enormously, indicated by the existence of an ancient strandline visible on much of the surrounding terrain. Puzzlingly, this strandline is not level but slopes markedly from north to south over a considerable horizontal distance. At the northernmost point surveyed it is as much as 295 feet higher than Titicaca; some 400 miles farther south, it is 274 feet lower than the present level of the lake.[6] From this, and much other evidence, geologists have deduced that the Altiplano is still gradually rising, but in an unbalanced manner with greater altitudes being attained in the northern part and lesser in the southern. The process involved here is thought to have less to do with changes in the level of Titicaca's waters themselves (although such changes have certainly occurred) than with changes in the level of the whole terrain in which the lake is situated.[7]

4 Much harder to explain in such terms, however, given the very long time periods major geological transformations are supposed to require, is irrefutable evidence that the city of Tiahuanaco was once a port, complete with extensive docks, positioned right on the shore of Lake Titicaca.[8] The problem is that Tiahuanaco's ruins are now marooned about twelve miles south of the lake and more than 100 feet higher than the present shoreline.[9] In the period since the city was built, it therefore follows that one of two things must have happened: either the level of lake has fallen greatly or the land on which Tiahuanaco stands has risen comparably.

5 Either way it is obvious that there have been massive and traumatic > physical changes. Some of these, such as the rise of the Altiplano from the floor of the ocean, certainly took place in remote geological ages, before the advent of human civilization. Others are not nearly so ancient and must have occurred after the construction of Tiahuanaco.[10] The question, therefore, is this: when was Tiahuanaco built?

> The orthodox historical view is that the ruins cannot possibly be dated much earlier than AD 500.[11] An alternative chronology also exists, however, which, although not accepted by the majority of scholars, seems more in tune with the scale of the geological upheavals that have occurred in this region. Based on the mathematical/astronomical calculations of Professor Arthur Posnansky of the University of La Paz, and of Professor Rolf Muller (who also challenged the official dating of Machu Picchu), it pushes the main phase of construction at Tiahuanaco back to 15,000 BC. This chronology also indicates that the city later suffered immense destruction in a phenomenal natural catastrophe around the eleventh millennium BC, and thereafter rapidly became separated from the lakeshore.[12]

We shall be reviewing Posnansky's and Muller's findings in Chapter Eleven, findings which suggest that the great Andean city of Tiahuanaco flourished during the last Ice Age in the deep, dark, moonless midnight of prehistory.

Chapter 9

Once and Future King

During my travels in the Andes I had several times re-read a curious variant of the mainstream tradition of Viracocha. In this variant, which was from the area around Lake Titicaca known as the Collao, the deity civilizing-hero had been named Thunupa:

> Thunupa appeared on the Altiplano in ancient times, coming from the north with five disciples. A white man of august presence, blue-eyed, and bearded, he was sober, puritanical and preached against drunkenness, polygamy and war.[1]

After travelling great distances through the Andes, where he created a peaceful kingdom and taught men all the arts of civilization,[2] Thunupa was struck down and grievously wounded by a group of jealous conspirators:

> They put his blessed body in a boat of totora rush and set it adrift on Lake Titicaca. There ... he sailed away with such speed that those who had tried so cruelly to kill him were left behind in terror and astonishment—for this lake has no current ... The boat came to the shore at Cochamarca, where today is the river Desguardero. Indian tradition asserts that the boat struck the land with such force it created the river Desguardero, which before then did not exist. And on the water so released the holy body was carried many leagues away to the sea coast at Africa ...[3]

Boats, water and salvation

There are curious parallels here to the story of Osiris, the ancient Egyptian high god of death and resurrection. The fullest account of the original myth defining this mysterious figure is given by Plutarch[4] and says that, after bringing the gifts of civilization to his people, teaching them all manner of useful skills, abolishing cannibalism and human sacrifice, and providing them with their first legal code, Osiris left Egypt and travelled about the world to spread the benefits of civilization to other nations as well. He never forced the barbarians he encountered to accept his laws, preferring instead to argue with them and to appeal to their reason. It is also recorded that he passed on his teachings to them by means of hymns and songs accompanied by musical instruments.

While he was gone, however, he was plotted against by seventy-two members of his court, led by his brother-in-law Set. On his return the conspirators invited him to a banquet where a splendid coffer of wood and gold was offered as a prize to any guest who could fit into it exactly. Osiris did not know that the coffer had been constructed precisely to his body measurements. As a result, when the assembled guests tried one by one to get into it they failed. Osiris lay down comfortably inside. Before he had time to get out the conspirators rushed forward, nailed the lid tightly closed and sealed even the cracks with molten lead so that there would be no air. The coffer was then thrown into the Nile. It had been intended that it should sink, but it floated rapidly away, drifting for a considerable distance until it reached the sea coast.

At this point the goddess Isis, wife of Osiris, intervened. Using all the great magic for which she was renowned, she found the coffer and concealed it in a secret place. However, her evil brother Set, out hunting in the marshes, discovered the coffer, opened it and, in a mad fury, cut the royal corpse into fourteen pieces which he scattered throughout the land.

Once more Isis set off to save her husband. She made a small boat of papyrus reeds, coated with pitch, and embarked on the Nile in search of the remains. When she had found them she worked powerful spells to reunite the dismembered parts of the body so that it resumed its old form. Thereafter, in an intact and perfect state, Osiris went through a process of stellar rebirth to become god of the dead and king of the underworld—from which place, legend had it, he occasionally returned to earth in the guise of a mortal man.[5]

Although there are huge differences between the traditions it is bizarre that Osiris in Egypt and Thunupa-Viracocha in South America should have had all of the following points in common:

- both were great civilizers;
- both were conspired against;
- both were struck down;
- both were sealed inside a container or vessel of some kind;
- both were then cast into water;
- both drifted away on a river;
- both eventually reached the sea.

Are such parallels to be dismissed as coincidences? or could there be some underlying connection?

Reed boats of Suriqui

The air was Alpine cold and I was sitting on the front of a motor launch doing about twenty knots across the icy waters of Lake Titicaca. The sky above was clear blue, reflecting aquamarine and turquoise tints inshore, and the vast body of the lake, glinting in copper and silver tones, seemed to stretch away for ever ...

The passages in the legends that spoke of vessels made of reeds needed to be followed up because I knew that 'boats of totora rush' were a traditional form of transport on this lake. However, the ancient skills required to build craft of this type had atrophied in recent years and we were now headed towards Suriqui, the one place where they were still properly made.

On Suriqui Island, in a small village close to the lakeshore, I found two elderly Indians making a boat from bundled totora rushes. The elegant craft, which appeared to be nearly complete, was approximately fifteen feet long. It was wide amidships, but narrow at either end with a high curving prow and stern.

I sat down for a while to watch. The more senior of the two builders, who wore a brown felt hat over a curious peaked woollen cap, repeatedly braced his bare left foot against the side of the vessel to give additional leverage as he pulled and tightened the cords that held the bundles of reeds in place. From time to time I noticed that he rubbed a length of cord against his own perspiring brow—thus moistening it to increase its adhesion.

The boat, surrounded by chickens and occasionally investigated by a shy, browsing alpaca, stood amid a litter of discarded rushes in the backyard of a ramshackle farmhouse. It was one of several I was able to study over the next few hours and, though the setting was unmistakably Andean, I found myself repeatedly overtaken by a sense of déjà vu from another place and another time. The reason was that the totora vessels of Suriqui were virtually identical, both in the method of construction and in finished appearance, to the beautiful craft fashioned from papyrus reeds in which the Pharaohs had sailed the Nile thousands of years previously. In my travels in Egypt I had examined the images of many such vessels painted on the walls of ancient tombs. It sent a tingle down my spine to see them now so colourfully brought to life on an obscure island on Lake Titicaca—even though my research had partially prepared me for this coincidence. I knew that no satisfactory explanation had ever been given for how such close and richly detailed similarities of boat design could occur in two such widely separated places. Nevertheless, in the words of one authority in ancient navigation who had addressed himself to this conundrum:

> Here was the same compact shape, peaked and raised at both ends with rope lashings running from the deck right round the bottom of the boat all in one piece

> ... Each straw was placed with maximum precision to achieve perfect symmetry and streamlined elegance, while the bundles were so tightly lashed that they looked like ... gilded logs bent into a clog-shaped peak fore and aft.[6]

The reed boats of the ancient Nile, and the reed boats of Lake Titicaca (the original design of which, local Indians insisted, had been given to them by 'the Viracocha people'[7]), had other points in common. Both, for example, were equipped with sails mounted on peculiar two-legged straddled masts.[8] Both had also been used for the long-distance transport of exceptionally heavy building materials: obelisks and gargantuan blocks of stone bound for the temples at Giza and Luxor and Abydos on the one hand and for the mysterious edifices of Tiahuanaco on the other.

In those far-off days, before Lake Titicaca became more than one hundred feet shallower, Tiahuanaco had stood at the water's edge overlooking a vista of awesome and sacred beauty. Now the great port, capital city of Viracocha himself, lay lost amid eroded hills and empty windswept plains.

Road to Tiahuanaco ...

After returning from Suriqui to the mainland we drove our hired jeep across those plains, raising a cloud of dust. Our route took us through the towns of Puccarani and Laha, populated by stolid Aymara Indians who walked slowly in the narrow cobbled streets and sat placidly in the little sunlit plazas.

Were these people the descendants of the builders of Tiahuanaco, as the scholars insisted? Or were the legends right? Had the ancient city been the work of foreigners with godlike powers who had settled here, long ages ago?

Chapter 10

The City at the Gate of the Sun

The early Spanish travellers who visited the ruined Bolivian city of Tiahuanaco at around the time of the conquest were impressed by the sheer size of its buildings and by the atmosphere of mystery that clung to them. ‘I asked the natives whether these edifices were built in the time of the Inca,’ wrote the chronicler Pedro Cieza de Leon, ‘They laughed at the question, affirming that they were made long before the Inca reign and ... that they had heard from their forebears that everything to be seen there appeared suddenly in the course of a single night ...’[1] Meanwhile another Spanish visitor of the same period recorded a tradition which said that the stones had been lifted miraculously off the ground, ‘They were carried through the air to the sound of a trumpet.’[2]

Not long after the conquest a detailed description of the city was written by the historian Garcilaso de la Vega. No looting for treasure or for building materials had yet taken place and, though ravaged by the tooth of time, the site was still magnificent enough to take his breath away:

> We must now say something about the large and almost incredible buildings of Tiahuanaco. There is an artificial hill, of great height, built on stone foundations so that the earth will not slide. There are gigantic figures carved in stone ... these are much worn which shows their great antiquity. There are walls, the stones of which are so enormous it is difficult to imagine what human force could have put them in place. And there are the remains of strange buildings, the most remarkable being stone portals, hewn out of solid rock; these stand on bases anything up to 30 feet long, 15 feet wide and 6 feet thick, base and portal being all of one piece ... How, and with the use of what tools or implements, massive works of such size could be achieved are questions which we are unable to answer ... Nor can it be imagined how such enormous stones could have been brought here ...[3]

Tiahuanaco.

That was in the sixteenth century. More than 400 years later, at the end of the twentieth century, I shared Garcilaso's puzzlement. Scattered around Tiahuanaco, in defiance of the looters who had robbed the site of so much in recent years, were monoliths so big and cumbersome yet so well cut that they almost seemed to be the work of super-beings.

Sunken temple

Like a disciple at the feet of his master, I sat on the floor of the sunken temple and looked up at the enigmatic face which all the scholars of Tiahuanaco believed was intended to represent Viracocha. Untold centuries ago, unknown hands had carved this likeness into a tall pillar of red rock. Though now much eroded, it was the likeness of a man at peace with himself. It was the likeness of a man of power ...

He had a high forehead, and large, round eyes. His nose was straight, narrow at the bridge but flaring towards the nostrils. His lips were full. His distinguishing feature, however, was his stylish and imposing beard, which had the effect of making his face broader at the jaws than at the temples. Looking more closely, I could see that the sculptor had portrayed a man whose skin was shaved all around his lips with the result that his moustache began high on his cheeks, roughly parallel with the end of his nose. From there it curved extravagantly down beside the corners of his mouth, forming an exaggerated goatee at the chin, and then followed his jawline back to his ears.

Above and below the ears, on the side of the head, were carved odd representations of animals. Or perhaps it would be better to describe these carvings as representations of odd animals, because they looked like big, clumsy, prehistoric mammals with fat tails and club feet.

There were other points of interest. For example, the stone figure of Viracocha had been sculpted with the hands and arms folded, one below the other, over the front of a long, flowing robe. On each side of this robe appeared the sinuous form of a snake coiling upwards from ground to shoulder level. And as I looked at this beautiful design (the original of which had perhaps been embroidered on rich cloth) the picture that came into my mind was of Viracocha as a wizard or a sorcerer, a bearded, Merlin-like figure dressed in weird and wonderful clothes, calling down fire from heaven.

The 'temple' in which the Viracocha pillar stood was open to the sky and consisted of a large, rectangular pit, like a swimming pool, dug out six feet below ground level. Its floor, about 40 feet long by 30 feet wide, was composed of hard, flat gravel. Its strong vertical walls were formed from precisely dressed ashlar blocks of varying sizes laid closely against one another without mortar in the joints and interspersed with taller, rough-hewn stelae. A set of steps was let into the southern wall and it was down these I had come when I had entered the structure.

I walked several times around the figure of Viracocha, resting my fingers on the sun-warmed stone pillar, trying to guess its purpose. It was perhaps seven feet tall and it faced south, with its back to the old shoreline of Lake Titicaca (originally less than six hundred feet away).[4] Ranged out behind this central obelisk, furthermore, there were two others, of smaller stature, possibly intended to represent Viracocha's legendary companions. All three figures, being severely, functionally vertical, cast clean-edged shadows as I gazed at them, for the sun was past its zenith.

I sat down on the ground again and looked slowly all around the temple. Viracocha dominated it, like the conductor of an orchestra, and yet its most striking feature undoubtedly lay elsewhere: lining the walls, at various points and heights, were dozens and dozens of human heads sculpted in stone. These were complete heads, protruding three dimensionally out of the walls. There were several different (and contradictory) scholarly opinions as to their function.

Pyramid

From the floor of the sunken temple, looking west, I could see an immense wall into which was set an impressive geometrical gateway made of large stone slabs. Silhouetted in this gateway by the afternoon sun was the figure of a giant. The wall, I knew, enclosed a parade-ground-sized area called the Kalasasaya (a word in the local Aymara language meaning simply ‘Place of the Upright Standing Stones’[5]). And the giant was one of the huge time-worn pieces of sculpture referred to by Garcilaso de la Vega.

---

[4] Bolivia, p. 156 (map).

I was eager to take a look at it, but for the moment my attention was diverted southwards towards an artificial hill, 50 feet high, which lay almost directly ahead of me as I climbed the steps out of the sunken temple. The hill, which had also been mentioned by Garcilaso, was known as the Akapana Pyramid. Like the pyramids at Giza in Egypt, it was oriented with surprising precision towards the cardinal points. Unlike those pyramids its ground-plan was somewhat irregular. Nonetheless, it measured roughly 690 feet on each side which meant that it was a hulking piece of architecture and the dominant edifice of Tiahuanaco.

I walked towards it now, and spent some time strolling around it and clambering over it. Originally it had been a clean-sided step-pyramid of earth faced with large andesite blocks. In the centuries since the conquest, however, it had been used as a quarry by builders from as far away as La Paz, with the result that only about ten per cent of its superb facing blocks now remained.

What clues, what evidence, had those nameless thieves carried off with them? As I climbed up the broken sides and around the deep grassy troughs in the top of the Akapana, I realized that the true function of the pyramid was probably never going to be understood. All that was certain was that it had not been merely decorative or ceremonial. On the contrary, it seemed almost as though it might have functioned as some kind of arcane ‘device’ or machine. Deep within its bowels, archaeologists had discovered a complex network of zig-zagging stone channels, lined with fine ashlars. These had been meticulously angled and jointed (to a tolerance of one-fiftieth of an inch), and had served to sluice water down from a large reservoir at the top of the structure, through a series of descending levels, to a moat that encircled the entire site, washing against the pyramid’s base on its southern side.[6]

So much care and attention had been lavished on all this plumbing, so many man-hours of highly skilled and patient labour, that the Akapana made no sense unless it had been endowed with a significant purpose. A number of archaeologists, I knew, had speculated that this purpose might have been connected with a rain or river cult involving a primitive veneration of the powers and attributes of fast-flowing water.

One sinister suggestion, which implied that the unknown ‘technology’ of the pyramid might have had a lethal purpose, was derived from the meaning of the words Hake and Apana in the ancient Aymara language still spoken hereabouts: ‘Hake means “people” or “men”; Apana means “to perish” (probably by water). Thus Akapana is a place where people perish ...’[7]

[6] For a detailed discussion of the hydraulic system of the Akapana see Tiahuanacu: II, pp. 69-79.

Another commentator, however, after making a careful assessment of all the characteristics of the hydraulic system, proposed a different solution, namely that the sluices had most probably been part of ‘a processing technique—the use of flowing water for washing ores, perhaps?’[8]

Gateway of the Sun

Leaving the western side of the enigmatic pyramid, I made my way towards the south-west corner of the enclosure known as the Kalassaya. I could now see why it had been called the Place of the Upright Standing Stones for this was precisely what it was. At regular intervals in a wall composed of bulky trapezoidal blocks, huge dagger-like monoliths more than twelve feet high had been sunk hilt-first into the red earth of the Altiplano. The effect was of a giant stockade, almost 500 feet square, rising about twice as far above the ground as the sunken temple had been interred beneath it.

Had the Kalasasaya been a fortress then? Apparently not. Scholars now generally accept that it functioned as a sophisticated celestial observatory. Rather than keeping enemies at bay, its purpose had been to fix the equinoxes and the solstices and to predict, with mathematical precision, the various seasons of the year. Certain structures within its walls, (and, indeed, the walls themselves), appeared to have been lined up to particular star groups and designed to facilitate measurement of the amplitude of the sun in summer, winter, autumn and spring.[9] In addition, the famous ‘Gateway of the Sun’, which stood in the north-west corner of the enclosure, was not only a world-class work of art but was thought by those who had studied it to be a complex and accurate calendar carved in stone:

> The more one gets acquainted with the sculpture the greater becomes one’s conviction that the peculiar lay-out and pictorialism of this Calendar cannot possibly have been the result merely of the ultimately unfathomable whim of an artist, but that its glyphs, deeply senseful, constitute the eloquent record of the observations and calculations of a scientist ... The Calendar could not have been drawn up and laid out in any other way than this.[10]

My background research had made me especially curious about the Gateway of the Sun and, indeed, about the Kalasasaya as a whole. This was so because certain astronomical and solar alignments which we review in the next chapter had made it possible to calculate the approximate period when the Kalasasaya must originally have been laid out. These alignments suggested the controversial date of 15,000 BC—about seventeen thousand years ago.

Intimations of Antiquity

In his voluminous work Tiahuanacu: the Cradle of American Man, the late Professor Arthur Posnansky (a formidable German-Bolivian scholar whose investigations at the ruins lasted for almost fifty years) explains the archaeo-astronomical calculations which led to his controversial re-dating of Tiahuanaco. These, he says, were based 'solely and exclusively on the difference in the obliquity of the ecliptic of the period in which the Kalasasaya was built and that which it is today'.[1]

What exactly is 'the obliquity of the ecliptic', and why does it make Tiahuanaco 17,000 years old?

According to the dictionary definition it is 'the angle between the plane of the earth's orbit and that of the celestial equator, equal to approximately 23° 27' at present'.[2]

To clarify this obscure astronomical notion, it helps to picture the earth as a ship, sailing on the vast ocean of the heavens. Like all such vessels (be they planets or schooners), it rolls slightly with the swell that flows beneath it. Picture yourself on board that ship as it rolls, standing on the deck, gazing out to sea. You rise up on the crest of a wave and your visible horizon increases; you fall back into a trough and it decreases. The process is regular, mathematical, like the tick-tock of a great metronome: a constant, almost imperceptible, nodding, perpetually changing the angle between yourself and the horizon.

Now picture the earth again. Floating in space, as every schoolchild knows, the axis of daily rotation of our beautiful blue planet lies slightly tilted away from the vertical in its orbit around the sun. From this it follows that the terrestrial equator, and hence the 'celestial equator' (which is merely an imaginary extension of the earth's equator into the celestial sphere) must also lie at an angle to the orbital plane. That angle, at any one time, is the obliquity of the ecliptic. But because the earth is a ship that rolls, its obliquity changes in a cyclical manner over very long periods. During each cycle of 41,000 years the obliquity varies, with the precision and predictability of a Swiss chronograph, between 22.1° and

[1] Tiahuanacu, II, p. 89.

[2] Collins English Dictionary, London, 1982, p. 1015. In addition, Dr John Mason of the British Astronomical Association defined obliquity of the ecliptic in a telephone interview on 7 October 1993: 'The earth spins about an axis which goes through its centre and its north and south poles. This axis is inclined to the plane of the earth's orbit around the sun. This tilt is called the obliquity of the ecliptic. The current value for the obliquity of the ecliptic is 23.44 degrees.'

24.5˚.[3] The sequence in which one angle will follow another, as well as the sequence of all previous angles (at any period of history) can be calculated by means of a few straightforward equations. These have been expressed as a curve on a graph (originally plotted out in Paris in 1911 by the International Conference of Ephemerids) and from this graph it is possible to match angles and precise historical dates with confidence and accuracy.

Posnansky was able to date the Kalasasaya because the obliquity cycle gradually alters the azimuth position of sunrise and sunset from century to century.[4] By establishing the solar alignments of certain key structures that now looked 'out of true', he convincingly demonstrated that the obliquity of the ecliptic at the time of the building of the Kalasasaya had been 23˚ 8' 48". When that angle was plotted on the graph drawn up by the International Conference of Ephemerids it was found to correspond to a date of 15,000 BC.[5]

Of course, not a single orthodox historian or archaeologist was prepared to accept such an early origin for Tiahuanaco preferring, as noted in Chapter Eight, to agree on the safe estimate of AD 500. During the years 1927-30, however, several scientists from other disciplines checked carefully Posnansky's 'astronomic-archaeological investigations'. These scientists, members of a high-powered team which also studied many other archaeological sites in the Andes, were Dr Hans Ludendorff (then director of the Astronomical Observatory of Potsdam), Dr Friedrich Becker of the Specula Vaticanica, and two other astronomers: Professor Dr Arnold Kohlschutter of the University of Bonn and Dr Rolf Muller of the Astrophysical Institute of Potsdam.[6]

At the end of their three years of work the scientists concluded that Posnansky was basically right. They didn't concern themselves with the implications of their findings for the prevailing paradigm of history; they simply stated the observable facts about the astronomical alignments of various structures at Tiahuanaco. Of these, the most important by far was that the Kalasasaya had been laid out to conform with observations of the heavens made a very long time ago—much, much further back than AD 500. Posnansky's figure of 15,000 BC was pronounced to be well within the bounds of possibility.[7]

If Tiahuanaco had indeed flourished so long before the dawn of history, what sort of people had built it, and for what purpose?

Fish-garbed figures

There were two massive pieces of statuary inside the Kalasasaya. One, a figure nicknamed El Fraile (The Friar) stood in the south-west corner; the other, towards the centre of the eastern end of the enclosure, was the giant that I had observed from the sunken temple.

Carved in red sandstone, worn and ancient beyond reckoning, El Fraile stood about six feet high, and portrayed a humanoid, androgenous being with massive eyes and lips. In its right hand it clutched something resembling a knife with a wavy blade like an Indonesian kris. In its left hand was an object like a hinged and case-bound book. From the top of this ‘book’, however, protruded a device which had been inserted into it as though into a sheath.

From the waist down the figure appeared to be clad in a garment of fish scales, and, as though to confirm this perception, the sculptor had formed the individual scales out of rows and rows of small, highly-stylized fish-heads. This sign had been persuasively interpreted by Posnansky as meaning fish in general.[8] It seemed, therefore, that El Fraile was a portrayal of an imaginary or symbolic ‘fish man’. The figure was also equipped with a belt sculpted with the images of several large crustaceans, so this notion seemed all the more probable. What had been intended?

I had learned of one local tradition I thought might shed light on the matter. It was very ancient and spoke of ‘gods of the lake, with fish tails, called Chullua and Umantua’.[9] In this, and in the fish-garbed figures, it seemed that there was a curious out-of-place echo of Mesopotamian myths, which spoke strangely, and at length, about amphibious beings, ‘endowed with reason’ who had visited the land of Sumer in remote prehistory. The leader of these beings was named Oannes (or Uan).[10] According to the Chaldean scribe, Berosus:

> The whole body of [Oannes] was like that of a fish; and had under a fish’s head another head, and also feet below, similar to those of a man, subjoined to the fish’s tail. His voice too, and language, was articulate and human; and a representation of him is preserved even to this day ... When the sun set, it was the custom of this Being to plunge again into the sea, and abide all night in the deep; for he was amphibious.[11]

According to the traditions reported by Berosus, Oannes was, above all, a civilizer:

> In the day-time he used to converse with men; but took no food at that season; > and he gave them an insight into letters and sciences, and every kind of art. He taught them to construct houses, to found temples, to compile laws, and explained to them the principles of geometrical knowledge. He made them distinguish the seeds of the earth, and showed them how to collect fruits; in short, he instructed them in every thing which could tend to soften manners and to humanise mankind. From that time, so universal were his instructions, nothing has been added materially by way of improvement ...[12]

Surviving images of the Oannes creatures I had seen on Babylonian and Assyrian reliefs clearly portrayed fish-garbed men. Fish-scales formed the dominant motif on their garments, just as they did on those worn by El Fraile. Another similarity was that the Babylonian figures held unidentified objects in both their hands. If my memory served me right (and I later confirmed that it did) these objects were by no means identical to those carried by El Fraile. They were, however, similar enough to be worthy of note.[13]

The other great 'idol' of the Kalasasaya was positioned towards the eastern end of the platform, facing the main gateway, and was an imposing monolith of grey andesite, hugely thick and standing about nine feet tall. Its broad head rose straight up out of its hulking shoulders and its slab-like face stared expressionlessly into the distance. It was wearing a crown, or head-band of some kind, and its hair was braided into orderly rows of long vertical ringlets which were most clearly visible at the back.

The figure was also intricately carved and decorated across much of its surface almost as though it were tattooed. Like El Fraile, it was clad below the waist in a garment composed offish-scales and fish symbols. And, also like El Fraile, it held two unidentifiable objects in its hands. This time the left-hand object looked more like a sheath than a case-bound book, and from it protruded a forked handle. The right-hand object was roughly cylindrical, narrow in the centre where it was held, wider at the shoulders and at the base, and then narrowing again towards the top. It appeared to have several different sections, or parts, fitted over and into one another, but it was impossible to guess what it might represent.

Images of extinct species

Leaving the fish-garbed figures, I came at last to the Gateway of the Sun, located in the north-west corner of the Kalasasaya.

It proved to be a freestanding monolith of grey-green andesite about 12½ feet wide, 10 feet high and 18 inches thick, weighing an estimated 10 tons.[14] Perhaps best envisaged as a sort of Arc de Triomphe, though on a much smaller scale, it looked in this setting like a door connecting two invisible dimensions—a door between nowhere and nothing. The stonework was of exceptionally high quality and authorities agreed that it was ‘one of the archaeological wonders of the Americas’.[15] Its most enigmatic feature was the so-called ‘calendar frieze’ carved into its eastern façade along the top of the portal.

[14] Figures and measurements from The Ancient Civilizations of Peru, p. 92.

At its centre, in an elevated position, this frieze was dominated by what scholars took to be another representation of Viracocha,[16] but this time in his more terrifying aspect as the god-king who could call down fire from heaven. His gentle, fatherly side was still expressed: tears of compassion were running down his cheeks. But his face was set stern and hard, his tiara was regal and imposing, and in either hand he grasped a thunderbolt.[17] In the interpretation given by Joseph Campbell, one of the twentieth century’s best-known students of myth, ‘The meaning is that the grace that pours into the universe through the sun door is the same as the energy of the bolt that annihilates and is itself indestructible ...’[18]

I turned my head to right and left, slowly studying the remainder of the frieze. It was a beautifully balanced piece of sculpture with three rows of eight figures, twenty-four in all, lined up on either side of the elevated central image. Many attempts, none of them particularly convincing, have been made to explain the assumed calendrical function of these figures.[19] All that could really be said for sure was that they had a peculiar, bloodless, cartoon-like quality, and that there was something coldly mathematical, almost machinelike, about the way they seemed to march in regimented lines towards Viracocha. Some apparently wore bird masks, others had sharply pointed noses, and each had in his hand an implement of the type the high god was himself carrying.

The base of the frieze was filled with a design known as the ‘Meander’—a geometrical series of step-pyramid forms set in a continuous line, and arranged alternately upside down and right side up, which was also thought to have had a calendrical function. On the third column from the right-hand side (and, more faintly, on the third column from the left-hand side too) I could make out a clear carving of an elephant’s head, ears, tusks and trunk. This was unexpected since there are no elephants anywhere in the New World. There had been, however, in prehistoric times, as I was able to confirm much later. Particularly numerous in the southern Andes, until their sudden extinction around 10,000 BC,[20] had been the members of a species called Cuvieronius, an elephant-like proboscid complete with tusks and a trunk, uncannily similar in appearance to the ‘elephants’ of the Gateway of the Sun.[21]

I stepped forward a few paces to take a closer look at these elephants. Each turned out to be composed of the heads of two crested condors, placed throat to throat (the crests constituting the ‘ears’ and the upper part of the necks the ‘tusks’). The creatures thus formed still looked like elephants to me, perhaps because a characteristic visual trick the sculptors of Tiahuanaco had employed again and again in their subtle and otherworldly art had been to use one thing to depict another. Thus an apparently human ear on an apparently human face might turn out to be a bird’s wing. Likewise an ornate crown might be composed of alternate fishes’ and condors’ heads, an eyebrow a bird’s neck and head, the toe of a slipper an animal’s head, and so on. Members of the elephant family formed out of condors’ heads, therefore, need not necessarily be optical illusions; on the contrary, such inventive composites would be perfectly in keeping with the overall artistic character of the frieze.

Among the riot of stylized animal figures carved into the Gateway of the Sun were a number of other extinct species as well. I knew from my research that one of these had been convincingly identified by several observers as Toxodon[22]—a three-toed amphibious mammal about nine feet long and five feet high at the shoulder, resembling a short, stubby cross between a rhino and a hippo.[23] Like Cuvieronius, Toxodon had flourished in South America in the late Pliocene (1.6 million years ago) and had died out at the end of the Pleistocene, about 12,000 years ago.[24]

To my eye this looked like striking corroboration for the astro-archaeological evidence that dated Tiahuanaco to the end of the Pleistocene, and further undermined the orthodox historical chronology which made the city only 1500 years old, since Toxodon, presumably, could only have been modelled from life. It was therefore obviously a matter of some importance that no fewer that forty-six Toxodon heads had been carved into the frieze of the Gateway of the Sun.[25] Nor was this creature's ugly caricature confined only to the Gateway. On the contrary, Toxodon had been identified on numerous fragments of Tiahuanacan pottery. Even more convincingly, he had been portrayed in several pieces of sculpture which showed him in full three-dimensional glory.[26] Moreover representations of other extinct species had been found: the species included Shelidoterium, a diurnal quadruped, and Macrauchenia, an animal somewhat larger than the modern horse, with distinctive three-toed feet.[27]

Such images meant that Tiahuanaco was a kind of picture-book from the past, a record of bizarre animals, now deader than the dodo, expressed in everlasting stone.

But the record-taking had come to an abrupt halt one day and darkness had descended. This, too, was recorded in stone—the Gateway of the Sun, that surpassing work of art, had never been completed. Certain unfinished aspects of the frieze made it seem probable that something sudden and dreadful had happened which had caused the sculptor, in the words of Posnansky, 'to drop his chisel for ever' at the moment when he was 'putting the final touches to his work'.[28]

Chapter 12

The End of the Viracochas

We saw in Chapter Ten that Tiahuanaco was originally built as a port on the shores of Lake Titicaca, when that lake was far wider and more than 100 feet deeper than it is today. Vast harbour constructions, piers and dykes (and even dumped cargoes of quarried stone at points beneath the old waterline), leave no doubt that this must have been the case.[1] Indeed, according to the unorthodox estimates of Professor Posnansky, Tiahuanaco had been in active use as a port as early as 15,000 BC, the date he proposed for the construction of the Kalasasaya, and had continued to serve as such for approximately another five thousand years, during which great expanse of time its position in relation to the shore of Lake Titicaca hardly changed.[2]

Throughout this epoch the principal harbour of the port city was located several hundred metres south-west of the Kalasasaya at a site now known as Puma Punku (literally, the Puma Gate). Here Posnansky's excavations revealed two artificially dredged docks on either side of: 'a true and magnificent pier or wharf ... where hundreds of ships could at the same time take on and unload their heavy burdens'.[3]

One of the construction blocks from which the pier had been fashioned still lay on site and weighed an estimated 440 tons.[4] Numerous others weighed between 100 and 150 tons.[5] Furthermore, many of the biggest monoliths had clearly been joined to each other by I-shaped metal clamps. In the whole of South America, I knew, this masonry technique had been found only on Tiahuanacan structures.[6] The last time I had seen the characteristic notched depressions which proved its use had been on ruins on the island of Elephantine in the Nile in Upper Egypt.[7]

Former level of Lake Titicaca
Tiahuanaco

12,000 years ago, when Lake Titicaca was more than 100 feet deeper than it is today, Tiahuanaco would have been an island, as shown above.

Equally thought-provoking was the appearance of the symbol of the cross on many of these ancient blocks. Recurring again and again, particularly at the northern approach to Puma Punku, this symbol always took the same form: a double crucifix with pure clean lines, perfectly balanced and harmonious, deeply recessed into the hard grey stone. Even according to orthodox historical chronology these crosses were not less than 1500 years old. In other words, they had been carved here, by a people with absolutely no knowledge of Christianity, a full millennium before the arrival of the first Spanish missionaries on the Altiplano.

Where, come to that, had the Christians obtained their crosses? Not only from the shape of the structure to which Jesus Christ was nailed, I thought, but from some much older source as well. Hadn't the Ancient Egyptians, for example, used a hieroglyph very like a cross (the ankh, or crux ansata) to symbolize life ... the breath of life ... eternal life itself?[8] Had that symbol originated in Egypt, or had it perhaps occurred elsewhere, earlier still?

With such ideas chasing one another around my head, I walked slowly around Puma Punku. The extensive perimeter, which formed a rectangle several hundred feet long, outlined a low pyramidal hill, much overgrown with tall grass. Dozens and dozens of hulking blocks lay scattered in all directions, tossed like matchsticks, Posnansky argued, in the terrible natural disaster that had overtaken Tiahuanaco during the eleventh millennium BC:

> This catastrophe was caused by seismic movements which resulted in an overflow of the waters of Lake Titicaca and in volcanic eruptions ... It is also possible that

---

[8] The Encyclopedia of Ancient Egypt ed. Margaret Burson), Facts on File, New York and Oxford, 1991, p. 23.

> the temporary increase in the level of the lake may have been caused in part by the breaking of the bulwarks on some of the lakes further to the north and situated at a greater altitude ... thus releasing the waters which descended toward Lake Titicaca in onrushing and unrestrainable torrents.[9]

Posnansky's evidence that a flood had been the agent of the destruction of Tiahuanaco included

> The discovery of lacustrine flora, Paludestrina culminea, and Paludestrina andecola, Ancylus titicacensis, Planorbis titicacensis, etc., mixed in the alluvia with the skeletons of human beings who perished in the cataclysm ... and the discovery of various skeletons of Orestias, fish of the family of the present bogas, in the same alluvia which contain the human remains ...[10]

In addition, fragments of human and animal skeletons had been found lying > in chaotic disorder among wrought stones, utensils, tools and an endless variety of other things. All of this has been moved, broken and accumulated in a confused heap. Anyone who would dig a trench here two metres deep could not deny that the destructive force of water, in combination with brusque movements of the earth, must have accumulated those different kinds of bones, mixing them with pottery, jewels, tools and utensils ... Layers of alluvium cover the whole field of the ruins and lacustrine sand mixed with shells from Titicaca, decomposed feldspar and volcanic ashes have accumulated in the places surrounded by walls ...[11]

It had been a terrible catastrophe indeed that had overwhelmed Tiahuanaco. And if Posnansky was right, it took place more than 12,000 years ago. Thereafter, though the flood waters subsided, 'the culture of the Altiplano did not again attain a high point of development but fell rather into a total and definitive decadence'.[12]

Struggle and abandonment

This process was hastened by the fact that the earthquakes which had caused Lake Titicaca to engulf Tiahuanaco were only the first of many upheavals in the area. These initially resulted in the lake swelling and overflowing its banks but they soon began to have the opposite effect, slowly reducing Titicaca's depth and surface area. As the years passed, the lake continued to drain inch by inch, marooning the great city, remorselessly separating it from the waters which had previously played such a vital role in its economic life.

At the same time, there was evidence that the climate of the Tihuanaco area had become colder and much less favourable for the growing of crops than had previously been the case,[13] so much less favourable that today staples such as maize cannot ripen properly and even potatoes come out of the ground stunted.[14]

Although it was difficult to piece together all the different elements of the complex chain of events that had occurred, it seemed that 'a period of calm had followed the critical moment of seismic disturbance' which had temporarily flooded Tiahuanaco.[15] Then, slowly but surely, 'the climate worsened and became inclement. Finally there ensued mass emigrations of the Andean peoples towards locations where the struggle for life would not be so arduous.'[16]

It seems that the highly civilized inhabitants of Tiahuanaco, remembered in local traditions as 'the Viracocha people', had not gone without a struggle. There was puzzling evidence from all over the Altiplano that agricultural experiments of an advanced and scientific nature had been carried out, with great ingenuity and dedication, to try to compensate for the deterioration of the climate. For example, recent research has demonstrated that astonishingly sophisticated analyses of the chemical compositions of many poisonous high-altitude plants and tubers had been undertaken by somebody in this region in the furthest antiquity. Such analyses, furthermore, had been coupled with the invention of detoxification techniques which had rendered these otherwise nutritious vegetables harmless and edible.[17] There was as yet 'no satisfactory explanation for the development of these detoxification processes', admitted David Brow-man, associate professor of Anthropology at Washington University.[18]

[17] David L. Browman, 'New Light on Andean Tiahuanaco', in American Scientist, volume 69, 1981, pp. 410-12.

[18] Ibid., p. 410. According to Browman: 'Plant domestication in the Altiplano required the simultaneous development of detoxifying techniques. The majority of the plants [which were in regular use in ancient Tiahuanaco] contain significant levels of toxins in an untreated state. For example, the potato species that are most resistant to frost and that grow best at high altitudes also contain the highest levels of glycoalkaloid solanine. In addition, the potato contains an inhibitor for a wide range of digestive enzymes necessary for breaking down proteins—a particularly unfortunate trait at high altitudes where differential partial oxygen pressure already impairs the chemistry of protein breakdown ...'

The detoxification technique developed at Tiahuanaco to make these potatoes edible also had a preservative effect. Indeed, each of these two important qualities was a by-product of the other. 'Altiplano farmers', explains Browman, 'have, for several thousand years produced the freeze-dried potato, or ch'uno, by a process of freezing, leaching, and sun drying. The initial explanation for this process was that it produced a food product that could be stored for long periods of time ... six years or more ... But we can now suggest another rationale. Leaching and sun-drying are necessary to remove the majority of the solanine and to lower excessive nitrate levels, and the subsequent cooking of freeze-dried products destroys the inhibitors of digestive enzymes. Rather than arguing that freeze-drying was motivated only by a desire to produce a secure food base, one could hold that this technology was mandatory to make the potato available

Likewise, in the same ancient period, somebody as yet unidentified by scholarship went to great lengths to build raised fields on the newly exposed lands that had so recently been under the waters of the lake—a procedure which created characteristic corrugated strips of alternately high and low ground. It was not until the 1960s that the original function of these undulating patterns of earthen platforms and shallow canals was correctly worked out. Still visible today, and known as waru waaru by the local Indians, they proved to be part of a complex agricultural design, perfected in prehistoric times, which had the ability 'to out-perform modern farming techniques'.[19]

In recent years some of the raised fields were reconstructed by archaeologists and agronomists. These experimental plots consistently yielded three times more potatoes than even the most productive conventional plots. Likewise, during one particularly cold spell, a severe frost 'did little damage to the experimental fields'. The following year the crops on the elevated platforms survived an equally ruinous drought: 'then later rode high and dry through a flood that swamped surrounding farmlands'. Indeed this simple but effective agricultural technique, invented by a culture so ancient that no one today could even remember its name, had proved such a success in rural Bolivia that it had attracted as a usable nutritive source. Both factors are clearly present.

'The other plants identified as early domesticates at the Titicaca sites have similar levels of toxins, and all require the use of various detoxification techniques to make them suitable for human consumption. Oca has significant amounts of oxalates; quinoa and canihua have high levels of hydrocyanic acid and the alkaloid saponin; amaranth is a nitrate accumulator and has high levels of oxalates; tarwi contains the poisonous alkaloid lupinine; beans contain varying levels of the cyanogenetic glycoside phaseolunatin; and so on ... In some cases the detoxifying procedures serendipitously result in an end-product that has excellent storage features, multiplying the beneficial effects of the technology. Where the detoxification technology does not have this added effect—for example, in the case of quinoa, amaranth and tarwi—the plants generally already have excellent natural storage characteristics. There is as yet no satisfactory explanation for the development of these detoxification processes ...' 'New Light on Andean Tiahuanaco'.

[19] At the heart of the system were 'the earthen platforms about 3 feet high, 30-300 feet long and 10-30 feet wide. These elevated earthworks are separated by canals of similar dimensions and built out of the excavated soil. Over time the platforms were periodically fertilized with organic silt and nitrogen-rich algae scooped from the bottom of the canals during the dry season. Even today ... the sediment in the old canals is much richer in nutrients than the soil of the surrounding plains.

'But the platform-canal system was not merely a way of enriching infertile ground. It also appears to have created a climate that both extended the high-altitude growing season and helped crops survive hard times. During the area's frequent periods of drought, for example, the canals provided vital moisture, while the higher level of the platforms raised plants above the worst effects of the region's frequent floods. Moreover the canal water may have acted as a kind of thermal storage battery absorbing the sun's heat during the day and radiating it back into the freezing night, to create a blanket of relatively warm air over the growing plants.' Feats and Wisdom of the Ancients, pp. 56-7.

the attention of governmental and international development agencies and was now under test in several other parts of the world as well.[20]

An artificial language

Another possible legacy of Tiahuanaco, and of the Viracochas, lay embedded in the language spoken by the local Aymara Indians—a language regarded by some specialists as the oldest in the world.[21]

In the 1980s Ivan Guzman de Rojas, a Bolivian computer scientist, accidentally demonstrated that Aymara might be not only very ancient but, significantly, that it might be a 'made-up' language—something deliberately and skillfully designed. Of particular note was the seemingly artificial character of its syntax, which was rigidly structured and unambiguous to an extent thought inconceivable in normal 'organic' speech.[22] This synthetic and highly organized structure meant that Aymara could easily be transformed into a computer algorithm to be used to translate one language into another: 'The Aymara Algorithm is used as a bridge language. The language of an original document is translated into Aymara and then into any number of other languages.'[23]

Was it just coincidence that an apparently artificial language governed by a computer-friendly syntax should be spoken today in the environs of Tiahuanaco? Or could Aymara be a legacy of the high learning that legend attributed to the Viracochas? If so, what other legacies might there be? What other incomplete fragments of an old and forgotten wisdom might be lying scattered around—fragments which had perhaps contributed to the richness and diversity of many of the cultures that had evolved in this region during the 10,000 years before the conquest? Perhaps it was the possession of fragments like these that had made possible the drawing of the Nazca lines and enabled the predecessors of the Incas to build the 'impossible' stone walls at Machu Picchu and Sacsayhuaman?

The image I could not get out of my mind was of the Viracocha people leaving, 'walking on the waters' of the Pacific Ocean, or 'going miraculously' by sea as so many of the legends told.

Where had these seafarers been going? What had their objective been? And why, come to think of it, had they made such dogged efforts to stay in Tiahuanaco for so long before admitting defeat and moving on? What had they been trying to achieve there that had been so important to them?

After several weeks work on the Altiplano, travelling back and forth between La Paz and Tiahuanaco, it became clear that neither the otherworldly ruins nor the libraries of the capital were going to provide me with any further answers. Indeed, in Bolivia at least, the trail seemed to have gone cold.

It was not until I reached Mexico, 2000 miles north, that I picked up its traces again.

Plumed Serpent

Central America

Chapter 13

Blood and Time at the End of the World

Chicken Itza, northern Yucatan, Mexico

Behind me, towering almost 100 feet into the air, was a perfect ziggurat, the Temple of Kukulkan. Its four stairways had 91 steps each. Taken together with the top platform, which counted as a further step, the total was 365. This gave the number of complete days in a solar year. In addition, the geometric design and orientation of the ancient structure had been calibrated with Swiss-watch precision to achieve an objective as dramatic as it was esoteric: on the spring and autumn equinoxes, regular as clockwork, triangular patterns of light and shadow combined to create the illusion of a giant serpent undulating on the northern staircase. On each occasion the illusion lasted for 3 hours and 22 minutes exactly.[1]

I walked away from the Temple of Kukulkan in an easterly direction. Ahead of me, starkly refuting the oft-repeated fallacy that the peoples of Central America had never succeeded in developing the column as an architectural feature, stood a forest of white stone columns which must at one time have supported a massive roof. The sun was beating down harshly through the translucent blue of a cloudless sky and the cool, deep shadows this area offered were alluring. I passed by and made my way to the foot of the steep steps that led up to the adjacent Temple of the Warriors.

At the top of these steps, becoming fully visible only after I had begun to ascend them, was a giant figure. This was the idol of Chacmool. It half-lay, half-sat in an oddly stiff and expectant posture, bent knees protruding upwards, thick calves drawn back to touch its thighs, ankles tucked in against its buttocks, elbows planted on the ground, hands folded across its belly encircling an empty plate, and its back set at an awkward angle as though it were just about to lever itself upright. Had it done so, I calculated, it would have stood about eight feet tall. Even reclining, coiled and tightly sprung, it seemed to overflow with a fierce and pitiless energy. Its square features were thin-lipped and implacable, as hard and indifferent as the stone from which they were carved, and its eyes gazed westwards, traditionally the direction of darkness, death and the colour black.[2]

Chichen Itza.

Rather lugubriously, I continued to climb the steps of the Temple of the Warriors. Weighing on my mind was the unforgettable fact that the ritual of human sacrifice had been routinely practised here in pre-Colombian times. The empty plate that Chacmool held across his stomach had once served as a receptacle for freshly extracted hearts. 'If the victim's heart was to be taken out,' reported one Spanish observer in the sixteenth century, > they conducted him with great display ... and placed him on the sacrificial stone. Four of them took hold of his arms and legs, spreading them out. Then the executioner came, with a flint knife in his hand, and with great skill made an incision between the ribs on the left side, below the nipple; then he plunged in his hand and like a ravenous tiger tore out the living heart, which he laid on the plate ...[3]

What kind of culture could have nourished and celebrated such demonic behaviour? Here, in Chichen Itza, amid ruins dating back more than 1200 years, a hybrid society had formed out of intermingled Maya and Toltec elements. This society was by no means exceptional in its addiction to cruel and barbaric ceremonies. On the contrary, all the great indigenous civilizations known to have flourished in Mexico had indulged in the ritualized slaughter of human beings.

Olmecs, the so-called 'mother-culture' of Central America, and it was more than 3000 years old. A block of solid granite about four feet thick, its sides bore reliefs of four men wearing curious head-dresses. Each man carried a healthy, chubby, struggling infant, whose desperate fear was clearly visible. The back of the altar was undecorated; at the front another figure was portrayed, holding in his arms, as though it were an offering, the slumped body of a dead child.

The Olmecs are the earliest recognized high civilization of Ancient Mexico, and human sacrifice was well established with them. Two and a half thousand years later, at the time of the Spanish conquest, the Aztecs were the last (but by no means the least) of the peoples of this region to continue an extremely old and deeply ingrained tradition.

They did so with fanatical zeal.

It is recorded, for example, that Ahuitzotl, the eighth and most powerful emperor of the Aztec royal dynasty, 'celebrated the dedication of the temple of Huitzilopochtli in Tenochitlan by marshalling four lines of prisoners past teams of priests who worked four days to dispatch them. On this occasion as many as 80,000 were slain during a single ceremonial rite.'[4]

The Aztecs liked to dress up in the flayed skins of sacrificial victims. Bernardino de Sahagun, a Spanish missionary, attended one such ceremony soon after the conquest:

> The celebrants flayed and dismembered the captives; they then lubricated their own naked bodies with grease and slipped into the skin ... Trailing blood and grease, the gruesomely clad men ran through the city, thus terrifying those they followed ... The second-day's rite also included a cannibal feast for each warrior's family.[5]

Another mass sacrifice was witnessed by the Spanish chronicler Diego de Duran. In this instance the victims were so numerous that when the streams of blood running down the temple steps 'reached bottom and cooled they formed fat clots, enough to terrify anyone'.[6] All in all, it has been estimated that the number of sacrificial victims in the Aztec empire as a whole had risen to around 250,000 a year by the beginning of the sixteenth century.[7]

What was this manic destruction of human life for? According to the Aztecs themselves, it was done to delay the coming of the end of the world.[8]

Children of the Fifth Sun

Like the many different peoples and cultures that had preceded them in Mexico, the Aztecs believed that the universe operated in great cycles. The priests stated as a matter of simple fact that there had been four such cycles, or 'Suns', since the creation of the human race. At the time of the conquest, it was the Fifth Sun that prevailed. And it is within that same Fifth Sun, or epoch, that humankind still lives today. This account is taken from a rare collection of Aztec documents known as the Vaticano-Latin Codex:

> First Sun, Matlactli Atl: duration 4008 years. Those who lived then ate water maize called atzitzintli. In this age lived the giants ... The First Sun was destroyed by water in the sign Matlactli Atl (Ten Water). It was called Apachiohualiztli (flood, deluge), the art of sorcery of the permanent rain. Men were turned into fish. Some say that only one couple escaped, protected by an old tree living near the water. Others say that there were seven couples who hid in a cave until the flood was over and the waters had gone down. They repopulated the earth and were worshipped as gods in their nations ...
> Second Sun, Ehecoatl: duration 4010 years. Those who lived then ate wild fruit known as acotzintli. This Sun was destroyed by Ehecoatl (Wind Serpent) and men were turned into monkeys ... One man and one woman, standing on a rock, were saved from destruction ...
> Third Sun, Tleyquiyahuillo: duration 4081 years. Men, the descendants of the couple who were saved from the Second Sun, ate a fruit called tzincoacoc. This Third Sun was destroyed by fire ...
> Fourth Sun, Tzontlilic: duration 5026 years ... Men died of starvation after a deluge of blood and fire ...9

Another 'cultural document' of the Aztecs that has survived the ravages of the conquest is the 'Sun Stone' of Axayacatl, the sixth emperor of the royal dynasty. This huge monolith was hewn out of solid basalt in AD 1479. It weighs 24.5 tons and consists of a series of concentrically inscribed circles, each bearing intricate symbolic statements. As in the codex, these statements focus attention on the belief that the world has already passed through four epochs, or Suns. The first and most remote of these is represented by Ocelotonatiuh, the jaguar god: 'During that Sun lived the giants that had been created by the gods but were finally attacked and devoured by jaguars.' The Second Sun is represented by the serpent head of Ehecoatl, the god of the air: 'During that period the human race was destroyed by high winds and hurricanes and men were converted into monkeys.' The symbol of the Third Sun is a head of rain and celestial fire: 'In this epoch everything was destroyed by a rain of fire from the sky and the forming of lava. All the houses were burnt. Men were converted into birds to survive the catastrophe.' The Fourth Sun is represented by the head of the water-goddess Chalchiuhtlicue: 'Destruction came in the form of torrential rains and floods. The mountains disappeared and men were transformed into fish.'[10]

The symbol of the Fifth Sun, our current epoch, is the face of Tonatiuh, the sun god himself. His tongue, fittingly depicted as an obsidian knife, juts out hungrily, signalling his need for the nourishment of human blood and hearts. His features are wrinkled to indicate his advanced age and he appears within the symbol Ollin which signifies Movement.[11]

Why is the Fifth Sun known as 'The Sun of Movement'? Because, 'the elders say: in it there will be a movement of the earth and from this we shall all perish.'[12]

And when will this catastrophe strike? Soon, according to the Aztec priests. They believed that the Fifth Sun was already very old and approaching the end of its cycle (hence the wrinkles on the face of Tonatiuh). Ancient meso-American traditions dated the birth of this epoch to a remote period corresponding to the fourth millennium BC of the Christian calendar.[13] The method of calculating its end, however, had been forgotten by the time of Aztecs.[14] In the absence of this essential information, human sacrifices were apparently carried out in the hope that the impending catastrophe might be postponed. Indeed, the Aztecs came to regard themselves as a chosen people; they were convinced that they had been charged with a divine mission to wage war and offer the blood of their captives to feed Tonatiuh, thereby preserving the life of the Fifth Sun.[15]

Stuart Fiedel, an authority on the prehistory of the Americas, summed up the whole issue in these words: 'The Aztecs believed that to prevent the destruction of the universe, which had already occurred four times in the past, the gods must be supplied with a steady diet of human hearts and blood.'[16] This same belief, with remarkably few variations, was shared by all the great civilizations of Central America. Unlike the Aztecs, however, some of the earlier peoples had calculated exactly when a great movement of the earth could be expected to bring the Fifth Sun to an end.

Lightbringer

No documents, only dark and menacing sculptures, have come down to us from the Olmec era. But the Mayas, justifiably regarded as the greatest ancient civilization to have arisen in the New World, left behind a wealth of calendrical records. Expressed in terms of the modern dating system, these enigmatic inscriptions convey a rather curious message: the Fifth Sun, it seems, is going to come to an end on 23 December, AD 2012.[17]

In the rational intellectual climate of the late twentieth century it is unfashionable to take doomsday prophecies seriously. The general consensus is that they are the products of superstitious minds and can safely be ignored. As I travelled around Mexico, however, I was from time to time bothered by a nagging intuition that the voices of the ancient sages might deserve a hearing after all. I mean, suppose by some crazy offchance they weren't the superstitious savages we'd always believed them to be. Suppose they knew something we didn't? Most pertinent of all, suppose that their projected date for the end of the Fifth Sun turned out to be correct? Suppose, in other words, that some truly awful geological catastrophe is already unfolding, deep in the bowels of the earth, as the wise men of the Maya predicted?

In Peru and Bolivia I had become aware of the obsessive concern with the calculation of time shown by the Incas and their predecessors. Now, in Mexico, I discovered that the Maya, who believed that they had worked out the date of the end of the world, had been possessed by the same compulsion. Indeed, for these people, just about everything boiled down to numbers, the passage of the years and the manifestations of events. The belief was that if the numbers which lay beneath the manifestations could be properly understood, it would be possible to predict successfully the timing of the events themselves.[18] I felt disinclined to ignore the obvious implications of the recurrent destructions of humanity depicted so vividly in the Central American traditions. Coming complete with giants and floods, these traditions were eerily similar to those of the far-off Andean region.

Meanwhile, however, I was keen to pursue another, related line of inquiry. This concerned the bearded white-skinned deity named Quetzalcoatl, who was believed to have sailed to Mexico from across the seas in remote antiquity. Quetzalcoatl was credited with the invention of the advanced mathematical and calendrical formulae that the Maya were later to use to calculate the date of doomsday.[19] He also bore a striking resemblance to Viracocha, the pale god of the Andes, who came to Tiahuanaco ‘in the time of darkness’ bearing the gifts of light and civilization.

Chapter 14

People of the Serpent

After spending so long immersed in the traditions of Viracocha, the bearded god of the distant Andes, I was intrigued to discover that Quetzalcoatl, the principal deity of the ancient Mexican pantheon, was described in terms that were extremely familiar.

For example, one pre-Colombian myth collected in Mexico by the sixteenth-century Spanish chronicler Juan de Torquemada asserted that Quetzalcoatl was ‘a fair and ruddy complexioned man with a long beard’. Another spoke of him as, ‘era Hombre blanco; a large man, broad browed, with huge eyes, long hair, and a great, rounded beard—la barba grande y redonda.’[1] Another still described him as > a mysterious person ... a white man with strong formation of body, broad forehead, large eyes, and a flowing beard. He was dressed in a long, white robe reaching to his feet. He condemned sacrifices, except of fruits and flowers, and was known as the god of peace ... When addressed on the subject of war he is reported to have stopped up his ears with his fingers.[2]

According to a particularly striking Central American tradition, this ‘wise instructor ...’

> came from across the sea in a boat that moved by itself without paddles. He was a tall, bearded white man who taught people to use fire for cooking. He also built houses and showed couples that they could live together as husband and wife; and since people often quarreled in those days, he taught them to live in peace.[3]

Viracocha’s Mexican twin

The reader will recall that Viracocha, in his journeys through the Andes, went by several different aliases. Quetzalcoatl did this too. In some parts of Central America (notably among the Quiche Maya) he was called Gucumatz. Elsewhere, at Chichen Itza for example, he was known as Kukulkan. When both these words were translated into English, they turned out to mean exactly the same thing: Plumed (or Feathered) Serpent. This, also, was the meaning of Quetzalcoatl.[4]

There were other deities, among the Maya in particular, whose identities seemed to merge closely with those of Quetzalcoatl. One was Votan, a great civilizer, who was also described as pale-skinned, bearded and wearing a long robe. Scholars could offer no translation for his name but his principal symbol, like that of Quetzalcoatl, was a serpent.[5] Another closely related figure was Itzamana, the Mayan god of healing, who was a robed and bearded individual; his symbol, too, was the rattlesnake.[6]

What emerged from all this, as the leading authorities agreed, was that the Mexican legends collected and passed on by Spanish chroniclers at the time of the conquest were often the confused and conflated products of extremely long oral traditions. Behind them all, however, it seemed that there must lie some solid historical reality. In the judgement of Sylvanus Griswold Morley, the doyen of Maya studies:

> The great god Kukulkan, or Feathered Serpent, was the Mayan counterpart of the Aztec Quetzalcoatl, the Mexican god of light, learning and culture. In the Maya pantheon he was regarded as having been the great organizer, the founder of cities, the former of laws and the teacher of the calendar. Indeed his attributes and life history are so human that it is not improbable that he may have been an actual historical character, some great lawgiver and organizer, the memory of whose benefactions lingered long after death, and whose personality was eventually deified.[7]

All the legends stated unambiguously that Quetzalcoatl/Kukulkan/Gucumatz/Votan/Itzamana had arrived in Central America from somewhere very far away (across the 'Eastern Sea') and that amid great sadness he had eventually sailed off again in the direction whence he had come.[8] The legends added that he had promised solemnly that he would return one day[9]—a clear echo of Viracocha it would be almost perverse to ascribe to coincidence. In addition, it will be recalled that Viracocha's departure across the waves of the Pacific Ocean had been portrayed in the Andean traditions as a miraculous event. Quetzalcoatl's departure from Mexico also had a strange feel about it: he was said to have sailed away 'on a raft of serpents'.[10]

All in all, I felt Morley was right in looking for a factual historical background behind the Mayan and Mexican myths. What the traditions seemed to indicate was that the bearded pale-skinned foreigner called Quetzalcoatl (or Kukulkan or whatever) had been not just one person but probably several people who had come from the same place and had belonged to the same distinctively non-Indian ethnic type (bearded, white-skinned, etc.). This wasn't only suggested by the existence of a 'family' of obviously related[11] but slightly different gods sharing the symbol of the snake. Quetzalcoatl/Kukulkan/Itzamana was quite explicitly portrayed in many of the Mexican and Mayan accounts as having been accompanied by 'attendants' or 'assistants'.

Certain myths set out in the Ancient Mayan religious texts known as the Books of Chilam Balam, for instance, reported that 'the first inhabitants of Yucatan were the "People of the Serpent". They came from the east in boats across the water with their leader Itzamana, "Serpent of the East", a healer who could cure by laying on hands, and who revived the dead.'[12]

'Kukulkan,' stated another tradition, 'came with nineteen companions, two of whom were gods offish, two others gods of agriculture, and a god of thunder ... They stayed ten years in Yucatan. Kukulkan made wise laws and then set sail and disappeared in the direction of the rising sun ...'[13]

According to the Spanish chronicler Las Casas: 'The natives affirmed that in ancient times there came to Mexico twenty men, the chief of whom was called Kukulkan ... They wore flowing robes and sandals on their feet, they had long beards and their heads were bare ... Kukulkan instructed the people in the arts of peace, and caused various important edifices to be built ...'[14]

Meanwhile Juan de Torquemada recorded this very specific pre-conquest tradition concerning the imposing strangers who had entered Mexico with Quetzalcoatl:

> They were men of good carriage, well-dressed, in long robes of black linen, open in front, and without capes, cut low at the neck, with short sleeves that did not come to the elbow ... These followers of Quetzalcoatl were men of great knowledge and cunning artists in all kinds of fine work.[15]

Like some long-lost twin of Viracocha, the white and bearded Andean deity, Quetzalcoatl was depicted as having brought to Mexico all the skills and sciences necessary to create a civilized life, thus ushering in a golden age.[16] He was believed, for example, to have introduced the knowledge of writing to Central America, to have invented the calendar, and to have been a master builder who taught the people the secrets of masonry and architecture. He was the father of mathematics, metallurgy, and astronomy and was said to have 'measured the earth'. He also founded productive agriculture, and was reported to have discovered and introduced corn—literally the staff of life in these ancient lands. A great doctor and master of medicines, he was the patron of healers and diviners 'and disclosed to the people the mysteries of the properties of plants'. In addition, he was revered as a lawgiver, as a protector of craftsmen, and as a patron of all the arts.

[11] Not only obviously related but specifically related. Votan, for example, was often referred to as the grandson of Quetzalcoatl. Itzamana and Kukulkan were sometimes confused by the Indians who transmitted their legends to Spanish chroniclers shortly after the conquest. See Fair Gods and Stone Faces, p. 100.

[16] According to the sixteenth century chronicler Bernardino de Sahagun: 'Quetzalcoatl was a great civilizing agent who entered Mexico at the head of a band of strangers. He imported the arts into the country and especially fostered agriculture. In his time maize was so large in the head that a man might not carry more than one stalk at a time and cotton grew in all colours without having to be dyed. He built spacious and elegant houses, and inculcated a type of religion which fostered peace.'

As might be expected of such a refined and cultured individual he forbade the grisly practice of human sacrifice during the period of his ascendancy in Mexico. After his departure the blood-spattered rituals were reintroduced with a vengeance. Nevertheless, even the Aztecs, the most vehement sacrificers ever to have existed in the long history of Central America, remembered 'the time of Quetzalcoatl' with a kind of nostalgia. 'He was a teacher,' recalled one legend, 'who taught that no living thing was to be harmed and that sacrifices were to be made not of human beings but of birds and butterflies.[17]

Cosmic struggle

Why did Quetzalcoatl go away? What went wrong?

Mexican legends provided answers to these questions. They said that the enlightened and benevolent rule of the Plumed Serpent had been brought to an end by Tezcatilpoca, a malevolent god whose name meant 'Smoking Mirror' and whose cult demanded human sacrifice. It seemed that a near-cosmic struggle between the forces of light and darkness had taken place in Ancient Mexico, and that the forces of darkness had triumphed ...

The supposed stage for these events, now known as Tula, was not believed to be particularly old—not much more than 1000 years anyway—but the legends surrounding it linked it to an infinitely more distant epoch. In those times, outside history, it had been known as Tollan. All the traditions agreed that it had been at Tollan that Tezcatilpoca had vanquished Quetzalcoatl and forced him to quit Mexico.

Tula, Hidalgo Province

I was sitting on the flat square summit of the unimaginatively named Pyramid B. The late-afternoon sun was beating down out of a clear blue sky, and I was facing south, looking around.

At the base of the pyramid, to the north and east, were murals depicting jaguars and eagles feasting on human hearts. Immediately behind me were ranged four pillars and four fearsome granite idols each nine feet tall. Ahead and, to my left lay the partially unexcavated Pyramid C, a cactus-covered mound about 40 feet high, and farther away were more mounds not yet investigated by archaeologists. To my right was a ball court. In that long, I-shaped arena, terrible gladitorial games had been staged in ancient times. Teams, or sometimes just two individuals pitted against each other, would compete for possession of a rubber ball; the losers were decapitated.

The idols on the platform behind me had a solemn and intimidating aura. I stood up to look at them more closely. Their sculptor had given them hard, implacable faces, hooked noses and hollow eyes and they seemed without sympathy or emotion. What interested me most, however, was not so much their ferocious appearance as the objects that they clutched in their hands. Archaeologists admitted that they didn't really know what these objects were but had tentatively identified them anyway. This identification had stuck and it was now received wisdom that spearthrowers called atl-atls were held in the right hands of the idols and 'spears or arrows and incense bags' in the left hands.[18] It didn't seem to matter that the objects did not in any way resemble atl-atls, spears, arrows, or incense bags.

Santha Faiia's photographs will help the reader to form his or her own impression of these peculiar objects. As I studied the objects themselves I had the distinct sense that they were meant to represent devices which had originally been made out of metal. The right-hand device, which seemed to emerge from a sheath or hand-guard, was lozenge-shaped with a curved lower edge. The left-hand device could have been an instrument or weapon of some kind.

I remembered legends which related that the gods of ancient Mexico had armed themselves with xiuhcoatl, 'fire serpents'.[19] These apparently emitted burning rays capable of piercing and dismembering human bodies.[20] Was it 'fire serpents' that the Tula idols were holding? What, for that matter, were fire serpents?

Whatever they were, both devices looked like pieces of technology. And both in certain ways resembled the equally mysterious objects in the hands of the idols in the Kalasasaya at Tiahuanaco.

Serpent Sanctuary

Santha and I had come to Tula/Tollan because it had been closely associated both with Quetzalcoatl and with his arch-enemy Tezcatilpoca, the Smoking Mirror.[21] Ever-young, omnipotent, omnipresent and omniscient, Tezcatilpoca was associated in the legends with night, darkness and the sacred jaguar.[22] He was 'invisible and implacable, appearing to men sometimes as a flying shadow, sometimes as a dreadful monster'.[23] Often depicted as a glaring skull, he was said to have been the owner of a mysterious object, the Smoking Mirror after which he was named, which he made use of to observe from afar the activities of men and gods. Scholars quite reasonably suppose that it must have been a primitive obsidian scrying stone: 'Obsidian had an especial sanctity for the Mexicans, as it provided the sacrificial knives employed by the priests ... Bernal Diaz [Spanish chronicler] states that they called this stone "Tezcat". From it mirrors were also manufactured as divinatory media to be used by wizards.'[24]

Representing the forces of darkness and rapacious evil, Tezcatilpoca was said in the legends to have been locked in a conflict with Quetzalcoatl that had continued over an immense span of years.[25] At certain times one seemed to be gaining the upper hand, at certain times the other. Finally the cosmic struggle came to an end when good was vanquished by evil and Quetzalcoatl driven out from Tollan.[26] Thereafter, under the influence of Tezcatilpoca's nightmarish cult, human sacrifice was reintroduced throughout Central America.

As we have seen, Quetzalcoatl was believed to have fled to the coast and to have been carried away on a raft of serpents. One legend says, 'He burned his houses, built of silver and shells, buried his treasure, and set sail on the Eastern Sea preceded by his attendants who had been changed into bright birds.'[27]

This poignant moment of departure was supposedly staged at a place called Coatzecoalcos, meaning 'Serpent Sanctuary'.[28] There, before taking his leave, Quetzalcoatl promised his followers he would return one day to overthrow the cult of Tezcatilpoca and to inaugurate an era when the gods would again 'accept sacrifices of flowers' and cease their clamour for human blood.[29]

Chapter 15

Mexican Babel

We drove south-east from Tula, by-passing Mexico City on an anarchic series of fast freeways that dragged us through the creeping edge of the capital's eye-watering, lung-searing pollution. Our route then took us up over pine-covered mountains, past the snowy peak of Popocatepetl and thence along tree-lined lanes amid fields and farmsteads.

In the late afternoon we arrived at Cholula, a sleepy town with 11,000 inhabitants and a spacious main square. After turning east through the narrow streets, we crossed a railway line and pulled to a halt in the shadow of tlahchiualtepetl, the 'man-made mountain' we had come here to see.

Once sacred to the peaceful cult of Quetzalcoatl, but now surmounted by an ornate Catholic church, this immense edifice was ranked among the most extensive and ambitious engineering projects ever undertaken anywhere in the ancient world. Indeed, with a base area of 45 acres and a height of 210 feet, it was three times more massive than the Great Pyramid of Egypt.[1] Though its contours were now blurred by age and its sides overgrown with grass, it was still possible to recognize that it had once been an imposing ziggurat which had risen up towards the heavens in four clean-angled 'steps'. Measuring almost half a kilometre along each side at its base, it had also succeeded in preserving a dignified but violated beauty.

The past, though often dry and dusty, is rarely dumb. Sometimes it can speak with passion. It seemed to me that it did so here, bearing witness to the physical and psychological degradation visited upon the native peoples of Mexico when the Spanish conquistador Hernan Cortez almost casually 'beheaded a culture as a passer-by might sweep off the head of a sunflower'.[2] In Cholula, a great centre of pilgrimage with a population of around 100,000 at the time of the conquest, this decapitation of ancient traditions and ways of life required that something particularly humiliating be done to the man-made mountain of Quetzalcoatl. The solution was to smash and desecrate the temple which had once stood on the summit of the ziggurat and replace it with a church.

Cortez and his men were few, the Cholulans were many. When they marched into town, however, the Spaniards had one major advantage: bearded and pale-skinned, dressed in shining armour, they looked like the fulfillment of a prophecy—had it not always been promised that

Quetzalcoatl, the Plumed Serpent, would return 'from across the Eastern Sea' with his band of followers?[3]

Because of this expectation, the naive and trusting Cholulans permitted the conquistadores to climb the steps of the ziggurat and enter the great courtyard of the temple. There troupes of gaily bedecked dancing girls greeted them, singing and playing on instruments, while stewards moved back and forth with heaped platters of bread and delicate cooked meats.

One of the Spanish chroniclers, an eyewitness to the events that followed, reported that adoring townsfolk of all ranks 'unarmed, with eager and happy faces, crowded in to hear what the white men would say'. Realizing from this incredible reception that their intentions were not suspected, the Spaniards closed and guarded all the entrances, drew their weapons of steel and murdered their hosts.[4] Six thousand died in this horrible massacre[5] which matched, in its savagery, the most bloodstained rituals of the Aztecs: 'Those of Cholula were caught unawares. With neither arrows nor shields did they meet the Spaniards. Just so they were slain without warning. They were killed by pure treachery.'[6]

It was ironic, I thought, that the conquistadores in both Peru and Mexico should have benefited in the same way from local legends that prophesied the return of a pale, bearded god. If that god was indeed a deified human, as seemed likely, he must have been a person of high civilization and exemplary character—or more probably two different people from the same background, one working in Mexico and providing the model for Quetzalcoatl, the other in Peru being the model for Viracocha. The superficial resemblance that the Spanish bore to those earlier fair-skinned foreigners opened many doors that would otherwise certainly have been closed. Unlike their wise and benevolent predecessors, however, Pizarro in the Andes and Cortez in Central America were ravening wolves. They ate up the lands and the peoples and the cultures they had seized upon. They destroyed almost everything ...

Tears for the past

Their eyes scaled with ignorance, bigotry and greed, the Spanish erased a precious heritage of mankind when they arrived in Mexico. In so doing they deprived the future of any detailed knowledge concerning the brilliant and remarkable civilizations which once flourished in Central America.

What, for example, was the true history of the glowing 'idol' that rested in a sacred sanctuary in the Mixtec capital Achiotlan? We know of this curious object through the writings of a sixteenth-century eyewitness, Father Burgoa:

> The material was of marvellous value, for it was an emerald of the size of a thick pepper-pod [capsicum], upon which a small bird was engraved with the greatest skill, and, with the same skill, a small serpent coiled ready to strike. The stone was so transparent that it shone from its interior with the brightness of a candle flame. It was a very old jewel, and there is no tradition extant concerning the origin of its veneration and worship.[7]

What might we learn if we could examine this 'very old' jewel today? And how old was it really? We shall never find out because Fr. Benito, the first missionary of Achiotlan, seized the stone from the Indians: 'He had it ground up, although a Spaniard offered three thousand ducats for it, stirred the powder in water, poured it upon the earth and trod upon it ...'[8]

Equally typical of the profligate squandering of the intellectual riches concealed in the Mexican past was the shared fate of two gifts given to Cortez by the Aztec emperor Montezuma. These were circular calendars, as big as cartwheels, one of solid silver, and the other of solid gold. Both were elaborately engraved with beautiful hieroglyphs which may have contained material of great interest. Cortez had them melted down for ingots on the spot.[9]

More systematically, all over Central America, vast repositories of knowledge accumulated since ancient times were painstakingly gathered, heaped up and burned by zealous friars. In July 1562, for example, in the main square of Mani (just south of modern Merida in Yucatan Province) Fr. Diego de Landa burned thousands of Maya codices, story paintings and hieroglyphs inscribed on rolled-up deer skins. He also destroyed countless 'idols' and 'altars', all of which he described as 'works of the devil, designed by the evil one to delude the Indians and to prevent them from accepting Christianity ...'[10] Elsewhere he elaborated on the same theme:

> We found great numbers of books [written in the characters of the Indians] but as they contained nothing but superstitions and falsehoods of the devil we burned them all, which the natives took most grievously, and which gave them great pain.[11]

Not only the 'natives' should have felt this pain but anyone and everyone—then and now—who would like to know the truth about the past.

Many other 'men of God', some even more ruthlessly efficient than Diego de Landa, participated in Spain's satanic mission to wipe clear the memory banks of Central America. Notable among these was Juan de Zumarraga, Bishop of Mexico, who boasted of having destroyed 20,000 idols and 500 Indian temples. In November 1530 he burned a Christianized Aztec aristocrat at the stake for having allegedly reverted to worship of the 'rain-god' and later, in the market-place at Texcoco, built a vast bonfire of astronomical documents, paintings, manuscripts and hieroglyphic texts which the conquistadores had forcibly extracted from the Aztecs during the previous eleven years.[12] As this irreplaceable storehouse of knowledge and history went up in flames, a chance to shake off at least some of the collective amnesia that clouds our understanding was lost to mankind for ever.

What remains to us of the written records of the ancient peoples of Central America? The answer, thanks to the Spanish, is less than twenty original codices and scrolls.[13]

We know from hearsay that many of the documents which the friars reduced to ashes contained 'records of ages past'.[14]

What did those lost records say? what secrets did they hold?

Gigantic men of deformed stature

Even while the orgy of book-burning was still going on, some Spaniards began to realize that 'a truly great civilization had once existed in Mexico prior to the Aztecs'.[15] Oddly enough, one of the first to act on this realization was Diego de Landa. He appears to have undergone 'Damascus-road experience' after staging his auto-da-fé at Mani. In later years, determined to save what he could of the ancient wisdom he had once played such a large part in destroying, he became an assiduous gatherer of the traditions and oral histories of the native peoples of the Yucatan.[16]

Bernardino de Sahagun, a Franciscan friar, was a chronicler to whom we owe much. A great linguist, he is reported to have 'sought out the most learned and often the oldest natives, and asked each to paint in his Aztec picture writing as much as he could clearly remember of Aztec history, religion and legend'.[17] In this way Sahagun was able to accumulate detailed information on the anthropology, mythology and social history of ancient Mexico, which he later set down in a learned twelve-volume work. This was suppressed by the Spanish authorities. Fortunately one copy has survived, though it is incomplete.

Diego de Duran, a conscientious and courageous collector of indigenous traditions, was yet another Franciscan who fought to recover the lost knowledge of the past. He visited Cholula in AD 1585, a time of rapid and catastrophic change. There he interviewed a venerated elder of the town, said to have been more than one hundred years old, who told him this story about the making of the great ziggurat:

> In the beginning, before the light of the sun had been created, this place, Cholula, was in obscurity and darkness; all was a plain, without hill or elevation, encircled in every part by water, without tree or created thing. Immediately after the light and the sun arose in the east there appeared gigantic men of deformed stature who possessed the land. Enamoured of the light and beauty of the sun they determined to build a tower so high that its summit should reach the sky. Having collected materials for the purpose they found a very adhesive clay and bitumen with which they speedily commenced to build the tower ... And having reared it to the greatest possible altitude, so that it reached the sky, the Lord of the Heavens, enraged, said to the inhabitants of the sky, 'Have you observed how they of the earth have built a high and haughty tower to mount hither, being enamoured of the light of the sun and his beauty? Come and confound them, because it is not right that they of the earth, living in the flesh, should mingle with us.' Immediately the inhabitants of the sky sallied forth like flashes of lightning; they destroyed the edifice and divided and scattered its builders to all parts of the earth.[18]

It was this story, almost but not quite the biblical account of the Tower of Babel (which was itself a reworking of a far older Mesopotamian tradition), that had brought me to Cholula.

The Central American and Middle Eastern tales were obviously closely related. Indeed, the similarities were unmissable, but there were also differences far too significant to be ignored. Of course, the similarities could be due to unrecorded pre-Colombian contacts between the cultures of the Middle East and the New World, but there was one way to explain the similarities and the differences in a single theory. Suppose that the two versions of the legend had evolved separately for several thousands of years, but prior to that both had descended from the same remotely ancient ancestor?

Remnants

Here's what the Book of Genesis says about the 'tower that reached to heaven':

> Throughout the earth men spoke the same language, with the same vocabulary. Now as they moved eastwards they found a plain in the land of Shinar, where they settled. There they said to one another, 'Come, let us make bricks and bake them in the fire.' For stone they Used bricks and for mortar they used bitumen. 'Come,' they said, 'let us build ourselves a town and a tower with its top reaching heaven. Let us make a name for ourselves, so that we may not be scattered about the > entire earth.’

>
> Now Yahewh [the Hebrew God] came down to see the town and the tower that the sons of man had built. ‘So they are all a single people with a single language!’ said Yahweh. ‘This is but the start of their undertakings! There will be nothing too hard for them to do. Come, let us go down and confuse their language on the spot so that they can no longer understand one another.’
> Yahweh scattered them thence over the whole face of the earth, and they stopped building the tower. It was named Babel, therefore, because there Yahweh confused the language of the whole earth. It was from there that Yahweh scattered them over the whole face of the earth.[19]

The verse which most interested me suggested very clearly that the ancient builders of the Tower of Babel had set out to create a lasting monument to themselves so that their name would not be forgotten—even if their civilization and language were. Was it possible that the same considerations could have applied at Cholula?

Only a handful of monuments in Mexico were thought by archaeologists to be more than 2000 years old. Cholula was definitely one of them. Indeed no one could say for sure in what distant age its ramparts had first begun to be heaped up. For thousands of years before development and extension of the site began in earnest around 300 BC, it looked as though some other, older structure might have been positioned at the spot over which the great ziggurat of Quetzalcoatl now rose.

There was a precedent for this which further strengthened the intriguing possibility that the remnants of a truly ancient civilization might still be lying around in Central America waiting to be recognized. For example, just south of the university campus of Mexico City, off the main road connecting the capital to Cuernavaca, stands a circular step pyramid of great complexity (with four galleries and a central staircase). It was partially excavated in the 1920s from beneath a mantle of lava. Geologists were called to the site to help date the lava, and carried out a detailed examination. To everyone’s surprise, they concluded that the volcanic eruption which had completely buried three sides of this pyramid (and had then gone on to cover about sixty square miles of the surrounding territory) must have taken place at least seven thousand years ago.[20]

This geological evidence seems to have been ignored by historians and archaeologists, who do not believe that any civilization capable of building a pyramid could have existed in Mexico at such an early date. It is worth noting, however, that Byron Cummings, the American archaeologist who originally excavated the site for the National Geographical Society, was convinced by clearly demarcated stratification layers above and below the pyramid (laid down both before and after the volcanic eruption) that it was 'the oldest temple yet uncovered on the American continent'. He went further than the geologists and stated categorically that this temple 'fell into ruins some 8500 years ago'.[21]

Pyramids upon pyramids

Going inside the Cholula pyramid really did feel like entering a man-made mountain. The tunnels (and there were more than six miles of them) were not old: they had been left behind by the teams of archaeologists who had burrowed here diligently from 1931 until funds ran out in 1966. Somehow, these narrow, low-ceilinged corridors had borrowed an atmosphere of antiquity from the vast structure all around them. Moist and cool, they offered an inviting and secretive darkness.

Following a ribbon of torchlight we walked deeper inside the pyramid. The archaeological excavations had revealed that it was not the product of one dynasty (as was thought to have been the case with the pyramids at Giza in Egypt), but that it had been built up over a very long period of time—two thousand years or so, at a conservative estimate. In other words it was a collective project, created by an inter-generational labour force drawn from the many different cultures, Olmec, Teotihuacan, Toltec, Zapotec, Mixtec, Cholulan and Aztec, that had passed through Cholula since the dawn of civilization in Mexico.[22]

Though it was not known who had been the first builders here, as far as it had been possible to establish the earliest major edifice on the site consisted of a tall conical pyramid, shaped like an upturned bucket, flattened at the summit where a temple had stood. Much later a second, similar structure was imposed on top of this primordial mound, i.e. a second inverted bucket of clay, and compacted stone was placed directly over the first, raising the temple platform to more than 200 feet above the surrounding plain. Thereafter, during the next fifteen hundred years or so, an estimated four or five other cultures contributed to the final appearance of the monument. This they did by extending its base in several stages, but never again by increasing its maximum height. In this way, almost as though a master plan were being implemented, the man-made mountain of Cholula gradually attained its characteristic, four-tier ziggurat shape. Today, its sides at the base are each almost 1500 feet long—about twice the length of the sides of the Great Pyramid at Giza—and its total volume has been estimated at a staggering three million cubic metres.[23] This makes it, as one authority succinctly states, 'the largest building ever erected on earth.'[24]

Why?

Why go to all that trouble?

What sort of name for themselves were the peoples of Central America trying to make?

Walking through the network of corridors and passageways, inhaling the cool, loamy air, I was uncomfortably conscious of the great weight and mass of the pyramid pressing down upon me. It was the largest building in the world and it had been placed here in honour of a Central American deity of whom almost nothing was known.

We had the conquistadores and the Catholic Church to thank for leaving us so deeply in the dark about the true story of Quetzalcoatl and his followers. The smashing and desecration of his ancient temple at Cholula, the destruction of idols, altars and calendars, and the great bonfires made out of codices, paintings and hieroglyphic scrolls, had succeeded almost completely in silencing the voices of the past. But the legends did offer us one graphic and powerful piece of imagery: a memory of the 'gigantic men of deformed stature' who were said to have been the original builders.

Serpent Sanctuary

From Cholula we drove east, past the prosperous cities of Puebla, Orizaba and Cordoba, towards Veracruz and the Gulf of Mexico. We crossed the mist-enshrouded peaks of the Sierra Madre Oriental, where the air was thin and cold, and then descended towards sea level on to tropical plains overgrown with lush plantations of palms and bananas. We were heading into the heartlands of Mexico’s oldest and most mysterious civilization: that of the so-called Olmecs, whose name meant ‘rubber people’.

Dating back to the second millennium BC, the Olmecs had ceased to exist fifteen hundred years before the rise of the Aztec empire. The Aztecs, however, had preserved haunting traditions concerning them and were even responsible for naming them after the rubber-producing area of Mexico’s gulf coast where they were believed to have lived.[1] This area lies between modern Veracruz in the west and Ciudad del Carmen in the east. In it the Aztecs found a number of ancient ritual objects produced by the Olmecs and for reasons unknown they collected these objects and placed them in positions of importance in their own temples.[2]

Looking at my map, I could see the blue line of the Coatzecoalcos River running into the Gulf of Mexico more or less at the midpoint of the legendary Olmec homeland. The oil industry proliferates here now, where rubber trees once flourished, transforming a tropical paradise into something resembling the lowest circle of Dante’s Inferno. Since the oil boom of 1973 the town of Coatzecoalcos, once easy-going but not very prosperous, had mushroomed into a transport and refining centre with air-conditioned hotels and a population of half a million. It lay close to the black heart of an industrial wasteland in which virtually everything of archaeological interest that had escaped the depredations of the Spanish at the time of the conquest had been destroyed by the voracious expansion of the oil business. It was therefore no longer possible, on the basis of hard evidence, to confirm or deny the intriguing suggestion that the legends seemed to make: that something of great importance must once have occurred here.

The Olmec sites of Tres Zapotes, San Lorenzo and La Venta along the Gulf of Mexico, with other Central American archaeological sites.

I remembered that Coatzecoalcos meant ‘Serpent Sanctuary’. It was here, in remote antiquity, that Quetzalcoatl and his companions were said to have landed when they first reached Mexico, arriving from across the sea in vessels ‘with sides that shone like the scales of serpents’ skins’.[3] And it was from here too that Quetzalcoatl was believed to have sailed (on his raft of serpents) when he left Central America. Serpent Sanctuary, moreover, was beginning to look like the name for the Olmec homeland, which had included not only Coatzecoalcos but several other sites in areas less blighted by development.

First at Tres Zapotes, west of Coatzecoalcos, and then at San Lorenzo and La Venta, south and east of it, numerous pieces of characteristically Olmec sculpture had been unearthed. All were monoliths carved out of basalt and similarly durable materials. Some took the form of gigantic heads weighing up to thirty tons. Others were massive stelae engraved with encounter scenes apparently involving two distinct races of mankind, neither of them American-Indian.

Whoever had produced these outstanding works of art had obviously belonged to a refined, well organized, prosperous and technologically advanced civilization. The problem was that absolutely nothing remained, except the works of art, from which anything could be deduced about the character and origins of that civilization. All that seemed clear was that ‘the Olmecs’ (the archaeologists were happy to accept the Aztec designation) had materialized in Central America around 1500 BC with their sophisticated culture fully evolved.

Santiago Tuxtla

We passed the night at the fishing port of Alvarado and continued our journey east the next day. The road we were following wound in and out of fertile hills and valleys, giving us occasional views of the Gulf of Mexico before turning inland. We passed green meadows filled with flame trees, and little villages nestled in grassy hollows. Here and there we saw private gardens where hulking pigs grubbed amongst piles of domestic refuse. Then we crested the brow of a hill and looked out across a giant vista of fields and forests bound only by the morning haze and the faint outlines of distant mountains.

Some miles farther on we dropped into a hollow; at its bottom lay the old colonial town of Santiago Tuxtla. The place was a riot of colour: garish shop-fronts, red-tile roofs, yellow straw hats, coconut palms, banana trees, kids in bright clothes. Several of the shops and cafés were playing music from loudspeakers. In the Zocalo, the main square, the air was thick with humidity and the fluttering wings and songs of bright-eyed tropical birds. A leafy little park occupied the centre of this square, and in the centre of the park, like some magic talisman, stood an enormous grey boulder, almost ten feet tall, carved in the shape of a helmeted African head. Full-lipped and strong-nosed, its eyes serenely closed and its lower jaw resting squarely on the ground, this head had a sombre and patient gravity.

Here, then, was the first mystery of the Olmecs: a monumental piece of sculpture, more than 2000 years old, which portrayed a subject with unmistakable negroid features. There were, of course, no African blacks in the New World 2000 years ago, nor did any arrive until the slave trade began, well after the conquest. There is, however, firm palaeoanthropological evidence that one of the many different migrations into the Americas during the last Ice Age did consist of peoples of negroid stock. This migration occurred around 15,000 BC.[4]

Known as the ‘Cobata’ head after the estate on which it was found, the huge monolith in the Zocalo was the largest of sixteen similar Olmec sculptures so far excavated in Mexico. It was thought to have been carved not long before the time of Christ and weighed more than thirty tons.

Tres Zapotes

From Santiago Tuxtla we drove twenty-five kilometres south-west through wild and lush countryside to Tres Zapotes, a substantial late Olmec centre believed to have flourished between 500 BC and AD 100. Now reduced to a series of mounds scattered across maize fields, the site had been extensively excavated in 1939-40 by the American archaeologist Matthew Stirling.

Historical dogmatists of that period, I remembered, had held tenaciously to the view that the civilization of the Mayas was the oldest in Central America. One could be precise about this, they argued, because the Mayan dot-and-bar calendrical system (which had recently been decoded) made possible accurate dating of huge numbers of ceremonial inscriptions. The earliest date ever found on a Mayan site corresponded to AD 228 of the Christian calendar.[5] It therefore came as quite a jolt to the academic status quo when Stirling unearthed a stela at Tres Zapotes which bore an earlier date. Written in the familiar bar-and-dot calendrical code used by the Maya, it corresponded to 3 September 32 BC.[6]

What was shocking about this was that Tres Zapotes was not a Maya site—not in any way at all. It was entirely, exclusively, unambiguously Olmec. This suggested that the Olmecs, not the Maya, must have been the inventors of the calendar, and that the Olmecs, not the Maya, ought to be recognized as 'the mother culture' of Central America. Despite determined opposition from gangs of furious Mayanists the truth which Stirling's spade had unearthed at Tres Zapotes gradually came out. The Olmecs were much, much older than the Maya. They'd been a smart, civilized, technologically advanced people and they did, indeed, appear to have invented the bar-and-dot system of calendrical notation, with the enigmatic starting date of 13 August 3114 BC, which predicted the end of the world in AD 2012.

Lying close to the calendar stela at Tres Zapotes, Stirling also unearthed a giant head. I sat in front of that head now. Dated to around 100 BC,[7] it was approximately six feet high, 18 feet in circumference and weighed over 10 tons. Like its counterpart in Santiago Tuxtla, it was unmistakably the head of an African man wearing a close-fitting helmet with long chin-straps. The lobes of the ears were pierced by plugs; the pronounced negroid features were furrowed by deep frown lines on either side of the nose, and the entire face was concentrated forwards above thick, down-curving lips. The eyes were open and watchful, almond-shaped and cold. Beneath the curious helmet, the heavy brows appeared beetling and. angry.

Stirling was amazed by this discovery and reported,

> The head was a head only, carved from a single massive block of basalt, and it rested on a prepared foundation of unworked slabs of stone ... Cleared of the surrounding earth it presented an awe-inspiring spectacle. Despite its great size the workmanship is delicate and sure, the proportions perfect. Unique in character among aboriginal American sculptures, it is remarkable for its realistic treatment. The features are bold and amazingly negroid in character ...[8]

Soon afterwards the American archaeologist made a second unsettling discovery at Tres Zapotes: children's toys in the form of little wheeled dogs.[9] These cute artefacts conflicted head-on with prevailing archaeological opinion, which held that the wheel had remained undiscovered in Central America until the time of the conquest. The 'dogmobiles' proved, at the very least, that the principle of the wheel had been known to the Olmecs, Central America's earliest civilization. And if a people as resourceful as the Olmecs had worked out the principle of the wheel, it seemed highly unlikely that they would have used it just for children's toys.

The Olmec Enigma

After Tres Zapotes our next stop was San Lorenzo, an Olmec site lying south-west of Coatzecoalcos in the heart of the 'Serpent Sanctuary' the legends of Quetzalcoatl made reference to. It was at San Lorenzo that the earliest carbon-dates for an Olmec site (around 1500 BC) had been recorded by archaeologists.[1] However, Olmec culture appeared to have been fully evolved by that epoch and there was no evidence that the evolution had taken place in the vicinity of San Lorenzo.[2]

In this there lay a mystery.

The Olmecs, after all, had built a significant civilization which had carried out prodigious engineering works and had developed the capacity to carve and manipulate vast blocks of stone (several of the huge monolithic heads, weighing twenty tons or more, had been moved as far as 60 miles overland after being quarried in the Tuxtla mountains).[3] So where, if not at ancient San Lorenzo, had their technological expertise and sophisticated organization been experimented with, evolved and refined?

Strangely, despite the best efforts of archaeologists, not a single, solitary sign of anything that could be described as the 'developmental phase' of Olmec society had been unearthed anywhere in Mexico (or, for that matter, anywhere in the New World). These people, whose characteristic form of artistic expression was the carving of huge negroid heads, appeared to have come from nowhere.[4]

San Lorenzo

We reached San Lorenzo late in the afternoon. Here, at the dawn of history in Central America, the Olmecs had heaped up an artificial mound more than 100 feet high as part of an immense structure some 4000 feet in length and 2000 feet in width. We climbed the dominant mound, now heavily overgrown with thick tropical vegetation, and from the summit we could see for miles across the surrounding countryside. A great many lesser mounds were also visible and around about were several of the deep trenches the archaeologist Michael Coe had dug when he had excavated the site in 1966.

[4] 'Olmec stone sculpture achieved a high, naturalistic plasticity, yet it has no surviving prototypes, as if this powerful ability to represent both nature and abstract concepts was a native invention of this early civilization.' The Gods and Symbols of Ancient Mexico and the Maya, p. 15; The Ancient Kingdoms of Mexico, p. 55: 'The proto-Olmec phase remains an enigma ... it is not really known at what time, or in what place, Olmec culture took on its very distinctive form.'

Coe's team made a number of finds here, which included more than twenty artificial reservoirs, linked by a highly sophisticated network of basalt-lined troughs. Part of this system was built into a ridge; when it was rediscovered water still gushed forth from it during heavy rains, as it had done for more than 3000 years. The main line of the drainage ran from east to west. Into it, linked by joints made to an advanced design, three subsidiary lines were channelled.[5] After surveying the site thoroughly, the archaeologists admitted that they could not understand the purpose of this elaborate system of sluices and water-works.[6]

Nor were they able to come up with an explanation for another enigma. This was the deliberate burial, along specific alignments, of five of the massive pieces of sculpture, showing negroid features, now widely identified as 'Olmec heads'. These peculiar and apparently ritualistic graves also yielded more than sixty precious objects and artefacts, including beautiful instruments made of jade and exquisitely carved statuettes. Some of the statuettes had been systematically mutilated before burial.

The way the San Lorenzo sculptures had been interred made it extremely difficult to fix their true age, even though fragments of charcoal were found in the same strata as some of the buried objects. Unlike the sculptures, these charcoal pieces could be carbon-dated. They were, and produced readings in the range of 1200 BC.[7] This did not mean, however, that the sculptures had been carved in 1200 BC. They could have been. But they could have originated in a period hundreds or even thousands of years earlier than that. It was by no means impossible that these great works of art, with their intrinsic beauty and an indefinable numinous power, could have been preserved and venerated by many different cultures before being buried at San Lorenzo. The charcoal associated with them proved only that the sculptures were at least as old as 1200 BC; it did not set any upper limit on their antiquity.

La Venta

We left San Lorenzo as the sun was going down, heading for the city of Villahermosa, more than 150 kilometres to the east in the province of Tabasco. To get there we rejoined the main road running from Acayucan to Villahermosa and by-passed the port of Coatzecoalcos in a zone of oil refineries, towering pylons and ultra-modern suspension bridges. The change of pace between the sleepy rural backwater where San Lorenzo was located and the pockmarked industrial landscape around Coatzecoalcos was almost shocking. Moreover, the only reason that the timeworn outlines of the Olmec site could still be seen at San Lorenzo was that oil had not yet been found there.

It had, however, been found at La Venta—to the eternal loss of archaeology ...

We were now passing La Venta.

Due north, off a slip-road from the freeway, this sodium-lit petroleum city glowed in the dark like a vision of nuclear disaster. Since the 1940s it had been extensively ‘developed’ by the oil industry: an airstrip now bisected the site where a most unusual pyramid had once stood, and flaring smokestacks darkened the sky which Olmec star-gazers must once have searched for the rising of the planets. Lamentably, the bulldozers of the developers had flattened virtually everything of interest before proper excavations could be conducted, with the result that many of the ancient structures had not been explored at all.[8] We will never know what they could have said about the people who built and used them.

Matthew Stirling, who excavated Tres Zapotes, carried out the bulk of the archaeological work done at La Venta before progress and oil money erased it. Carbon-dating suggested that the Olmecs had established themselves here between 1500 and 1100 BC and had continued to occupy the site—which consisted of an island lying in marshes to the east of the Tonala river—until about 400 BC.[9] Then construction was suddenly abandoned, all existing buildings were ceremonially defaced or demolished, and several huge stone heads and other smaller pieces of sculpture were ritually buried in peculiar graves, just as had happened at San Lorenzo. The La Venta graves were elaborate and carefully prepared, lined with thousands of tiny blue tiles and filled up with layers of multicoloured clay.[10] At one spot some 15,000 cubic feet of earth had been dug out of the ground to make a deep pit; its floor had been carefully covered with serpentine blocks, and all the earth put back. Three mosaic pavements were also found, intentionally buried beneath several alternating layers of clay and adobe.[11]

La Venta’s principal pyramid stood at the southern end of the site. Roughly circular at ground level, it took the form of a fluted cone, the rounded sides consisting of ten vertical ridges with gullies between. The pyramid was 100 feet tall, almost 200 feet in diameter and had an overall mass in the region of 300,000 cubic feet—an impressive monument by any standards. The remainder of the site stretched for almost half a kilometre along an axis that pointed precisely 8° west of north. Centred on this axis, with every structure in flawless alignment, were several smaller pyramids and plazas, platforms and mounds, covering a total area of more than three square miles.

There was something detached and odd about La Venta, a sense that its original function had not been properly understood. Archaeologists referred to it as a ‘ceremonial centre’, and very probably that is what it was. If one were honest, however, one would admit that it could also have been several other things. The truth is that nothing is known about the social organization, ceremonies and belief systems of the Olmecs. We do not know what language they spoke, or what traditions they passed to their children. We don’t even know what ethnic group they belonged to. The exceptionally humid conditions of the Gulf of Mexico mean that not a single Olmec skeleton has survived.[12] In reality, despite the names we have given them and the views we’ve formed about them, these people are completely obscure to us.

It is even possible that the enigmatic sculptures ‘they’ left behind, which we presume depicted them, were not ‘their’ work at all, but the work of a far earlier and forgotten people. Not for the first time I found myself wondering whether some of the great heads other remarkable artefacts attributed to the Olmecs might not have been handed down like heirlooms, perhaps over many millennia, to the cultures which eventually began to build the mounds and pyramids at San Lorenzo and La Venta.

Reconstruction of La Venta. Note the unusual fluted-cone pyramid that dominates the site.

If so, then who are we speaking of when we use the label ‘Olmec’? The mound-builders? Or the powerful and imposing men with negroid features who provided the models for the monolithic heads?

Fortunately some fifty pieces of ‘Olmec’ monumental sculpture, including three of the giant heads, were rescued from La Venta by Carlos Pellicer Camara, a local poet and historian who intervened forcefully when he discovered that oil-drilling by the PEMEX company jeopardized the ruins. By determined lobbying of the politicians of Tabasco (within which La Venta lies), he arranged to have the significant finds moved to a park on the outskirts of the regional capital Villahermosa.

Taken together these finds constitute a precious and irreplaceable cultural record—or rather a whole library of cultural records—left behind by a vanished civilization. But nobody knows how to read the language of these records.

symbolism from Ancient Egypt, depicting the Akeru, lion gods of yesterday and today (Akeru was written in hieroglyphs as). The religions of both regions share many other common images and ideas. Also noteworthy is the fact that p'achi, the Central American word for 'human sacrifice', means, literally 'to open the mouth'—which calls to mind a strange Ancient Egyptian funerary ritual known as 'the opening of the mouth'. Likewise it was believed in both regions that the souls of dead kings were reborn as stars.

Deus ex machina

Villahermosa, Tabasco province

I was looking at an elaborate relief that had been dubbed 'Man in Serpent' by the archaeologists who found it at La Venta. According to expert opinion it showed 'an Olmec, wearing a head-dress and holding an incense bag, enveloped by a feathered serpent'.[13]

The relief was carved into a slab of solid granite measuring about four feet wide by five feet high and showed a man sitting with his legs stretched out in front of him as though he were reaching for pedals with his feet. He held a small, bucket-shaped object in his right hand. With his left he appeared to be raising or lowering a lever. The 'head-dress' he wore was an odd and complicated garment. To my eye it seemed more functional than ceremonial, although I could not imagine what its function might have been. On it, or perhaps on a console above it, were two x-shaped crosses.

I turned my attention to the other principal element of the sculpture, the ‘feathered serpent’. On one level it did, indeed, depict exactly that: a plumed or feathered serpent, the age-old symbol of Quetzalcoatl, whom the Olmecs, therefore, must have worshipped (or at the very least recognized). Scholars do not dispute this interpretation.[14] It is generally accepted that Quetzalcoatl’s cult was immensely ancient, originating in prehistoric times in Central America and thereafter receiving the devotion of many cultures during the historic period.

[13] The Cities of Ancient Mexico, p. 37.

The feathered serpent in this particular sculpture, however, had certain characteristics that set it apart. It seemed to be more than just a religious symbol; indeed, there was something rigid and structured about it that made it look almost like a piece of machinery.

Whispers of ancient secrets

Later that day I took shelter in the giant shadow cast by one of the Olmec heads Carlos Pellicer Camara had rescued from La Venta. It was the head of an old man with a broad flat nose and thick lips. The lips were slightly parted, exposing strong, square teeth. The expression on the face suggested an ancient, patient wisdom, and the eyes seemed to gaze unafraid into eternity, like those of the Great Sphinx at Giza in lower Egypt.

It would probably be impossible, I thought, for a sculptor to invent all the different combined characteristics of an authentic racial type. The portrayal of an authentic combination of racial characteristics therefore implied strongly that a human model had been used.

I walked around the great head a couple of times. It was 22 feet in circumference, weighed 19.8 tons, stood almost 8 feet high, had been carved out of solid basalt, and displayed clearly ‘an authentic combination of racial characteristics’. Indeed, like the other pieces I had seen at Santiago Tuxtla and at Tres Zapotes, it unmistakably and unambiguously showed a negro.

The reader can form his or her own opinion after examining the relevant photographs in this book. My own view is that the Olmec heads present us with physiologically accurate images of real individuals of negroid stock—charismatic and powerful African men whose presence in Central America 3000 years ago has not yet been explained by scholars. Nor is there any certainty that the heads were actually carved in that epoch. Carbon-dating of fragments of charcoal found in the same pits tells us only the age of the charcoal. Calculating the true antiquity of the heads themselves is a much more complex matter.

It was with such thoughts that I continued my slow walk among the strange and wonderful monuments of La Venta. They whispered of ancient secrets—the secret of the man in the machine ... the secret of the negro heads ... and, last but not least, the secret of a legend brought to life. For it seemed that flesh might indeed have been put on the mythical bones of Quetzalcoatl when I found that several of the La Venta sculptures contained realistic likenesses not only of negroes but of tall, thin-featured, long-nosed, apparently Caucasian men with straight hair and full beards, wearing flowing robes ...

Chapter 18

Conspicuous Strangers

Matthew Stirling, the American archaeologist who excavated La Venta in the 1940s, made a number of spectacular discoveries there. The most spectacular of all was the Stele of the Bearded Man.

The plan of the ancient Olmec site, as I have said, lay along an axis pointing 8° west of north. At the southern end of this axis, 100 feet tall, loomed the fluted cone of the great pyramid. Next to it, at ground level, was what looked like a curb about a foot high enclosing a spacious rectangular area one-quarter the size of an average city block. When the archaeologists began to uncover this curb they found, to their surprise, that it consisted of the upper parts of a wall of columns. Further excavation through the undisturbed layers of stratification that had accumulated revealed that the columns were ten feet tall. There were more than 600 of them and they had been set together so closely that they formed a near-impregnable stockade. Hewn out of solid basalt and transported to La Venta from quarries more than sixty miles distant, the columns weighed approximately two tons each.

Why all this trouble? What had the stockade been built to contain?

Even before excavation began, the tip of a massive chunk of rock had been visible jutting out of the ground in the centre of the enclosed area, about four feet higher than the illusory ‘curb’ and leaning steeply forward. It was covered with carvings. These extended down, out of sight, beneath the layers of soil that filled the ancient stockade to a height of about nine feet.

Stirling and his team worked for two days to free the great rock. When exposed it proved to be an imposing stele fourteen feet high, seven feet wide and almost three feet thick. The carvings showed an encounter between two tall men, both dressed in elaborate robes and wearing elegant shoes with turned-up toes. Either erosion or deliberate mutilation (quite commonly practised on Olmec monuments) had resulted in the complete defacement of one of the figures. The other was intact. It so obviously depicted a Caucasian male with a high-bridged nose and a long, flowing beard that the bemused archaeologists promptly christened it ‘Uncle Sam’.[1]

I walked slowly around the twenty-ton stele, remembering as I did so that it had lain buried in the earth for more than 3000 years. Only in the brief half century or so since Stirling’s excavations had it seen the light of day again. What would its fate be now? Would it stand here for another thirty centuries as an object of awe and splendour for future generations to gawp at and revere? Or, in such a great expanse of time, was it possible that circumstances might change so much that it would once again be buried and concealed?

[1] Fair Gods and Stone Faces, p. 144.

Perhaps neither would happen. I remembered the ancient calendrical system of Central America, which the Olmecs had initiated. According to them, and to their more famous successors the Mayas, there just weren't any great expanses of time left, let alone three millennia. The Fifth Sun was all used up and a tremendous earthquake was building to destroy humanity two days before Christmas in AD 2012.

I turned my attention back to the stele. Two things seemed to be clear: the encounter scene it portrayed must, for some reason, have been of immense importance to the Olmecs, hence the grandeur of the stele itself, and the construction of the remarkable stockade of columns built to contain it. And, as was the case with the negro heads, it was obvious that the face of the bearded Caucasian man could only have been sculpted from a human model. The racial verisimilitude was too good for an artist to have invented it.

The same went for two other Caucasian figures I was able to identify among the surviving monuments from La Venta. One was carved in low relief on a heavy and roughly circular slab of stone about three feet in diameter. Dressed in what looked like tight-fitting leggings, his features were those of an Anglo-Saxon. He had a full pointed beard and wore a curious floppy cap on his head. In his left hand he extended a flag, or perhaps a weapon of some kind. His right hand, which he held across the middle of his chest, appeared to be empty. Around his slim waist was tied a flamboyant sash. The other Caucasian figure, this time carved on the side of a narrow pillar, was similarly bearded and attired.

Who were these conspicuous strangers? What were they doing in Central America? When did they come? And what relationship did they have with those other strangers who had settled in this steamy rubber jungle—the ones who had provided the models for the great negro heads?

Some radical researchers, who rejected the dogma concerning the isolation of the New World prior to 1492, had proposed what looked like a viable solution to the problem: the bearded, thin-featured individuals could have been Phoenicians from the Mediterranean who had sailed through the Pillars of Hercules and across the Atlantic Ocean as early as the second millennium BC. Advocates of this theory went on to suggest that the negroes shown at the same sites were the 'slaves' of the Phoenicians, picked up on the coast of West Africa prior to the trans-Atlantic run.[2]

The more consideration I gave to the strange character of the La Venta sculptures, the more dissatisfied I became with these ideas. Probably the

[2] Ibid., p. 141-42.

Phoenicians and other Old World peoples had crossed the Atlantic ages before Columbus. There was compelling evidence for that, although it is outside the scope of this book.[3] The problem was that the Phoenicians, who had left unmistakable examples of their distinctive handiwork in many parts of the ancient world,[4] had not done so at the Olmec sites in Central America. Neither the negro heads, nor the reliefs portraying bearded Caucasian men showed any signs of anything remotely Phoenician in their style, handiwork or character.[5] Indeed, from a stylistic point of view, these powerful works of art seemed to belong to no known culture, tradition or genre. They seemed to be without antecedents either in the New World or in the Old.

They seemed rootless ... and that, of course, was impossible, because all forms of artistic expression have roots somewhere.

Hypothetical third party

It occurred to me that one plausible explanation might lie in a variant of the 'hypothetical third party' theory originally put forward by a number of leading Egyptologists to explain one of the great puzzles of Egyptian history and chronology.

The archaeological evidence suggested that rather than developing slowly and painfully, as is normal with human societies, the civilization of Ancient Egypt, like that of the Olmecs, emerged all at once and fully formed. Indeed, the period of transition from primitive to advanced society appears to have been so short that it makes no kind of historical sense. Technological skills that should have taken hundreds or even thousands of years to evolve were brought into use almost overnight—and with no apparent antecedents whatever.

For example, remains from the pre-dynastic period around 3500 BC show no trace of writing. Soon after that date, quite suddenly and inexplicably, the hieroglyphs familiar from so many of the ruins of Ancient Egypt begin to appear in a complete and perfect state. Far from being mere pictures of objects or actions, this written language was complex and structured at the outset, with signs that represented sounds only and a detailed system of numerical symbols. Even the very earliest hieroglyphs were stylized and conventionalized; and it is clear that an advanced cursive script was it common usage by the dawn of the First Dynasty.[6]

[6] W. B. Emery, Archaic Egypt, Penguin Books, London, 1987, p. 192.

What is remarkable is that there are no traces of evolution from simple to sophisticated, and the same is true of mathematics, medicine, astronomy and architecture and of Egypt's amazingly rich and convoluted religio-mythological system (even the central content of such refined works as the Book of the Dead existed right at the start of the dynastic period).[7]

The majority of Egyptologists will not consider the implications of Egypt's early sophistication. These implications are startling, according to a number of more daring thinkers. John Anthony West, an expert on the early dynastic period, asks:

> How does a complex civilization spring full-blown into being? Look at a 1905 automobile and compare it to a modern one. There is no mistaking the process of 'development'. But in Egypt there are no parallels. Everything is right there at the start.
> The answer to the mystery is of course obvious but, because it is repellent to the prevailing cast of modern thinking, it is seldom considered. Egyptian civilization was not a 'development', it was a legacy.[8]

West has been a thorn in the flesh of the Egyptological establishment for many years. But other more mainstream figures have also confessed puzzlement at the suddenness with which Egyptian civilization appeared. Walter Emery, late Edwards Professor of Egyptology at the University of London, summed up the problem:

> At a period approximately 3400 years before Christ, a great change took place in Egypt, and the country passed rapidly from a state of neolithic culture with a complex tribal character to one of well-organized monarchy ...
> At the same time the art of writing appears, monumental architecture and the arts and crafts develop to an astonishing degree, and all the evidence points to the existence of a luxurious civilization. All this was achieved within a comparatively short period of time, for there appears to be little or no background to these fundamental developments in writing and architecture.[9]

One explanation could simply be that Egypt received its sudden and decisive cultural boost from some other known civilization of the ancient world. Sumer, on the Lower Euphrates in Mesopotamia, is the most likely contender. Despite many basic differences, a variety of shared building techniques and architectural styles[10] does suggest a link between the two regions. But none of these similarities is strong enough to infer that the connection could have been in any way causal, with one society directly influencing the other. On the contrary, as Professor Emery writes:

> The impression we get is of an indirect connection, and perhaps the existence of a third party, whose influence spread to both the Euphrates and the Nile ... Modern > scholars have tended to ignore the possibility of immigration to both regions from some hypothetical and as yet undiscovered area. [However] a third party whose cultural achievements were passed on independently to Egypt and Mesopotamia would best explain the common features and fundamental differences between the two civilizations.[11]

Among other things, this theory sheds light on the mysterious fact that the Egyptians and Sumerian people of Mesopotamia appear to have worshipped virtually identical lunar deities who were among the oldest in their respective pantheons (Thoth in the case of the Egyptians, Sin in the case of the Sumerians).[12] According to the eminent Egyptologist Sir E.A. Wallis Budge, 'The similarity between the two gods is too close to be accidental ... It would be wrong to say that the Egyptians borrowed from the Sumerians or the Sumerians from the Egyptians, but it may be submitted that the literati of both peoples borrowed their theological systems from some common but exceedingly ancient source.'[13]

The question, therefore, is this: what was that 'common but exceedingly ancient source', that 'hypothetical and as yet undiscovered area', that advanced 'third party' to which both Budge and Emery refer? And if it left a legacy of high culture in Egypt and in Mesopotamia, why shouldn't it have done so in Central America?

It's not good enough to argue that civilization 'took off' much later in Mexico than it had in the Middle East. It is possible that the initial impulse could have been felt at the same time in both places but that the subsequent outcome could have been completely different.

On this scenario, the civilizers would have succeeded brilliantly in Egypt and in Sumer, creating lasting and remarkable cultures there. In Mexico, on the other hand (as also seems to have been the case in Peru), they suffered some serious setback—perhaps getting off to a good start, when the gigantic stone heads and reliefs of bearded men were made, but going rapidly downhill. The light of civilization would never quite have been lost, but perhaps things didn't pick up again until around 1500 BC, the so-called 'Olmec horizon'. By then the great sculptures would have been hoary with age, ancient relics of immense spiritual power, their all-but-forgotten origins wrapped in myths of giants and bearded civilizers.

If so, we may be gazing at faces from a much more remote past than we imagine when we stare into the almond eyes of one of the negro heads or into the angular, chiselled Caucasian features of 'Uncle Sam'. It is by no means impossible that these great works preserve the images of peoples from a vanished civilization which embraced several different ethnic groups.

That, in a nutshell, is the 'hypothetical third party' theory as applied to Central America: the civilization of Ancient Mexico did not emerge without external influence, and it did not emerge as a result of influence from the Old World; instead certain cultures in the Old World and in the New World may both have received a legacy of influence and ideas from a third party at some exceedingly remote date.

Villahermosa to Oaxaca

Before leaving Villahermosa I visited CICOM, the Centre for Investigation of the Cultures of the Olmecs and Maya. I wanted to find out from the scholars there whether there were any other significant Olmec sites in the region. To my surprise, they suggested that I should look farther afield. At Monte Alban, in Oaxaca province hundreds of kilometres to the southwest, archaeologists had apparently unearthed 'Olmecoid' artefacts and a number of reliefs thought to represent the Olmecs themselves.

Santha and I had intended to drive straight on from Villahermosa into the Yucatan Peninsula, which lay north-east. The journey to Monte Alban would involve a huge detour, but we decided to make it, in the hope that it might shed further light on the Olmecs. Besides, it promised to be a spectacular drive over immense mountains and into the heart of the hidden valley where the city of Oaxaca lies.

We drove almost due west past the lost site of La Venta, past Coatzecoalcos once again, and on past Sayula and Loma Bonita to the road-junction town of Tuxtepec. In so doing, by degrees we left behind countryside scarred and blackened by the oil industry, crossed long gentle hillsides carpeted in lush green grass, and ran between fields ripe with crops.

At Tuxtepec, where the sierras really began, we turned sharply south following Highway 175 to Oaxaca. On the map it looked barely half the distance that we had driven from Villahermosa. The road, however, proved to be a complicated, nerve-racking, muscle-wrenching, apparently endless zig-zag of hairpin bends—narrow, winding and precipitous—which went up into the clouds like a stairway to heaven. It took us through many different layers of alpine vegetation, each occupying a specialized climatological niche, until it brought us out above the clouds in a place where familiar plants flourished in giant forms, like John Wyndham's triffids, creating a surreal and alien landscape. It took twelve hours to drive the 700 kilometres from Villahermosa to Oaxaca. By the time the journey was over, my hands were blistered from gripping the steering-wheel too tight for too long around too many hairpin bends. My eyes were blurred and I kept having mental retrospectives of the vertiginous chasms we had skirted on Highway 175, in the mountains, where the triffids grew.

The city of Oaxaca is famous for magic mushrooms, marijuana and D.H. Lawrence (who wrote and set part of his novel The Plumed Serpent here in the 1920s). There is still a bohemian feel about the place and until late at night a current of excitement seems to ripple among the crowds filling its bars and cafés, narrow cobbled streets, old buildings and spacious plazas.

We checked into a room overlooking one of the three open courtyards in the Hotel Las Golondrinas. The bed was comfortable. There were starry skies overhead. But, tired as I was, I couldn't sleep.

What kept me awake was the idea of the civilizers ... the bearded gods and their companions. In Mexico, as in Peru, they seemed to have confronted failure. That was what the legends implied, and not only the legends, as I discovered when we reached Monte Alban the next morning.

Chapter 19

Adventures in the Underworld, Journeys to the Stars

The ‘hypothetical third party’ theory explains the similarities and fundamental differences between Ancient Egypt and Ancient Mesopotamia by proposing that both received a common legacy of civilization from the same remote ancestor. No serious suggestions have been made as to where that ancestral civilization might have been located, its nature, or when it flourished. Like a black hole in space, it cannot be seen. Yet its presence can be deduced from its effects on things that can be seen—in this case the civilizations of Sumer and Egypt.

Is it possible that the same mysterious ancestor, the same invisible source of influence, could also have left its mark in Mexico? If so, we would expect to find certain cultural similarities between Mexico’s ancient civilizations and those of Sumer and Egypt. We would also expect to be confronted by immense differences resulting from the long period of divergent evolution which separated all these areas in historical times. We would, however, expect the differences to be less between Sumer and Egypt, which were in regular contact with each other during the historical period, than between the two Middle Eastern cultures and the cultures of far-off Central America, which enjoyed at most only haphazard, slight and intermittent contacts prior to the ‘discovery’ of the New World by Columbus in AD 1492.

Eaters of the dead, earth monsters, star kings, dwarves and other relatives

For some curious reason that has not been explained, the Ancient Egyptians had a special liking and reverence for dwarves.[1] So, too, did the civilized peoples of ancient Central America, right back to Olmec times.[2] In both cases it was believed that dwarves were directly connected to the gods.[3] And in both cases dwarves were favoured as dancers and were shown as such in works of art.[4]

In Egypt’s early dynastic period, more than 4500 years ago, an ‘Ennead’ of nine omnipotent deities was particularly adored by the priesthood at Heliopolis.[5] Likewise, in Central America, both the Aztecs and the Mayas believed in an all-powerful system of nine deities.[6]

The Popol Vuh, the sacred book of the ancient Quiche Maya of Mexico and Guatemala, contains several passages which clearly indicate a belief in 'stellar rebirth'—the reincarnation of the dead as stars. After they had been killed, for example, the Hero Twins named Hunahpu and Xbalanque 'rose up in the midst of the light, and instantly they were lifted into the sky ... Then the arch of heaven and the face of the earth were lighted. And they dwelt in heaven.'[7] At the same time ascended the Twins' 400 companions who had also been killed, 'and so they again became the companions of Hunahpu and Xbalanque and were changed into stars in the sky.'[8]

The majority of the traditions of the God-King Quetzalcoatl, as we have seen, focus on his deeds and teachings as a civilizer. His followers in ancient Mexico, however, also believed that his human manifestation had experienced death and that afterwards he was reborn as a star.[9]

It is therefore curious, at the very least, to discover that in Egypt, in the Pyramid Age, more than 4000 years ago, the state religion revolved around the belief that the deceased pharaoh was reborn as a star.[10] Ritual incantantations were chanted, the purpose of which was to facilitate the dead monarch's rapid rebirth in the heavens: 'Oh king, you are this Great Star, the Companion of Orion, who traverses the sky with Orion ... you ascend from the east of the sky, being renewed in your due season, and rejuvenated in your due time ...'[11] We have encountered the Orion constellation before, on the plains of Nazca, and we shall encounter it again ...

Meanwhile, let us consider the Ancient Egyptian Book of the Dead. Parts of its contents are as old as the civilization of Egypt itself and it serves as a sort of Baedeker for the transmigration of the soul. It instructs the deceased on how to overcome the dangers of the afterlife, enables him to assume the form of several mythical creatures, and equips him with the passwords necessary for admission to the various stages, or levels, of the underworld.[12]

Is it a coincidence that the peoples of Ancient Central America preserved a parallel vision of the perils of the afterlife? There it was widely believed that the underworld consisted of nine strata through which the deceased would journey for four years, overcoming obstacles and dangers on the way.[13] The strata had self-explanatory names like 'place where the mountains crash together', 'place where the arrows are fired', 'mountain of knives', and so on. In both Ancient Central America and Ancient Egypt, it was believed that the deceased's voyage through the underworld was made in a boat, accompanied by 'paddler gods' who ferried him from stage to stage.[14] The tomb of 'Double Comb', an eighth-century ruler of the Mayan city of Tikal, was found to contain a representation of this scene.[15] Similar images appear throughout the Valley of the Kings in Upper Egypt, notably in the tomb of Thutmosis III, an Eighteenth Dynasty pharaoh.[16] Is it a coincidence that the passengers in the barque of the dead pharaoh, and in the canoe in which Double Comb makes his final journey, include (in both cases) a dog or dog-headed deity, a bird or bird-headed deity, and an ape or ape-headed deity?[17]

The seventh stratum of the Ancient Mexican underworld was called Teocoyolcualloya: 'place where beasts devour hearts'.[18]

Is it a coincidence that one of the stages of the Ancient Egyptian underworld, 'the Hall of Judgement', involved an almost identical series of symbols? At this crucial juncture the deceased's heart was weighed against a feather. If the heart was heavy with sin it would tip the balance. The god Thoth would note the judgement on his palette and the heart would immediately be devoured by a fearsome beast, part crocodile, part hippopotamus, part lion, that was called 'the Eater of the Dead'.[19]

Finally, let us turn again to Egypt of the Pyramid Age and the privileged status of the pharaoh, which enabled him to circumvent the trials of the underworld and to be reborn as a star. Ritual incantations were part of the process. Equally important was a mysterious ceremony known as 'the opening of the mouth', always conducted after the death of the pharaoh and believed by archaeologists to date back to pre-dynastic times.[20] The high priest and four assistants participated, wielding the peshenkhef, a ceremonial cutting instrument. This was used 'to open the mouth' of the deceased God-King, an action thought necessary to ensure his resurrection in the heavens. Surviving reliefs and vignettes showing this ceremony leave no doubt that the mummified corpse was struck a hard physical blow with the peshenkhef.[21] In addition, evidence has recently emerged which indicates that one of the chambers within the Great Pyramid at Giza may have served as the location for the ceremony.[22]

[19] The Egyptian Book of the Dead (trans. E. A. Wallis Budge), Arkana, London and New York, 1986, p. 21.

All this finds a strange, distorted twin in Mexico. We have seen the prevalence of human sacrifice there in pre-conquest times. Is it coincidental that the sacrificial venue was a pyramid, that the ceremony was conducted by a high priest and four assistants, that a cutting instrument, the sacrificial knife, was used to strike a hard physical blow to the body of the victim, and that the victim's soul was believed to ascend directly to the heavens, sidestepping the perils of the underworld?[23]

As such 'coincidences' continue to multiply, it is reasonable to wonder whether there may not be some underlying connection. This is certainly the case when we learn that the general term for 'sacrifice' throughout Ancient Central America was p'achi, meaning 'to open the mouth'.[24]

Could it be, therefore, that what confronts us here, in widely separated geographical areas, and at different periods of history, is not just a series of startling coincidences but some faint and garbled common memory originating in the most distant antiquity? It doesn't seem that the Egyptian ceremony of the opening of the mouth influenced directly the Mexican ceremony of the same name (or vice versa, for that matter). The fundamental differences between the two cases rule that out. What does seem possible, however, is that their similarities may be the remnants of a shared legacy received from a common ancestor. The peoples of Central America did one thing with that legacy and the Egyptians another, but some common symbolism and nomenclature was retained by both.

This is not the place to expand on the sense of an ancient and elusive connectedness that emerges from the Egyptian and Central American evidence. Before moving on, however, it is worth noting that a similar 'connectedness' links the belief systems of pre-Colombian Mexico with those of Sumer in Mesopotamia. Again the evidence is more suggestive of an ancient common ancestor than of any direct influence.

Take the case of Oannes, for example.

'Oannes' is the Greek rendering of the Sumerian Uan, the name of the amphibious being, described in Part II, believed to have brought the arts and skills of civilization to Mesopotamia.[25] Legends dating back at least 5000 years relate that Uan lived under the sea, emerging from the waters of the Persian Gulf every morning to civilize and tutor mankind.[26] Is it a coincidence that uaana, in the Mayan language, means 'he who has his residence in water'?[27]

Let us also consider Tiamat, the Sumerian goddess of the oceans and of the forces of primitive chaos, always shown as a ravening monster. In Mesopotamian tradition, Tiamat turned against the other deities and unleashed a holocaust of destruction before she was eventually destroyed by the celestial hero Marduk:

> She opened her mouth, Tiamat, to swallow him.
> He drove in the evil wind so that she could not close her lips.
> The terrible winds filled her belly. Her heart was seized,
> She held her mouth wide open,
> He let fly an arrow, it pierced her belly,
> Her inner parts he clove, he split her heart,
> He rendered her powerless and destroyed her life,
> He felled her body and stood upright on it.[28]

How do you follow an act like that?

Marduk could. Contemplating his adversary's monstrous corpse, 'he conceived works of art',[29] and a great plan of world creation began to take shape in his mind. His first move was to split Tiamat's skull and cut her arteries. Then he broke her into two parts 'like a dried fish', using one half to roof the heavens and the other to surface the earth. From her breasts he made mountains, from her spittle, clouds, and he directed the rivers Tigris and Euphrates to flow from her eyes.[30]

A strange and violent legend, and a very old one.

The ancient civilizations of Central America had their own version of this story. Here Quetzalcoatl, in his incarnation as the creator deity, took the role of Marduk while the part of Tiamat was played by Cipactli, the 'Great Earth Monster'. Quetzalcoatl seized Cipactli's limbs 'as she swam in the primeval waters and wrenched her body in half, one part forming the sky and the other the earth'. From her hair and skin he created grass, flowers and herbs; 'from her eyes, wells and springs; from her shoulders, mountains'.[31]

Are the peculiar parallels between the Sumerian and Mexican myths pure coincidence or could both have been marked by the cultural fingerprints of a lost civilization? If so, the faces of the heroes of that ancestral culture may indeed have been carved in stone and passed down as heirlooms through thousands of years, sometimes in full view, sometimes buried, until they were dug up for the last time by archaeologists in our era and given labels like 'Olmec Head' and 'Uncle Sam'.

The faces of those heroes also appear at Monte Alban, where they seem to tell a sad story.

Monte Alban: the downfall of masterful men

A site thought to be about 3000 years old,[32] Monte Alban stands on a vast artificially flattened hilltop overlooking Oaxaca. It consists of a huge rectangular area, the Grand Plaza, which is enclosed by groups of pyramids and other buildings laid out in precise geometrical relationships to one another. The overall feel of the place is one of harmony and proportion emerging from a well-ordered and symmetrical plan.

Following the advice of CICOM, whom I had spoken to before leaving Villahermosa, I made my way first to the extreme south-west corner of the Monte Alban site. There, stacked loosely against the side of a low pyramid, were the objects I had come all this way to see: several dozen engraved stelae depicting negroes and Caucasians ... equal in life ... equal in death.

If a great civilization had indeed been lost to history, and if these sculptures told part of its story, the message conveyed was one of racial equality. No one who has seen the pride, or felt the charisma, of the great negro heads from La Venta could seriously imagine that the original subjects of these magisterial sculptures could have been slaves. Neither did the lean-faced, bearded men look as if they would have bent their knees to anyone. They, too, had an aristocratic demeanour.

At Monte Alban, however, there seemed to be carved in stone a record of the downfall of these masterful men. It did not look as if this could have been the work of the same people who made the La Venta sculptures. The standard of craftsmanship was far too low for that. But what was certain—whoever they were, and however inferior their work—was that these artists had attempted to portray the same negroid subjects and the same goatee-bearded Caucasians as I had seen at La Venta. There the sculptures had reflected strength, power and vitality. Here at Monte Alban the remarkable strangers were corpses. All were naked, most were castrated, some were curled up in foetal positions as though to avoid showers of blows, others lay sprawled slackly.

Archaeologists said the sculptures showed ‘the corpses of prisoners captured in battle’.[33]

What prisoners? From where?

The location, after all, was Central America, the New World, thousands of years before Columbus, so wasn’t it odd that these images of battlefield casualties showed not a single native American but only and exclusively Old World racial types?

For some reason, orthodox academics did not find this puzzling, even though, by their reckoning, the carvings were extremely old (dating to somewhere between 1000 and 600 BC[34]). As at other sites, this time-frame had been derived from tests on associated organic matter, not on the carvings themselves, which were incised on granite stele and therefore hard to date objectively.

Legacy

An as yet undeciphered but fully elaborated hieroglyphic script had been found at Monte Alban,[35] much of it carved on to the same stele as the crude Caucasian and negro figures. Experts accepted that it was ‘the earliest-known writing in Mexico'.[36] It was also clear that the people who had lived here had been accomplished builders and more than usually preoccupied with astronomy. An observatory, consisting of a strange arrowhead-shaped structure, lay at an angle of 45° to the main axis (which was deliberately tilted several degrees from north-south).[37] Crawling into this observatory, I found it to be a warren of tiny, narrow tunnels and steep internal stairways, giving sightlines to different regions of the sky.[38]

The people of Monte Alban, like the people of Tres Zapotes, left definite evidence of their knowledge of mathematics, in the form of bar-and-dot computations.[39] They had also used the remarkable calendar,[40] introduced by the Olmecs and much associated with the later Maya,[41] which predicted the end of the world on 23 December AD 2012.

If the calendar, and the preoccupation with time, had been part of the legacy of an ancient and forgotten civilization, the Maya must be ranked as the most faithful and inspired inheritors of that legacy. 'Time' as the archaeologist Eric Thompson put it in 1950, 'was the supreme mystery of Maya religion, a subject which pervaded Maya thought to an extent without parallel in the history of mankind.'[42]

As I continued my journey through Central America I felt myself drawn ever more deeply into the labyrinths of that strange and awesome riddle.

Chapter 20

Children of the First Men

Palenque, Chiapas Province

Evening was settling in. I sat just beneath the north-east corner of the Mayan Temple of the Inscriptions and gazed north over the darkening jungle where the land dropped away towards the flood plain of the Usumacinta.

The Temple consisted of three chambers and rested on top of a nine-stage pyramid almost 100 feet tall. The clean and harmonious lines of this structure gave it a sense of delicacy, but not of weakness. It felt strong, rooted into the earth, enduring—a creature of pure geometry and imagination.

Looking to my right I could see the Palace, a spacious rectangular complex on a pyramidal base, dominated by a narrow, four-storied tower, thought to have been used as an observatory by Maya priests.

Around about me, where bright-feathered parrots and macaws skimmed the treetops, a number of other spectacular buildings lay half swallowed by the encroaching forest. These were the Temple of the Foliated Cross, the Temple of the Sun, the Temple of the Count, and the Temple of the Lion—all names made up by archaeologists. So much of what the Maya had stood for, cared about, believed in and remembered from earlier times was irretrievably lost. Though we'd long ago learned to read their dates, we were only just beginning to make headway with the deciphering of their intricate hieroglyphs.

I stood and climbed the last few steps into the central chamber of the Temple. Set into the rear wall were two great grey slabs, and inscribed on them, in regimented rows like pieces on a chequerboard, were 620 separate Mayan glyphs. These took the form of faces, monstrous and human, together with a writhing bestiary of mythical creatures.

Palenque.

What was being said here? No one knew for sure because the inscriptions, a mixture of word pictures and phonetic symbols, had not yet been fully decoded. It was evident, however, that a number of the glyphs referred to epochs thousands of years in the past, and spoke of people and gods who had played their parts in prehistoric events.[1]

Pacal's tomb

To the left of the hieroglyphs, let into the huge flagstones of the temple floor, was a steep descending internal stairway. This led to a room buried deep in the bowels of the pyramid, where the tomb of Lord Pacal lay. The stairs, of highly polished limestone blocks, were narrow and surprisingly slippery and moist. Adopting a crabbed, sideways stance, I switched on my torch and stepped gingerly down into the gloom, steadying myself against the southern wall as I did so.

This damp stairway had been a secret place from the date when it was originally sealed, in AD 683, until June 1952 when the Mexican archaeologist Alberto Ruz lifted the flagstones in the temple floor. Although a second such tomb was found at Palenque in 1994,[2] Ruz had the honour of being the first man to discover such a feature inside a New World pyramid. The stairway had been intentionally filled with rubble by its builders, and it took four more years before the archaeologists cleared it out completely and reached the bottom.

When they had done so they entered a narrow corbel-vaulted chamber. Spread out on the floor in front of them were the mouldering skeletons of five or possibly six young victims of sacrifice. A huge triangular slab of stone was visible at the far end of the chamber. When it was removed, Ruz was confronted by a remarkable tomb. He described it as ‘an enormous room that appeared to be graven in ice, a kind of grotto whose walls and roof seemed to have been planed in perfect surfaces, or an abandoned chapel whose cupola was draped with curtains of stalactites, and from whose floor arose thick stalagmites like the dripping of a candle.’[3]

The room, also roofed with a corbel vault, was 30 feet long and 23 feet high. Around the walls, in stucco relief, could be seen the striding figures of the Lords of the Night—the ‘Ennead’ of nine deities who ruled over the hours of darkness. Centre-stage, and overlooked by these figures, was a huge monolithic sarcophagus lidded with a five-ton slab of richly carved stone. Inside the sarcophagus was a tall skeleton draped with a treasure trove of jade ornaments. A mosaic death mask of 200 fragments of jade was affixed to the front of the skull. These, supposedly, were the remains of Pacal, a ruler of Palenque in the seventh century AD. The inscriptions stated that this monarch had been eighty years old at the time of his death, but the jade-draped skeleton the archaeologists found in the sarcophagus appeared to belong to a man half that age.[4]

Having reached the bottom of the stairway, some eighty-five feet below the floor of the temple, I crossed the chamber where the sacrificial victims had lain and gazed directly into Pacal’s tomb. The air was dank, full of mildew and damp-rot, and surprisingly cold. The sarcophagus, set into the floor of the tomb, had a curious shape, flared strikingly at the feet like an Ancient Egyptian mummy case. These were made of wood and were equipped with wide bases since they were frequently stood upright. But Pacal’s coffin was made of solid stone and was uncompromisingly horizontal. Why, then, had the Mayan artificers gone to so much trouble to widen its base when they must have known that it served no useful purpose? Could they have been slavishly copying a design-feature from some ancient model long after the raison d’être for the design had been forgotten?[5] Like the beliefs concerning the perils of the afterlife, might Pacal’s sarcophagus not be an expression of a common legacy linking Ancient Egypt with the ancient cultures of Central America?

Rectangular in shape, the heavy stone lid of the sarcophagus was ten inches thick, three feet wide and twelve and a half feet long. It, too, seemed to have been modelled on the same original as the magnificent engraved blocks the Ancient Egyptians had used for this exact purpose.

[5] Fair Gods and Stone Faces, pp. 94-5.

Indeed, it would not have looked out of place in the Valley of the Kings. But there was one major difference. The scene carved on top of the sarcophagus lid was unlike anything that ever came out of Egypt. Lit in my torch beam, it showed a clean-shaven man dressed in what looked like a tight-fitting body-suit, the sleeves and leggings of which were gathered into elaborate cuffs at the wrists and ankles. The man lay semi-reclined in a bucket seat which supported his lower back and thighs, the nape of his neck resting comfortably against some kind of headrest, and he was peering forward intently. His hands seemed to be in motion, as though they were operating levers and controls, and his feet were bare, tucked up loosely in front of him.

Was this supposed to be Pacal, the Maya king?

If so, why was he shown operating some kind of machine? The Maya weren't supposed to have had machines. They weren't even supposed to have discovered the wheel. Yet with its side panels, rivets, tubes and other gadgets, the structure Pacal reclined in resembled a technological device much more strongly than it did 'the transition of one man's living soul to the realms of the dead',[6] as one authority claimed, or the king 'falling back into the fleshless jaws of the earth monster',[7] as another argued.

I remembered 'Man in Snake', the Olmec relief described in Chapter Seventeen. It, too, had looked like a naïve depiction of a piece of technology. Furthermore, 'Man in Snake' had come from La Venta, where it had been associated with several bearded figures, apparently Caucasians. Pacal's tomb was at least a thousand years younger than any of the La Venta treasures. Nevertheless, a tiny jade statuette was found lying close to the skeleton inside the sarcophagus, and it appeared to be much older than the other grave-goods also placed there. It depicted an elderly Caucasian, dressed in long robes, with a goatee beard.[8]

Pyramid of the Magician

Uxmal, Yucatan

On a stormy afternoon, 700 kilometres north of Palenque, I began to climb the steps of yet another pyramid. It was a steep building, oval rather than square in plan, 240 feet long at the base and 120 feet wide. It was, moreover, very high, rising 120 feet above the surrounding plain.

Since time out of mind this edifice, which did look like the castle of a necromancer, had been known as the 'Pyramid of the Magician' and also as the 'House of the Dwarf'. These names were derived from a Maya legend which asserted that a dwarf with supernatural powers had raised the entire building in just one night.[9]

---

[6] The Atlas of Mysterious Places, p. 70.

[7] Time Among the Maya, p. 298.

[8] Fair Gods and Stone Faces, pp. 95-6.

The steps, as I climbed them, seemed more and more perversely narrow. My instinct was to lean forward, flatten myself against the side of the pyramid, and cling on for dear life. Instead I looked up at the angry, overcast sky above me. Flocks of birds circled, screeching wildly as though seeking refuge from some impending disaster, and the thick mass of low-lying cloud that had blotted out the sun a few hours earlier was now so agitated by high winds that it seemed to boil.

The Pyramid of the Magician was by no means unique in being associated with the supernatural powers of dwarves, whose architectural and masonry skills were widely renowned in Central America. ‘Construction work was easy for them,’ asserted one typical Maya legend, ‘all they had to do was whistle and heavy rocks would move into place.’[10]

A very similar tradition, as the reader may recall, claimed that the gigantic stone blocks of the mysterious Andean city of Tiahuanaco had been ‘carried through the air to the sound of a trumpet’.[11]

In both Central America and in the far-off regions of the Andes, therefore, strange sounds had been associated with the miraculous levitation of massive rocks.

What was I to make of this? Maybe, through some fluke, two almost identical ‘fantasies’ could have been independently invented in both these geographically remote areas. But that didn’t seem very likely. Equally worthy of consideration was the possibility that common recollections of an ancient building technology could have been preserved in stories such as these, a technology capable of lifting huge blocks of stone off the ground with ‘miraculous’ ease. Could it be relevant that memories of almost identical miracles were preserved in Ancient Egypt? There, in one typical tradition, a magician was said to have raised into the air ‘a huge vault of stone 200 cubits long and 50 cubits broad’?[12]

Great Pyramid

Uxmal.

The sides of the stairway I was climbing were richly decorated with what the nineteenth-century American explorer John Lloyd Stephens described as 'a species of sculptured mosaic'.[13] Oddly, although the Pyramid of the Magician had been built long centuries before the Conquest, the symbol most frequently featured in these mosaics was a close approximation of the Christian cross. Indeed there were two distinct kinds of 'Christian' crosses: one the wide-pawed croix-patte favoured by the Knights Templar and other crusading orders in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; the other the x-shaped Saint Andrew's cross.

After climbing a further shorter flight of steps I reached the temple at the very top of the Magician's pyramid. It consisted of a single corbel-vaulted chamber from the ceiling of which large numbers of bats hung suspended. Like the birds and the clouds, they were visibly distressed by the sense of a huge storm brewing. In a furry mass they shuffled restlessly upside down, folding and unfolding their small leathery wings.

I took a rest on the high platform that surrounded the chamber. From here, looking down, I could see many more crosses. They were everywhere, literally all over this bizarre and ancient structure. I remembered the Andean city of Tiahuanaco and the crosses that had been carved there, in distant pre-Colombian times, on some of the great blocks of stone lying scattered around the building known as Puma Punku.[14] 'Man in Snake', the Olmec sculpture from La Venta, had also been engraved with two Saint Andrew's crosses long before the birth of Christ. And now, here at the Pyramid of the Magician in the Mayan site of Uxmal, I was confronted by crosses yet again.

Bearded men ...

Serpents ...

Crosses ...

How likely was it to be an accident that symbols as distinctive as these should repeat themselves in widely separated cultures and at different periods of history? Why were they so often built into the fabric of sophisticated works of art and architecture?

A science of prophecy

Not for the first time I suspected that I might be looking at signs and icons left behind by some cult or secret society which had sought to keep the light of civilization burning in Central America (and perhaps elsewhere) through long ages of darkness. I thought it notable that the motifs of the bearded man, the Plumed Serpent, and the cross all tended to crop up whenever and wherever there were hints that a technologically advanced and as yet unidentified civilization might once have been in contact with the native cultures. And there was a sense of great age about this contact, as though it took place at such an early date that it had been almost forgotten. I thought again about the sudden way the Olmecs had emerged, around the middle of the second millennium BC, out of the swirling mists of opaque prehistory. All the archaeological evidence indicated that from the beginning they had venerated huge stone heads and stele showing bearded men. I found myself increasingly drawn to the possibility that some of those remarkable pieces of sculpture could have been part of a vast inheritance of civilization handed down to the peoples of Central America many thousands of years before the second millennium BC, and thereafter entrusted to the safekeeping of a secret wisdom cult, perhaps the cult of Quetzalcoatl.

Much had been lost. Nevertheless the tribes of this region—in particular the Maya, the builders of Palenque and Uxmal—had preserved something even more mysterious and wonderful than the enigmatic monoliths, something which declared itself even more persistently to be the legacy of an older and a higher civilization. We see in the next chapter that it was the mystical science of an ancient star-gazing folk, a science of time and measurement and prediction—a science of prophecy even—that the Maya had preserved most perfectly from the past. With it they inherited memories of a terrible, earth-destroying flood and an idiosyncratic legacy of empirical knowledge, knowledge of a high order which they shouldn't really have possessed, knowledge that we have only reacquired very recently ...

A Computer for Calculating the End of the World

The Maya knew where their advanced learning originated. It was handed down to them, they said, from the First Men, the creatures of Quetzalcoatl, whose names had been Balam-Quitze (Jaguar with the Sweet Smile), Balam-Acab (Jaguar of the Night), Mahucutah (The Distinguished Name) and Iqui-Balam (Jaguar of the Moon).[1] According to the Popol Vuh, these forefathers:

> were endowed with intelligence; they saw and instantly they could see far; they succeeded in seeing; they succeeded in knowing all that there is in the world. The things hidden in the distance they saw without first having to move ... Great was their wisdom; their sight reached to the forests, the rocks, the lakes, the seas, the mountains, and the valleys. In truth, they were admirable men ... They were able to know all, and they examined the four corners, the four points of the arch of the sky, and the round face of the earth.[2]

The achievements of this race aroused the envy of several of the most powerful deities. 'It is not well that our creatures should know all,' opined these gods, 'Must they perchance be the equals of ourselves, their Makers, who can see afar, who know all and see all? ... Must they also be gods?'[3]

Obviously such a state of affairs could not be allowed to continue. After some deliberation an order was given and appropriate action taken:

> Let their sight reach only to that which is near; let them see only a little of the face of the earth ... Then the Heart of Heaven blew mist into their eyes which clouded their sight as when a mirror is breathed upon. Their eyes were covered and they could only see what was close, only that was clear to them ... In this way the wisdom and all the knowledge of the First Men were destroyed.[4]

Anyone familiar with the Old Testament will remember that the reason for the expulsion of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden had to do with similar divine concerns. After the First Man had eaten of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil,

> The Lord God said, 'Behold, the man has become as one of us, to know good and evil. Now, lest he put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life and eat and live for ever, [let us] send him forth from the Garden of Eden ...'[5]

The Popol Vuh is accepted by scholars as a great reservoir of uncontaminated, pre-Colombian tradition.[6] It is therefore puzzling to find such similarities between these traditions and those recorded in the Genesis story. Moreover, like so many of the other Old World/New World links we have identified, the character of the similarities is not suggestive of any kind of direct influence of one region on the other but of two different interpretations of the same set of events. Thus, for example:

[2] Ibid., pp. 168-9.

[3] Ibid., p. 169.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Genesis, 4:22-4

- The biblical Garden of Eden looks like a metaphor for the state of blissful, almost 'godlike', knowledge that the 'First Men' of the Popol Vuh enjoyed.
- The essence of this knowledge was the ability to 'see all' and to 'know all'. Was this not precisely the ability Adam and Eve acquired after eating the forbidden fruit, which grew on the branches of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil'?
- Finally, just as Adam and Eve were driven out of the Garden, so were the four First Men of the Popol Vuh deprived of their ability to 'see far'. Thereafter 'their eyes were covered and they could only see what was close ...'

Both the Popol Vuh and Genesis therefore tell the story of mankind's fall from grace. In both cases, this state of grace was closely associated with knowledge, and the reader is left in no doubt that the knowledge in question was so remarkable that it conferred godlike powers on those who possessed it.

The Bible, adopting a dark and muttering tone of voice, calls it 'the knowledge of good and evil' and has nothing further to add. The Popol Vuh is much more informative. It tells us that the knowledge of the First Men consisted of the ability to see 'things hidden in the distance', that they were astronomers who 'examined the four corners, the four points of the arch of the sky', and that they were geographers who succeeded in measuring 'the round face of the earth'.[7]

Geography is about maps. In Part I we saw evidence suggesting that the cartographers of an as yet unidentified civilization might have mapped the planet with great thoroughness at an early date. Could the Popol Vuh be transmitting some garbled memory of that same civilization when it speaks nostalgically of the First Men and of the miraculous geographical knowledge they possessed?

Geography is about maps, and astronomy is about stars. Very often the two disciplines go hand in hand because stars are essential for navigation on long sea-going voyages of discovery (and long sea-going voyages of discovery are essential for the production of accurate maps).

Is it accidental that the First Men of the Popol Vuh were remembered not only for studying 'the round face of the earth' but for their contemplation of 'the arch of heaven'?[8] And is it a coincidence that the outstanding achievement of Mayan society was its observational astronomy, upon which, through the medium of advanced mathematical calculations, was based a clever, complex, sophisticated and very accurate calendar?

Knowledge out of place

In 1954 J. Eric Thompson, a leading authority on the archaeology of Central America, confessed to a deep sense of puzzlement at a number of glaring disparities he had identified between the generally unremarkable achievements of the Mayas, as a whole and the advanced state of their astro-calendrical knowledge, 'What mental quirks,' he asked, 'led the Maya intelligentsia to chart the heavens, yet fail to grasp the principle of the wheel; to visualize eternity, as no other semi-civilized people has ever done, yet ignore the short step from corbelled to true arch; to count in millions, yet never to learn to weigh a sack of corn?'[9]

Perhaps the answer to these questions is much simpler than Thompson realized. Perhaps the astronomy, the deep understanding of time, and the long-term mathematical calculations, were not 'quirks' at all. Perhaps they were the constituent parts of a coherent but very specific body of knowledge that the Maya had inherited, more or less intact, from an older and wiser civilization. Such an inheritance would explain the contradictions observed by Thompson, and there is no need for any dispute on the point. We already know that the Maya received their calendar as a legacy from the Olmecs (a thousand years earlier, the Olmecs were using exactly the same system). The real question, should be, where did the Olmecs get it? What kind of level of technological and scientific development was required for a civilization to devise a calendar as good as this?

Take the case of the solar year. In modern Western society we still make use of a solar calendar which was introduced in Europe in 1582 and is based on the best scientific knowledge then available: the famous Gregorian calendar. The Julian calendar, which it replaced, computed the period of the earth's orbit around the sun at 365.25 days. Pope Gregory XIII's reform substituted a finer and more accurate calculation: 365.2425 days. Thanks to scientific advances since 1582 we now know that the exact length of the solar year is 365.2422 days. The Gregorian calendar therefore incorporates a very small plus error, just 0.0003 of a day—pretty impressive accuracy for the sixteenth century.

Strangely enough, though its origins are wrapped in the mists of antiquity far deeper than the sixteenth century, the Mayan calendar achieved even greater accuracy. It calculated the solar year at 365.2420 days, a minus error of only 0.0002 of a day.[10]

[9] J. Eric Thompson, The Rise and Fall of Maya Civilization, Pimlico, London, 1993, p. 13.

Similarly, the Maya knew the time taken by the moon to orbit the earth. Their estimate of this period was 29.528395 days—extremely close to the true figure of 29.530588 days computed by the finest modern methods.[11] The Mayan priests also had in their possession very accurate tables for the prediction of solar and lunar eclipses and were aware that these could occur only within plus or minus eighteen days of the node (when the moon's path crosses the apparent path of the sun).[12] Finally, the Maya were remarkably accomplished mathematicians. They possessed an advanced technique of metrical calculation by means of a chequerboard device we ourselves have only discovered (or rediscovered?) in the last century.[13] They also understood perfectly and used the abstract concept of zero[14] and were acquainted with place numerations.

These are esoteric fields. As Thompson observed,

> The cipher (nought) and place numerations are so much parts of our cultural heritage and seem such obvious conveniences that it is difficult to comprehend how their invention could have been long delayed. Yet neither ancient Greece with its great mathematicians, nor ancient Rome, had any inkling of either nought or place numeration. To write 1848 in Roman numerals requires eleven letters: MDCCCXLVIII. Yet the Maya had a system of place-value notation very much like our own at a time when the Romans were still using their clumsy method.[15]

Isn't it a bit odd that this otherwise unremarkable Central American tribe should, at such an early date, have stumbled upon an innovation which Otto Neugebauer, the historian of science, has described as 'one of the most fertile inventions of humanity'.[16]

Someone else's science?

Let us now consider the question of Venus, a planet that was of immense symbolic importance to all the ancient peoples of Central America, who identified it strongly with Quetzalcoatl (or Gucumatz or Kukulkan, as the Plumed Serpent was known in the Maya dialects).[17]

Unlike the Ancient Greeks, but like the Ancient Egyptians, the Maya understood that Venus was both 'the morning star' and 'the evening star'.[18] They understood other things about it as well. The 'synodical revolution' of a planet is the period of time it takes to return to any given point in the sky—as viewed from earth. Venus revolves around the sun every 224.7 days, while the earth follows its own slightly wider orbit. The composite result of these two motions is that Venus rises in exactly the same place in the earth's sky approximately every 584 days.

Whoever invented the sophisticated calendrical system inherited by the Maya had been aware of this and had found ingenious ways to integrate it with other interlocking cycles. Moreover, it is clear from the mathematics which brought these cycles together that the ancient calendar masters had understood that 584 days was only an approximation and that the movements of Venus are by no means regular. They had therefore worked out the exact figure established by today's science for the average synodical revolution of Venus over very long periods of time.[19] That figure is 583.92 days and it was knitted into the fabric of the Mayan calendar in numerous intricate and complex ways.[20] For example, to reconcile it with the so-called 'sacred year' (the tzolkin of 260 days, which was divided into 13 months of 20 days each) the calendar called for a correction of four days to be made every 61 Venus years. In addition, during every fifth cycle, a correction of eight days was made at the end of the 57th revolution. Once these steps were taken, the tzolkin and the synodical revolution of Venus were intermeshed so tightly that the degree of error to which the equation was subject was staggeringly small—one day in 6000 years.[21] And what made this all the more remarkable was that a further series of precisely calculated adjustments kept the Venus cycle and the tzolkin not only in harmony with each other but in exact relationship with the solar year. Again this was achieved in a manner which ensured that the calendar was capable of doing its job, virtually error-free, over vast expanses of time.[22]

Why did the 'semi-civilized' Maya need this kind of high-tech precision? Or did they inherit, in good working order, a calendar engineered to fit the needs of a much earlier and far more advanced civilization?

Consider the crowning jewel of Maya calendrics, the so-called 'Long Count'. This system of calculating dates also expressed beliefs about the past—notably, the widely held belief that time operated in Great Cycles which witnessed recurrent creations and destructions of the world. According to the Maya, the current Great Cycle began in darkness on 4 Ahau 8 Cumku, a date corresponding to 13 August 3114 BC in our own calendar.[23] As we have seen, it was also believed that the cycle will come to an end, amid global destruction, on 4 Ahau 3 Kankin: 23 December AD 2012 in our calendar. The function of the Long Count was to record the elapse of time since the beginning of the current Great Cycle, literally to count off, one by one, the 5125 years allotted to our present creation.[24]

[22] Ibid., 169.

[23] Breaking The Maya Code, p. 275.

The Long Count is perhaps best envisaged as a sort of celestial adding machine, constantly calculating and recalculating the scale of our growing debt to the universe. Every last penny of that debt is going to be called in when the figure on the meter reads 5125.

So, at any rate, thought the Maya.

Calculations on the Long Count computer were not, of course, done in our numbers. The Maya used their own notation, which they had derived from the Olmecs, who had derived it from ... nobody knows. This notation was a combination of dots (signifying ones or units or multiples of twenty), bars (signifying fives or multiples of five times twenty), and a shell glyph signifying zero. Spans of time were counted by days (kin), periods of twenty days (uinat), 'computing years' of 360 days (tun), periods of 20 tuns (known as katun), and periods of 20 katuns (known as bactun). There were also 8000-tun periods (pictun) and 160,000-tun periods (calabtun) to mop up even larger calculations.[25]

All this should make clear that although the Maya believed themselves to be living in one Great Cycle that would surely come to a violent end they also knew that time was infinite and that it proceeded with its mysterious revolutions regardless of individual lives or civilizations. As Thompson summed up in his great study on the subject:

> In the Maya scheme the road over which time had marched stretched into a past so distant that the mind of man cannot comprehend its remoteness. Yet the Maya undauntedly retrod that road seeking its starting point. A fresh view, leading further backward, unfolded at every stage; the mellowed centuries blended into millennia, and they into tens of thousands of years, as those tireless inquirers explored deeper and still deeper into the eternity of the past. On a stela at Quiriga in Guatemala a date over 90 million years ago is computed; on another a date over 300 million years before that is given. These are actual computations, stating correctly day and month positions, and are comparable to calculations in our calendar giving the month positions on which Easter would have fallen at equivalent distances in the past. The brain reels at such astronomical figures ...[26]

Isn't all this a bit avant-garde for a civilization that didn't otherwise distinguish itself in many ways? It's true that Mayan architecture was good within its limits. But there was precious little else that these jungle-dwelling Indians did which suggested they might have had the capacity (or the need) to conceive of really long periods of time.

It's been a good deal less than two centuries since the majority of Western intellectuals abandoned Bishop Usher's opinion that the world was created in 4004 BC and accepted that it must be infinitely older than that.[27] In plain English this means that the ancient Maya had a far more accurate understanding of the true immensity of geological time, and of the vast antiquity of our planet, than did anyone in Britain, Europe or North America until Darwin propounded the theory of evolution.

So how come the Maya got handy with big periods like hundreds of millions of years? Was it a freak of cultural development? Or did they inherit the calendrical and mathematical tools which facilitated, and enabled them to develop, this sophisticated understanding? If an inheritance was involved, it is legitimate to ask what the original inventors of the Mayan calendar's computer-like circuitry had intended it to do. What had they designed it for? Had they simply conceived of all its complexities to concoct 'a challenge to the intellect, a sort of tremendous anagram', as one authority claimed?[28] Or could they have had a more pragmatic and important objective in mind?

We have seen that the obsessive concern of Mayan society, and indeed of all the ancient cultures of Central America, was with calculating—and if possible postponing—the end of the world. Could this be the purpose the mysterious calendar was designed to fulfill? Could it have been a mechanism for predicting some terrible cosmic or geological catastrophe?

Chapter 22

City of the Gods

The overwhelming message of a large number of Central American legends is that the Fourth Age of the world ended very badly. A catastrophic deluge was followed by a long period during which the light of the sun vanished from the sky and the air was filled with a tenebrous darkness. Then:

> The gods gathered together at Teotihuacan ['the place of the gods'] and wondered anxiously who was to be the next Sun. Only the sacred fire [the material representation of Huehueteotl, the god who gave life its beginning] could be seen in the darkness, still quaking following the recent chaos. 'Someone will have to sacrifice himself, throw himself into the fire,' they cried, 'only then will there be a Sun.'[1]

A drama ensued in which two deities (Nanahuatzin and Tecciztecatl) immolated themselves for the common good. One burned quickly in the centre of the sacred fire; the other roasted slowly on the embers at its edge 'The gods waited for a long time until eventually the sky started to glow red as at dawn. In the east appeared the great sphere of the sun, life-giving and incandescent ...'[2]

It was at this moment of cosmic rebirth that Quetzalcoatl manifested himself. His mission was with humanity of the Fifth Age. He therefore took the form of a human being—a bearded white man, just like Viracocha.

In the Andes, Viracocha's capital was Tiahuanaco. In Central America, Quetzalcoatl's was the supposed birth-place of the Fifth Sun, Teotihuacan, the city of the gods.[3]

The Citadel

Teotihuacan.

The Citadel, the Temple and the Map of Heaven

Teotihuacan, 50 kilometres north-east of Mexico City
I stood in the airy enclosure of the Citadel and looked north across the morning haze towards the Pyramids of the Sun and the Moon. Set amid grey-green scrub country, and ringed by distant mountains, these two great monuments played their parts in a symphony of ruins strung out along the axis of the so-called 'Street of the Dead'. The Citadel lay at the approximate mid point of this wide avenue which ran perfectly straight for more than four kilometres. The Pyramid of the Moon was at its northern extreme, the Pyramid of the Sun offset somewhat to its east.

In the context of such a geometric site, an exact north-south or east-west orientation might have been expected. It was therefore surprising that the architects who had planned Teotihuacan had deliberately chosen to incline the Street of the Dead 15° 30' east of north. There were several theories as to why this eccentric orientation had been selected, but none was especially convincing. Growing numbers of scholars, however, were beginning to wonder whether astronomical alignments might have been involved. One, for example, had proposed that the Street of the Dead might have been 'built to face the setting of the Pleiades at the time when it was constructed'.[4] Another, Professor Gerald Hawkins, had suggested that a ‘Sirius-Pleides axis’ could also have played a part.[5] And Stansbury Hagar (secretary of the Department of Ethnology at the Brooklyn Institute of the Arts and Sciences), had suggested that the street might represent the Milky Way.[6]

[4] The Ancient Kingdoms of Mexico, p. 67.

Indeed Hagar went further than this, seeing the portrayal of specific planets and stars in many of the pyramids, mounds and other structures that hovered like fixed satellites around the axis of the Street of the Dead. His complete thesis was that Teotihuacan had been designed as a kind of ‘map of heaven’: ‘It reproduced on earth a supposed celestial plan of the sky-world where dwelt the deities and spirits of the dead.’[7]

During the 1960s and 1970s Hagar’s intuitions were tested in the field by Hugh Harleston Jr., an American engineer resident in Mexico, who carried out a comprehensive mathematical survey at Teotihuacan. Harleston reported his findings in October 1974 at the International Congress of Americanists.[8] His paper, which was full of daring and innovative ideas, contained some particularly curious information about the Citadel and about the Temple of Quetzalcoatl located at the eastern extreme of this great square compound.

The Temple was regarded by scholars as one of the best-preserved archaeological monuments in Central America.[9] This was because the original, prehistoric structure had been partially buried beneath another much later mound immediately in front of it to the west. Excavation of that mound had revealed the elegant six-stage pyramid that now confronted me. It stood 72 feet high and its base covered an area of 82,000 square feet.

Still bearing traces of the original multicoloured paints which had coated it in antiquity, the exposed Temple was a beautiful and strange sight. The predominant sculptural motif was a series of huge serpent heads protruding three-dimensionally out of the facing blocks and lining the sides of the massive central stairway. The elongated jaws of these oddly humanoid reptiles were heavily endowed with fangs, and the upper lips with a sort of handlebar moustache. Each serpent’s thick neck was ringed by an elaborate plume of feathers—the unmistakable symbol of Quetzalcoatl.[10]

What Harleston’s investigations had shown was that a complex mathematical relationship appeared to exist among the principal structures lined up along the Street of the Dead (and indeed beyond it). This relationship suggested something extraordinary, namely that Teotihuacan might originally have been designed as a precise scale-model of the solar system. At any rate, if the centre line of the Temple of Quetzalcoatl were taken as denoting the position of the sun, markers laid out northwards from it along the axis of the Street of the Dead seemed to indicate the correct orbital distances of the inner planets, the asteroid belt, Jupiter, Saturn (represented by the so-called 'Sun' Pyramid), Uranus (by the 'Moon' Pyramid), and Neptune and Pluto by as yet unexcavated mounds some kilometres farther north.[11]

[10] Mysteries of the Mexican Pyramids, p. 215.

If these correlations were more than coincidental, then, at the very least, they indicated the presence at Teotihuacan of an advanced observational astronomy, one not surpassed by modern science until a relatively late date. Uranus remained unknown to our own astronomers until 1787, Neptune until 1846 and Pluto until 1930. Even the most conservative estimate of Teotihuacan's antiquity, by contrast, suggested that the principal ingredients of the site-plan (including the Citadel, the Street of the Dead and the Pyramids of the Sun and the Moon) must date back at least to the time of Christ.[12] No known civilization of that epoch, either in the Old World or in the New, is supposed to have had any knowledge at all of the outer planets—let alone to have possessed accurate information concerning their orbital distances from each other and from the sun.

Egypt and Mexico—more coincidences?

After completing his studies of the pyramids and avenues of Teotihuacan, Stansbury Hagar concluded: 'We have not yet realized either the importance or the refinement, or the widespread distribution throughout ancient America, of the astronomical cult of which the celestial plan was a feature, and of which Teotihuacan was one of the principal centres.'[13]

But was this just an astronomical 'cult'? Or was it something approximating more closely to what we might call a science? And whether cult or science, was it realistic to suppose that it had enjoyed 'widespread distribution' only in the Americas when there was so much evidence linking it to other parts of the ancient world?

For example, archaeo-astronomers making use of the latest star-mapping computer programmes had recently demonstrated that the three world-famous pyramids on Egypt's Giza plateau formed an exact terrestrial diagram of the three belt stars in the constellation of Orion.[14] Nor was this the limit of the celestial map the Ancient Egyptian priests had created in the sands on the west bank of the Nile. Included in their overall vision, as we shall see in Parts VI and VII, there was a natural feature—the river Nile—which was exactly where it should be had it been designed to represent the Milky Way.[15]

[14] The Orion Mystery.

The incorporation of a 'celestial plan' into key sites in Egypt and Mexico did not by any means exclude religious functions. On the contrary, whatever else they may have been intended for it is certain that the monuments of Teotihuacan, like those of the Giza plateau, played important religious roles in the lives of the communities they served.

Thus Central American traditions collected in the sixteenth century by Father Bernardino de Sahagun gave eloquent expression to a widespread belief that Teotihuacan had fulfilled at least one specific and important religious function in ancient times. According to these legends the City of the Gods was so known because 'the Lords therein buried, after their deaths, did not perish but turned into gods ...'[16] In other words, it was 'the place where men became gods'.[17] It was additionally known as 'the place of those who had the road of the gods',[18] and 'the place where gods were made'.[19]

Was it a coincidence, I wondered, that this seemed to have been the religious purpose of the three pyramids at Giza? The archaic hieroglyphs of the Pyramid Texts, the oldest coherent body of writing in the world, left little room for doubt that the ultimate objective of the rituals carried out within those colossal structures was to bring about the deceased pharaoh's transfiguration—to 'throw open the doors of the firmament and to make a road' so that he might 'ascend into the company of the gods'.[20]

The notion of pyramids as devices designed (presumably in some metaphysical sense) 'to turn men into gods' was, it seemed to me, too idiosyncratic and peculiar to have been arrived at independently in both Ancient Egypt and Mexico. So, too, was the idea of using the layout of sacred sites to incorporate a celestial plan.

Moreover, there were other strange similarities that deserved to be considered.

Just as at Giza, three principal pyramids had been built at Teotihuacan: the Pyramid/Temple of Quetzalcoatl, the Pyramid of the Sun and the Pyramid of the Moon. Just as at Giza, the site plan was not symmetrical, as one might have expected, but involved two structures in direct alignment with each other while the third appeared to have been deliberately offset to one side. Finally, at Giza, the summits of the Great Pyramid and the Pyramid of Khafre were level, even though the former was a taller building than the latter. Likewise, at Teotihuacan, the summits of the Pyramids of the Sun and the Moon were level even though the former was taller. The reason was the same in both cases: the Great Pyramid was built on lower ground than the Pyramid of Cephren, and the Pyramid of the Sun on lower ground than the Pyramid of the Moon.[21]

Could all this be coincidence? Was it not more logical to conclude that there was an ancient connection between Mexico and Egypt?

For reasons I have outlined in Chapters Eighteen and Nineteen I doubted whether any direct, causal link was involved—at any rate within historic times. Once again, however, as with the Mayan calendar, and as with the early maps of Antarctica, was it not worth keeping an open mind to the possibility that we might be dealing with a legacy: that the pyramids of Egypt and the ruins of Teotihuacan might express the technology, the geographical knowledge, the observational astronomy (and perhaps also the religion) of a forgotten civilization of the past which had once, as the Popul Vuh claimed, 'examined the four corners, the four points of the arch of the sky, and the round face of the earth'?

There was widespread agreement among academics concerning the antiquity of the Giza pyramids, thought to be about 4500 years old.[22] No such unanimity existed with regard to Teotihuacan. Neither the Street of the Dead, nor the Temple of Quetzalcoatl, nor the Pyramids of the Sun and the Moon had ever been definitively dated.[23] The majority of scholars believed that the city had flourished between 100 BC and AD 600, but others argued strongly that it must have risen to prominence much earlier, between 1500 and 1000 BC. There were others still who sought, largely on geological grounds, to push the foundation date back to 4000 BC before the eruption of the nearby volcano Xitli.[24]

Amid all this uncertainty about the age of Teotihuacan, I had not been surprised to discover that no one had the faintest idea of the identity of those who had actually built the largest and most remarkable metropolis ever to have existed in the pre-Colombian New World.[25] All that could be said for sure was this: when the Aztecs, on their march to imperial power, first stumbled upon the mysterious city in the twelfth century AD, its colossal edifices and avenues were already old beyond imagining and so densely overgrown that they seemed more like natural features than works of man.[26] Attached to them, however, was a thread of local legend, passed down from generation to generation, which asserted that they had been built by giants[27] and that their purpose had been to transform men into gods.

Hints of forgotten wisdom

Leaving the Temple of Quetzalcoatl behind me, I recrossed the Citadel in a westerly direction.

There was no archaeological evidence that this enormous enclosure had ever served as a citadel—or, for that matter, that it had any kind of military or defensive function at all. Like so much else about Teotihuacan it had clearly been planned with painstaking care, and executed with enormous effort, but its true purpose remained unidentified by modern scholarship.[28] Even the Aztecs, who had been responsible for naming the Pyramids of the Sun and the Moon (an attribution which had stuck though no one had any idea what the original builders had called them) had failed to invent a name for the Citadel. It had been left to the Spaniards to label it as they did—an understandable conceit since the 30-acre central patio of La Ciudadela was surrounded by massively thick embankments more than 23 feet high and some 1500 feet long on each side.[29]

My walk had now brought me to the western extreme of the patio. I climbed a steep set of stairs that led to the top of the embankment and turned north on to the Street of the Dead. Once again I had to remind myself that this was almost certainly not what the Teotihuacanos (whoever they were) had called the immense and impressive avenue. The Spanish name Calle de los Muertos was of Aztec origin, apparently based on speculation that the numerous mounds on either side of the Street were graves (which, as it happened, they were not).[30]

We have already considered the possibility that the Way of the Dead may have served as a terrestrial counterpart of the Milky Way. Of interest in this regard is the work of another American, Alfred E. Schlemmer, who—like Hugh Harleston Jr.—was an engineer. Schlemmer's field was technological forecasting, with specific reference to the prediction of earthquakes,[31] on which he presented a paper at the Eleventh National Convention of Chemical Engineers (in Mexico City in October 1971).

Schlemmer's argument was that the Street of the Dead might never have been a street at all. Instead, it might originally have been laid out as a row of linked reflecting pools, filled with water which had descended through a series of locks from the Pyramid of the Moon, at the northern extreme, to the Citadel in the south.

As I walked steadily northward towards the still-distant Moon Pyramid, it seemed to me that this theory had several points in its favour. For a start the 'Street' was blocked at regular intervals by high partition walls, at the foot of which the remains of well-made sluices could clearly be seen. Moreover, the lie of the land would have facilitated a north-south hydraulic flow since the base of the Moon Pyramid stood on ground that was approximately 100 feet higher than the area in front of the Citadel. The partitioned sections could easily have been filled with water and might indeed have served as reflecting pools, creating a spectacle far more dramatic than those offered by the Taj Mahal or the fabled Shalimar Gardens. Finally, the Teotihuacan Mapping Project (financed by the National Science Foundation in Washington DC and led by Professor Rene Millon of the University of Rochester) had demonstrated conclusively that the ancient city had possessed 'many carefully laid-out canals and systems of branching waterways, artificially dredged into straightened portions of a river, which formed a network within Teotihuacan and ran all the way to [Lake Texcoco], now ten miles distant but perhaps closer in antiquity'.[32]

There was much argument about what this vast hydraulic system had been designed to do. Schlemmer's contention was that the particular waterway he had identified had been built to serve a pragmatic purpose as 'a long-range seismic monitor'—part of 'an ancient science, no longer understood'.[33] He pointed out that remote earthquakes 'can cause standing waves to form on a liquid surface right across the planet' and suggested that the carefully graded and spaced reflecting pools of the Street of the Dead might have been designed 'to enable Teotihuacanos to read from the standing waves formed there the location and strength of earthquakes around the globe, thus allowing them to predict such an occurrence in their own area'.[34]

Reconstruction of Teotihuacan, looking down the Way of the Dead from behind the Pyramid of the Moon. The Pyramid of the Sun lies to the left of the Way of the Dead. Visible in the distance beyond it is the pyramid-temple of Quetzalcoatl inside the large compound of the citadel.

There was, of course, no proof of Schlemmer's theory. However, when I remembered the fixation with earthquakes and floods apparent everywhere in Mexican mythology, and the equally obsessive concern with forecasting future events evident in the Maya calendar, I felt less inclined to dismiss the apparently far-fetched conclusions of the American engineer. If Schlemmer were right, if the ancient Teotihuacanos had indeed understood the principles of resonant vibration and had put them into practice in seismic forecasting, the implication was that they were the possessors of an advanced science. And if people like Hagar and Harleston were right—if, for example, a scale-model of the solar system had also been built into the basic geometry of Teotihuacan—this too suggested that the city was founded by a scientifically evolved civilization not yet identified.

I continued to walk northwards along the Street of the Dead and turned east towards the Pyramid of the Sun. Before reaching this great monument, however, I paused to examine a ruined patio, the principal feature of which was an ancient 'temple' which concealed a perplexing mystery beneath its rock floor.

The Sun and the Moon and the Way of the Dead

Some archaeological discoveries are heralded with much fanfare; others, for various reasons, are not. Among this latter category must be included the thick and extensive layer of sheet mica found sandwiched between two of the upper levels of the Teotihuacan Pyramid of the Sun when it was being probed for restoration in 1906. The lack of interest which greeted this discovery, and the absence of any follow-up studies to determine its possible function is quite understandable because the mica, which had a considerable commercial value, was removed and sold as soon as it had been excavated. The culprit was apparently Leopoldo Bartres, who had been commissioned to restore the time-worn pyramid by the Mexican government.[1]

There has also been a much more recent discovery of mica at Teotihuacan (in the ‘Mica Temple’) and this too has passed almost without notice. Here the reason is harder to explain because there has been no looting and the mica remains on site.[2]

One of a group of buildings, the Mica Temple is situated around a patio about 1000 feet south of the west face of the Pyramid of the Sun. Directly under a floor paved with heavy rock slabs, archaeologists financed by the Viking Foundation excavated two massive sheets of mica which had been carefully and purposively installed at some extremely remote date by a people who must have been skilled in cutting and handling this material. The sheets are ninety feet square and form two layers, one laid directly on top of the other.[3]

Mica is not a uniform substance but contains trace elements of different metals depending on the kind of rock formation in which it is found. Typically these metals include potassium and aluminum and also, in varying quantities, ferrous and ferric iron, magnesium, lithium, manganese and titanium. The trace elements in Teotihuacan’s Mica Temple indicate that the underfloor sheets belong to a type which occurs only in Brazil, some 2000 miles away.[4] Clearly, therefore, the builders of the Temple must have had a specific need for this particular kind of mica and were prepared to go to considerable lengths to obtain it, otherwise they could have used the locally available variety more cheaply and simply.

Mica does not leap to mind as an obvious general-purpose flooring material. Its use to form layers underneath a floor, and thus completely out of sight, seems especially bizarre when we remember that no other ancient structure in the Americas, or anywhere else in the world, has been found to contain a feature like this.[5]

It is frustrating that we will never be able to establish the exact position, let alone the purpose, of the large sheet that Bartres excavated and removed from the Pyramid of the Sun in 1906. The two intact layers in the Mica Temple, on the other hand, resting as they do in a place where they had no decorative function, look as though they were designed to do a particular job. Let us note in passing that mica possesses characteristics which suit it especially well for a range of technological applications. In modern industry, it is used in the construction of capacitors and is valued as a thermal and electric insulator. It is also opaque to fast neutrons and can act as a moderator in nuclear reactions.

Erasing messages from the past

Pyramid of the Sun, Teotihuacan

Having climbed more than 200 feet up a series of flights of stone stairs I reached the summit and looked towards the zenith. It was midday 19 May, and the sun was directly overhead, as it would be again on 25 July. On these two dates, and not by accident, the west face of the pyramid was oriented precisely to the position of the setting sun.[6]

A more curious but equally deliberate effect could be observed on the equinoxes, 20 March and 22 September. Then the passage of the sun's rays from south to north resulted at noon in the progressive obliteration of a perfectly straight shadow that ran along one of the lower stages of the western façade. The whole process, from complete shadow to complete illumination, took exactly 66.6 seconds. It had done so without fail, year-in year-out, ever since the pyramid had been built and would continue to do so until the giant edifice crumbled into dust.[7]

What this meant, of course, was that at least one of the many functions of the pyramid had been to serve as a 'perennial clock', precisely signalling the equinoxes and thus facilitating calendar corrections as and when necessary for a people apparently obsessed, like the Maya, with the elapse and measuring of time. Another implication was that the master-builders of Teotihuacan must have possessed an enormous body of astronomic and geodetic data and referred to this data to set the Sun Pyramid at the precise orientation necessary to achieve the desired equinoctial effects.

This was planning and architecture of a high order. It had survived the passage of the millennia and it had survived the wholesale remodelling of much of the pyramid's outer shell conducted in the first decade of the twentieth century by the self-styled restorer, Leopoldo Bartres. In addition to plundering precious evidence that might have helped us towards a better understanding of the purposes for which the enigmatic structure had been built, this repulsive lackey of Mexico's corrupt dictator Porfirio Diaz had removed the outer layer of stone, mortar and plaster to a depth of more than twenty feet from the entire northern, eastern and southern faces. The result was catastrophic: the underlying adobe surface began to dissolve in heavy rains and to exhibit plastic flow which threatened to destroy the whole edifice. Although the slippage was halted with hasty remedial measures, nothing could change the fact that the Sun Pyramid had been deprived of almost all its original surface features.

By modern archaeological standards this was, of course, an unforgivable act of desecration. Because of it, we will never learn the significance of the many sculptures, inscriptions, reliefs and artefacts that had almost certainly been removed with those twenty feet of the outer shell. Nor was this the only or even the most regrettable consequence of Bartres's grotesque vandalism. There was startling evidence which suggested that the unknown architects of the Pyramid of the Sun might have intentionally incorporated scientific data into many of the key dimensions of the great structure. This evidence had been gathered and extrapolated from the intact west face (which, not accidentally, was also the face where the intended equinoctial effects could still be seen), but thanks to Bartres, no similar information was likely to be forthcoming from the other three faces because of the arbitrary alterations imposed upon them. Indeed, by drastically distorting the original shape and size of so much of the pyramid, the Mexican 'restorer' had possibly deprived posterity of some of the most important lessons Teotihuacan had to teach.

Eternal numbers

The transcendental number known as pi is fundamental to advanced mathematics. With a value slightly in excess of 3.14 it is the ratio of the diameter of a circle to its circumference. In other words if the diameter of a circle is 12 inches, the circumference of that circle will be 12 inches x 3.14 = 37.68 inches. Likewise, since the diameter of a circle is exactly double the radius, we can use pi to calculate the circumference of any circle from its radius. In this case, however, the formula is the length of the radius multiplied by 2pi. As an illustration let us take again a circle of 12 inches diameter. Its radius will be 6 inches and its circumference can be obtained as follows: 6 inches x 2 x 3.14 = 37.68 inches. Similarly a circle with a radius of 10 inches will have a circumference of 67.8 inches (10 inches x 2 x 3.14) and a circle with a radius of 7 inches will have a circumference of 43.96 inches (7 inches x 2 x 3.14).

These formulae using the value of pi for calculating circumference from either diameter or radius apply to all circles, no matter how large or how small, and also, of course, to all spheres and hemispheres. They seem relatively simple—with hindsight. Yet their discovery, which represented a revolutionary breakthrough in mathematics, is thought to have been made late in human history. The orthodox view is that Archimedes in the third century BC was the first man to calculate pi correctly at 3.14.[8] Scholars do not accept that any of the mathematicians of the New World ever got anywhere near pi before the arrival of the Europeans in the sixteenth century. It is therefore disorienting to discover that the Great Pyramid at Giza (built more than 2000 years before the birth of Archimedes) and the Pyramid of the Sun at Teotihuacan, which vastly predates the conquest, both incorporate the value of pi. They do so, moreover, in much the same way, and in a manner which leaves no doubt that the ancient builders on both sides of the Atlantic were thoroughly conversant with this transcendental number.

The principal factors involved in the geometry of any pyramid are (1) the height of the summit above the ground, and (2) the perimeter of the monument at ground level. Where the Great Pyramid is concerned, the ratio between the original height (481.3949 feet[9]) and the perimeter (3023.16 feet[10]) turns out to be the same as the ratio between the radius and the circumference of a circle, i.e. 2pi.[11] Thus, if we take the pyramid's height and multiply it by 2pi (as we would with a circle's radius to calculate its circumference) we get an accurate read-out of the monument's perimeter (481.3949 feet 2 x 3.14 = 3023.16 feet). Alternatively, if we turn the equation around and start with the circumference at ground level, we get an equally accurate read-out of the height of the summit (3023.16 feet divided by 2 divided by 3.14 = 481.3949 feet).

Since it is almost inconceivable that such a precise mathematical correlation could have come about by chance, we are obliged to conclude that the builders of the Great Pyramid were indeed conversant with pi and that they deliberately incorporated its value into the dimensions of their monument.

Now let us consider the Pyramid of the Sun at Teotihuacan. The angle of its sides is 43.5°[12] (as opposed to 52° in the case of the Great Pyramid[13]). The Mexican monument has the gentler slope because the perimeter of its base, at 2932.8 feet,[14] is not much smaller than that of its Egyptian counterpart while its summit is considerably lower (approximately 233.5 feet prior to Bartres's, 'restoration'[15]).

[11] Ibid., p. 219.

[12] Mysteries of the Mexican Pyramids, p. 55.

[13] The Pyramids of Egypt, pp. 87, 219.

The 2pi formula that worked at the Great Pyramid does not work with these measurements. A 4pi formula does. Thus if we take the height of the Pyramid of the Sun (233.5 feet) and multiply it by 4pi we once again obtain a very accurate read-out of the perimeter: 233.5 feet x 4 x 3.14 = 2932.76 feet (a discrepancy of less than half an inch from the true figure of 2932.8 feet).

This, surely, can no more be a coincidence than the pi relationship extrapolated from the dimensions of the Egyptian monument. Moreover, the very fact that both structures incorporate pi relationships (when none of the other pyramids on either side of the Atlantic does) strongly suggests not only the existence of advanced mathematical knowledge in antiquity but some sort of underlying common purpose.

The height of the Pyramid of the Sun x 4pi = the perimeter of its base. The height of the Great Pyramid at Giza x 2*pi* = the perimeter of its base.

As we have seen the desired height/perimeter ratio of the Great [15] Mexico, p. 201; The Atlas of Mysterious Places, p. 156.

Pyramid (2pi) called for the specification of a tricky and idiosyncratic angle of slope for its sides: 52°. Likewise, the desired height/perimeter ratio of the Pyramid of the Sun (4pi) called for the specification of an equally eccentric angle of slope: 43.5°. If there had been no ulterior motive, it would surely have been simpler for the Ancient Egyptian and Mexican architects to have opted for 45° (which they could easily have obtained and checked by bisecting a right angle).

What could have been the common purpose that led the pyramid builders on both sides of the Atlantic to such lengths to structure the value of pi so precisely into these two remarkable monuments? Since there seems to have been no direct contact between the civilizations of Mexico and Egypt in the periods when the pyramids were built, is it not reasonable to deduce that both, at some remote date, inherited certain ideas from a common source?

Is it possible that the shared idea expressed in the Great Pyramid and the Pyramid of the Sun could have to do with spheres, since these, like the pyramids, are three-dimensional objects (while circles, for example, have only two dimensions)? The desire to symbolize spheres in three-dimensional monuments with flat surfaces would explain why so much trouble was taken to ensure that both incorporated unmistakable pi relationships. Furthermore it seems likely that the intention of the builders of both of these monuments was not to symbolize spheres in general but to focus attention on one sphere in particular: the planet earth.

It will be a long while before orthodox archaeologists are prepared to accept that some peoples of the ancient world were advanced enough in science to have possessed good information about the shape and size of the earth. However, according to the calculations of Livio Catullo Stecchini, an American professor of the History of Science and an acknowledged expert on ancient measurement, the evidence for the existence of such anomalous knowledge in antiquity is irrefutable.[16] Stecchini's conclusions, which relate mainly to Egypt, are particularly impressive because they are drawn from mathematical and astronomical data which, by common consent, are beyond serious dispute.[17] A fuller examination of these conclusions, and of the nature of the data on which they rest, is presented in Part VII. At this point, however, a few words from Stecchini may shed further light on the mystery that confronts us:

> The basic idea of the Great Pyramid was that it should be a representation of the northern hemisphere of the earth, a hemisphere projected on flat-surfaces as is done in map-making ... The Great Pyramid was a projection on four triangular surfaces. The apex represented the pole and the perimeter represented the equator. This is the reason why the perimeter is in relation 2pi to the height. The > Great Pyramid represents the northern hemisphere in a scale of 1:43,200.[18]

In Part VII we shall see why this scale was chosen.

Mathematical city

Rising up ahead of me as I walked towards the northern end of the Street of the Dead, the Pyramid of the Moon, mercifully undamaged by restorers, had kept its original form as a four-stage ziggurat. The Pyramid of the Sun, too, had consisted of four stages but Bartres had whimsically sculpted in a fifth stage between the original third and fourth levels.

There was, however, one original feature of the Pyramid of the Sun that Bartres had been unable to despoil: a subterranean passageway leading from a natural cave under the west face. After its accidental discovery in 1971 this passageway was thoroughly explored. Seven feet high, it was found to run eastwards for more than 300 feet until it reached a point close to the pyramid's geometrical centre.[19] Here it debouched into a second cave, of spacious dimensions, which had been artificially enlarged into a shape very similar to that of a four-leaf clover. The 'leaves' were chambers, each about sixty feet in circumference, containing a variety of artefacts such as beautifully engraved slate discs and highly polished mirrors. There was also a complex drainage system of interlocking segments of carved rock pipes.[20]

This last feature was particularly puzzling because there was no known source of water within the pyramid.[21] The sluices, however, left little doubt that water must have been present in antiquity, most probably in large quantities. This brought to mind the evidence for water having once run in the Street of the Dead, the sluices and partition walls I had seen earlier to the north of the Citadel, and Schlemmer's theory of reflecting pools and seismic forecasting.

Indeed, the more I thought about it the more it seemed that water had been the dominant motif at Teotihuacan. Though I had hardly registered it that morning, the Temple of Quetzalcoatl had been decorated not only with effigies of the Plumed Serpent but with unmistakable aquatic symbolism, notably an undulating design suggestive of waves and large numbers of beautiful carvings of seashells. With these images in my mind, I reached the wide plaza at the base of the Pyramid of the Moon and imagined it filled with water, as it might have been, to a depth of about ten feet. It would have looked magnificent: majestic, powerful and serene.

[21] Ibid.

The Akapana Pyramid in far-off Tiahuanaco had also been surrounded by water, which had been the dominant motif there—just as I now found it to be at Teotihuacan.

I began to climb the Pyramid of the Moon. It was smaller than the Pyramid of the Sun, indeed less than half the size, and was estimated to be made up of about one million tons of stone and earth, as against two and a half million tons in the case of the Pyramid of the Sun. The two monuments, in other words, had a combined weight of three and a half million tons. It was thought unlikely that this quantity of material could have been manipulated by fewer than 15,000 men and it was calculated that such a workforce would have taken at least thirty years to complete such an enormous task.[22]

Sufficient labourers would certainly have been available in the vicinity: the Teotihuacan Mapping Project had demonstrated that the population of the city in its heyday could have been as large as 200,000, making it a bigger metropolis than Imperial Rome of the Caesars. The Project had also established that the main monuments visible today covered just a small part of the overall area of ancient Teotihuacan. At its peak the city had extended across more than twelve square miles and had incorporated some 50,000 individual dwellings in 2000 apartment compounds, 600 subsidiary pyramids and temples, and 500 ‘factory’ areas specializing in ceramic, figurine, lapidary, shell, basalt, slate and ground-stone work.[23]

At the top level of the Pyramid of the Moon I paused and turned slowly around. Across the valley floor, which sloped gently downhill to the south, the whole of Teotihuacan now stretched before me—a geometrical city, designed and built by unknown architects in the time before history began. In the east, overlooking the arrow-straight Street of the Dead, loomed the Pyramid of the Sun, eternally ‘printing out’ the mathematical message it had been programmed with long ages ago, a message which seemed to direct our attention to the shape of the earth. It almost looked as though the civilization that had built Teotihuacan had made a deliberate choice to encode complex information in enduring monuments and to do it using a mathematical language.

Why a mathematical language?

Perhaps because, no matter what extreme changes and transformations human civilization might go through, the radius of a circle multiplied by 2pi (or half the radius multiplied by 4pi) would always give the correct figure for that circle’s circumference. In other words, a mathematical language could have been chosen for practical reasons: unlike any verbal tongue, such a code could always be deciphered, even by people from unrelated cultures living thousands of years in the future.

Not for the first time I felt myself confronted by the dizzying possibility that an entire episode in the story of mankind might have been forgotten. Indeed it seemed to me then, as I overlooked the mathematical city of the gods from the summit of the Pyramid of the Moon, that our species could have been afflicted with some terrible amnesia and that the dark period so blithely and dismissively referred to as 'prehistory' might turn out to conceal unimagined truths about our own past.

What is prehistory, after all, if not a time forgotten—a time for which we have no records? What is prehistory if not an epoch of impenetrable obscurity through which our ancestors passed but about which we have no conscious remembrance? It was out of this epoch of obscurity, configured in mathematical code along astronomical and geodetic lines, that Teotihuacan with all its riddles was sent down to us. And out of that same epoch came the great Olmec sculptures, the inexplicably precise and accurate calendar the Mayans inherited from their predecessors, the inscrutable geoglyphs of Nazca, the mysterious Andean city of Tiahuanaco ... and so many other marvels of which we do not know the provenance.

It is almost as though we have awakened into the daylight of history from a long and troubled sleep, and yet continue to be disturbed by the faint but haunting echoes of our dreams ...

Part IV

The Mystery of the Myths

1. A Species with Amnesia

Chapter 24

Echoes of Our Dreams

In some of the most powerful and enduring myths that we have inherited from ancient times, our species seems to have retained a confused but resonant memory of a terrifying global catastrophe.

Where do these myths come from?

Why, though they derive from unrelated cultures, are their storylines so similar? why are they laden with common symbolism? and why do they so often share the same stock characters and plots? If they are indeed memories, why are there no historical records of the planetary disaster they seem to refer to?

Could it be that the myths themselves are historical records? Could it be that these cunning and immortal stories, composed by anonymous geniuses, were the medium used to record such information and pass it on in the time before history began?

And the ark went upon the face of the waters

There was a king, in ancient Sumer, who sought eternal life. His name was Gilgamesh. We know of his exploits because the myths and traditions of Mesopotamia, inscribed in cuneiform script upon tablets of baked clay, have survived. Many thousands of these tablets, some dating back to the beginning of the third millennium BC, have been excavated from the sands of modern Iraq. They transmit a unique picture of a vanished culture and remind us that even in those days of lofty antiquity human beings preserved memories of times still more remote—times from which they were separated by the interval of a great and terrible deluge:

> I will proclaim to the world the deeds of Gilgamesh. This was the man to whom all things were known; this was the king who knew the countries of the world. He was wise, he saw mysteries and knew secret things, he brought us a tale of the days before the flood. He went on a long journey, was weary, worn-out with labour, returning he rested, he engraved on a stone the whole story.[1]

The story that Gilgamesh brought back had been told to him by a certain Utnapishtim, a king who had ruled thousands of years earlier, who had survived the great flood, and who had been rewarded with the gift of immortality because he had preserved the seeds of humanity and of all living things.

It was long, long ago, said Utnapishtim, when the gods dwelt on earth: Anu, lord of the firmament, Enlil, the enforcer of divine decisions, Ishtar, goddess of war and sexual love and Ea, lord of the waters, man's natural friend and protector.

[1] The Epic of Gilgamesh, Penguin Classics, London, 1988, p. 61.

> In those days the world teemed, the people multiplied, the world bellowed like a wild bull, and the great god was aroused by the clamour. Enlil heard the clamour and he said to the gods in council, 'The uproar of mankind is intolerable and sleep is no longer possible by reason of the babel.' So the gods agreed to exterminate mankind.'[2]

Ea, however, took pity on Utnapishtim. Speaking through the reed wall of the king's house he told him of the imminent catastrophe and instructed him to build a boat in which he and his family could survive:

> Tear down your house and build a boat, abandon possessions and look for life, despise wordly goods and save your soul ... Tear down your house, I say, and build a boat with her dimensions in proportion—her width and length in harmony. Put aboard the seed of all living things, into the boat.[3]

In the nick of time Utnapishtim built the boat as ordered. 'I loaded into her all that I had,' he said, 'loaded her with the seed of all living things':

> I put on board all my kith and kin, put on board cattle, wild beasts from open country, all kinds of craftsmen ... The time was fulfilled. When the first light of dawn appeared a black cloud came up from the base of the sky; it thundered within where Adad, lord of the storm was riding ... A stupor of despair went up to heaven when the god of the storm turned daylight to darkness, when he smashed the land like a cup ...
> On the first day the tempest blew swiftly and brought the flood ... No man could see his fellow. Nor could the people be distinguished from the sky. Even the gods were afraid of the flood. They withdrew; they went up to the heaven of Anu and crouched in the outskirts. The gods cowered like curs while Ishtar cried, shrieking aloud, 'Have I given birth unto these mine own people only to glut with their bodies the sea as though they were fish?'[4]

Meanwhile, continued Utnapishtim:

> For six days and nights the wind blew, torrent and tempest and flood overwhelmed the world, tempest and flood raged together like warring hosts. When the seventh day dawned the storm from the south subsided, the sea grew calm, the flood was stilled. I looked at the face of the world and there was silence. The surface of the sea stretched as flat as a roof-top. All mankind had returned to clay ... I opened a hatch and light fell on my face. Then I bowed low, I sat down and I wept, the tears streamed down my face, for on every side was the waste of water ... Fourteen leagues distant there appeared a mountain, and there the boat grounded; on the mountain of Nisir the boat held fast, she held fast and did not budge ... When the seventh day dawned I loosed a dove and let her go. She flew away, but finding no resting place she returned. Then I loosed a swallow, and she flew away but finding no resting place she returned. I loosed a raven, she saw that the waters had retreated, she ate, she flew around, she cawed, and she did not

Utnapishtim knew that it was now safe to disembark:

> I poured out a libation on the mountain top ... I heaped up wood and cane and cedar and myrtle ... When the gods smelled the sweet savour they gathered like flies over the sacrifice ...'[6]

These texts are not by any means the only ones to come down to us from the ancient land of Sumer. In other tablets—some almost 5000 years old, others less than 3000 years old—the 'Noah figure' of Utnapishtim is known variously as Zisudra, Xisuthros or Atrahasis. Even so, he is always instantly recognizable as the same patriarchal character, forewarned by the same merciful god, who rides out the same universal flood in the same storm-tossed ark and whose descendants repopulate the world.

There are many obvious resemblances between the Mesopotamian flood myth and the famous biblical story of Noah and the deluge[7] (see note). Scholars argue endlessly about the nature of these resemblances. What really matters, however, is that in each sphere of influence the same solemn tradition has been preserved for posterity—a tradition which tells, in graphic language, of a global catastrophe and of the near-total annihilation of mankind.

[7] Extracts from the Book of Genesis, Chapters Six, Seven and Eight:

God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart ... And God said, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence ... And behold I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth to destroy all flesh wherein is the breath of life from under heaven; and everything that is in the earth shall die.

Saving only Noah and his family (whom he instructed to build a great survival ship 450 feet long x 75 feet wide x 45 feet high), and ordering the Hebrew patriarch to gather together breeding pairs of every living creature so that they too might be saved, the Lord then sent the flood:

In the selfsame day entered Noah and Ham and Japheth, the sons of Noah, and Noah's wife, and the wives of his sons with them, into the Ark—they and every beast after his kind, and all the cattle after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind, and every fowl after his kind, every bird of every sort. And they went in unto Noah into the Ark, two and two of all flesh wherein is the breath of life. And they that went in, went in male and female of all flesh, as God had commanded, and the Lord shut them in.

And the flood was upon the earth; and the waters increased and bare up the ark, and it was lifted up above the earth. And the waters prevailed, and were increased greatly upon the earth; and the ark went upon the face of the waters. And the high hills that were under the whole heaven were covered ... And every man was destroyed, all in whose nostrils was the breath of life, and Noah only remained alive, and they that were with him in the ark.

In due course, 'in the seventh month in the seventeenth day of the month, the Ark came to rest upon the mountains of Ararat. And the waters decreased continually until the tenth month':

And it came to pass at the end of forty days, that Noah opened the window of the ark which he had made: And he sent forth a raven, which went forth to and fro until the waters were dried up from the earth. Also he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters were abated from off the face of the ground; but the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot, and she returned unto him into the ark, for the waters were on the face of the whole earth.

And he stayed yet another seven days; and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark.

Central America

The identical message was preserved in the Valley of Mexico, far away across the world from Mounts Ararat and Nisir. There, culturally and geographically isolated from Judaeo-Christian influences, long ages before the arrival of the Spaniards, stories were told of a great deluge. As the reader will recall from Part III, it was believed that this deluge had swept over the entire earth at the end of the Fourth Sun: 'Destruction came in the form of torrential rain and floods. The mountains disappeared and men were transformed into fish ...'[8]

According to Aztec mythology only two human beings survived: a man, Coxcoxtli, and his wife, Xochiquetzal, who had been forewarned of the cataclysm by a god. They escaped in a huge boat they had been instructed to build and came to ground on the peak of a tall mountain. There they descended and afterwards had many children who were dumb until the time when a dove on top of a tree gave them the gift of languages. These languages differed so much that the children could not understand one another.[9]

A related Central American tradition, that of the Mechoacanesecs, is in even more striking conformity with the story as we have it in Genesis and in the Mesopotamian sources. According to this tradition, the god Tezcatlipoca determined to destroy all mankind with a flood, saving only a certain Tezpi who embarked in a spacious vessel with his wife, his children and large numbers of animals and birds, as well as supplies of grains and seeds, the preservation of which were essential to the future subsistence of the human race. The vessel came to rest on an exposed mountain top after Tezcatilpoca had decreed that the waters of the flood should retire. Wishing to find out whether it was now safe for him to disembark, Tezpi sent out a vulture which, feeding on the carcasses with which the earth was now strewn, did not return. The man then sent out other birds, of which only the hummingbird came back, with a leafy branch in its beak. With this sign that the land had begun to renew itself,

And the dove came in to him in the evening; and, lo, in her mouth was an olive leaf plucked off; so Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth ... And Noah went forth ... and builded an altar unto the Lord, and offered burnt offerings on the altar. And the Lord smelled the sweet savour ...

Tezpi and his family went forth from their ark, multiplied and repopulated the earth.[10]

Memories of a terrible flood resulting from divine displeasure are also preserved in the Popol Vuh. According to this archaic text, the Great God decided to create humanity soon after the beginning of time. It was an experiment and he began it with 'figures made of wood that looked like men and talked like men'. These creatures fell out of favour because 'they did not remember their Creator':

> And so a flood was brought about by the Heart of Heaven; a great flood was formed which fell on the heads of the wooden creatures ... A heavy resin fell from the sky ... the face of the earth was darkened and a black rain began to fall by day and by night ... The wooden figures were annihilated, destroyed, broken up and killed.'[11]

Not everyone perished, however. Like the Aztecs and the Mechoacanesecs, the Maya of the Yucatan and Guatemala believed that a Noah figure and his wife, 'the Great Father and the Great Mother', had survived the flood to populate the land anew, thus becoming the ancestors of all subsequent generations of humanity.[12]

South America

Moving to South America, we encounter the Chibcas of central Colombia. According to their myths, they had originally lived as savages, without laws, agriculture or religion. Then one day there appeared among them an old man of a different race. He wore a thick long beard and his name was Bochica. He taught the Chibcas how to build huts and live together in society.

His wife, who was very beautiful and named Chia, appeared after him, but she was wicked and enjoyed thwarting her husband's altruistic efforts. Since she could not overcome his power directly, she used magical means to cause a great flood in which the majority of the population died. Bochica was very angry and exiled Chia from the earth to the sky, where she became the moon given the task of lighting the nights. He also caused the waters of the flood to dissipate and brought down the few survivors from the mountains where they had taken refuge. Thereafter he gave them laws, taught them to cultivate the land and instituted the worship of the sun with periodic festivals, sacrifices and pilgrimages. He then divided the power to govern among two chiefs and spent the remainder of his days on earth living in quiet contemplation as an ascetic. When he ascended to heaven he became a god.[13]

Farther south still, the Canarians, an Indian tribe of Ecuador, relate an ancient story of a flood from which two brothers escaped by going to the top of a high mountain. As the water rose the mountain grew higher, so that the two brothers survived the disaster.[14]

When they were discovered, the Tupinamba Indians of Brazil venerated a series of civilizing or creator heroes. The first of these heroes was Monan (ancient, old) who was said to have been the creator of mankind but who then destroyed the world with flood and fire ...[15]

Peru, as we saw in Part II, is particularly rich in flood legends. A typical story tells of an Indian who was warned by a llama of a deluge. Together man and llama fled to a high mountain called Vilca-Coto:

> When they reached the top of the mountain they saw that all kinds of birds and animals had already taken refuge there. The sea began to rise, and covered all the plains and mountains except the top of Vilca-Coto; and even there the waves dashed up so high that the animals were forced to crowd into a narrow area ... Five days later the water ebbed, and the sea returned to its bed. But all human beings except one were drowned, and from him are descended all the nations on earth.[16]

The Araucnaians of pre-Colombian Chile preserved a tradition that there was once a flood which very few Indians escaped. The survivors took refuge on a high mountain called Thegtheg ('the thundering' or 'the glittering') which had three peaks and the ability to float on water.[17]

In the far south of the continent a Yamana legend from Tierra del Fuego states: 'The moon woman caused the flood. This was at the time of the great upheaval ... Moon was filled with hatred towards human beings ... At that time everybody drowned with the exception of those few who were able to escape to the five mountain peaks that the water did not cover.'[18]

Another Tierra del Fuegan tribe, the Pehuenche, associate the flood with a prolonged period of darkness: 'The sun and the moon fell from the sky and the world stayed that way, without light, until finally two giant condors carried both the sun and the moon back up to the sky.'[19]

North America

Meanwhile, at the other end of the Americas, among the Inuit of Alaska, there existed the tradition of a terrible flood, accompanied by an earthquake, which swept so rapidly over the face of the earth that only a few people managed to escape in their canoes or take refuge on the tops of the highest mountains, petrified with terror.[20]

The Luiseno of lower California had a legend that a flood covered the mountains and destroyed most of mankind. Only a few were saved because they fled to the highest peaks which were spared when all the rest of the world was inundated. The survivors remained there until the flood ended.[21] Farther north similar flood myths were recorded amongst the Hurons.[22] And a legend of the Montagnais, belonging to the Algonquin family, related how Michabo, or the Great Hare, re-established the world after the flood with the help of a raven, an otter and a muskrat.[23]

Lynd's History of the Dakotas, an authoritative work of the nineteenth century which preserved many indigenous traditions that would otherwise have been lost, reports an Iroquois myth that 'the sea and waters had at one time infringed upon the land, so that all human life was destroyed'. The Chickasaws asserted that the world had been destroyed by water 'but that one family was saved and two animals of every kind'. The Sioux also spoke of a time when there was no dry land and when all men disappeared from existence.[24]

Water water everywhere

How far and how widely across the myth memories of mankind do the ripples of the great flood spread?

Very widely indeed. More than 500 deluge legends are known around the world and, in a survey of 86 of these (20 Asiatic, 3 European, 7 African, 46 American and 10 from Australia and the Pacific), the specialist researcher Dr Richard Andree concluded that 62 were entirely independent of the Mesopotamian and Hebrew accounts.[25]

Andree was an eminent German geographer and anthropologist. His monograph on diluvial traditions is described by J. G. Frazer (in Folklore in the Old Testament, pp. 46-7) as 'a model of sound learning and good sense set forth with the utmost clearness and conciseness ...'

For example, early Jesuit scholars who were among the first Europeans to visit China had the opportunity in the Imperial Library to study a vast work, consisting of 4320 volumes, said to have been handed down from ancient times and to contain ‘all knowledge’. This great book included a number of traditions which told of the consequences that followed ‘when mankind rebelled against the high gods and the system of the universe fell into disorder’: ‘The planets altered their courses. The sky sank lower towards the north. The sun, moon and stars changed their motions. The earth fell to pieces and the waters in its bosom rushed upwards with violence and overflowed the earth.’[26]

In the Malaysian tropical forest the Chewong people believe that every so often their own world, which they call Earth Seven, turns upside down so that everything is flooded and destroyed. However, through the agency of the Creator God Tohan, the flat new surface of what had previously been the underside of Earth Seven is moulded into mountains, valleys and plains. New trees are planted, and new humans born.[27]

A flood myth of Laos and northern Thailand has it that beings called the Thens lived in the upper kingdom long ages ago, while the masters of the lower world were three great men, Pu Leng Seung, Khun K’an and Khun K’et. One day the Thens announced that before eating any meal people should give them a part of their food as a sign of respect. The people refused and in a rage the Thens created a flood which devastated the whole earth. The three great men built a raft, on top of which they made a small house, and embarked with a number of women and children. In this way they and their descendants survived the deluge.[28]

In similar fashion the Karens of Burma have traditions of a global deluge from which two brothers were saved on a raft.[29] Such a deluge is also part of the mythology of Viet Nam, where a brother and a sister are said to have survived in a great wooden chest which also contained two of every kind of animal.[30]

Several aboriginal Australian peoples, especially those whose traditional homelands are along the tropical northern coast, ascribe their origins to a great flood which swept away the previous landscape and society. Meanwhile, in the origin myths of a number of other tribes, the cosmic serpent Yurlunggur (associated with the rainbow) is held responsible for the deluge.[31]

There are Japanese traditions according to which the Pacific islands of Oceania were formed after the waters of a great deluge had receded.[32] In Oceania itself a myth of the native inhabitants of Hawaii tells how the world was destroyed by a flood and later recreated by a god named Tangaloa. The Samoans believe that there was once an inundation that wiped out almost all mankind. It was survived only by two human beings who put to sea in a boat which eventually came to rest in the Samoan archipelago.[33]

Greece, India and Egypt

On the other side of the world, Greek mythology too is haunted by memories of a deluge. Here, however (as in Central America) the inundation is not viewed as an isolated event but as one of a series of destructions and remakings of the world. The Aztecs and the Maya spoke in terms of successive ‘Suns’ or epochs (of which our own was thought to be the Fifth and last). In similar fashion the oral traditions of Ancient Greece, collected and set down in writing by Hesiod in the eighth century BC, related that prior to the present creation there had been four earlier races of men on earth. Each of these was thought more advanced than the one that followed it. And each, at the appointed hour, had been ‘swallowed up’ in a geological cataclysm.

The first and most ancient creation had been mankind’s ‘golden race’ who had ‘lived like the gods, free from care, without trouble or woe ... With ageless limbs they revelled at their banquets ... When they died it was as men overcome by sleep.’ With the passing of time, and at the command of Zeus, this golden race eventually ‘sank into the depths of the earth’. It was succeeded by the ‘silver race’ which was supplanted by the ‘bronze race’, which was replaced by the race of ‘heroes’, which was followed by the ‘iron’ race—our own—the fifth and most recent creation.[34]

It is the fate of the bronze race that is of particular interest to us here. Described in the myths as having ‘the strength of giants, and mighty hands on their mighty limbs’,[35] these formidable men were exterminated by Zeus, king of the gods, as a punishment for the misdeeds of Prometheus, the rebellious Titan who had presented humanity with the gift of fire.[36] The mechanism the vengeful deity used to sweep the earth clean was an overwhelming flood.

In the most widespread version of the story Prometheus impregnated a human female. She bore him a son named Deucalion, who ruled over the country of Phthia, in Thessaly, and took to wife Pyrrha, ‘the red-blonde’, daughter of Epimetheus and Pandora. When Zeus reached his fateful decision to destroy the bronze race, Deucalion, forewarned by Prometheus, made a wooden box, stored in it ‘all that was necessary’, and climbed into it with Pyrrha. The king of the gods caused mighty rains to pour from heaven, flooding the greater part of the earth. All mankind perished in this deluge, save a few who had fled to the highest mountains. 'It also happened at this time that the mountains of Thessaly were split asunder, and the whole country as far as the Isthmus and the Peloponnese became a single sheet of water.'

Deucalion and Pyrrha floated over this sea in their box for nine days and nights, finally landing on Mount Parnassus. There, after the rains had ceased, they disembarked and sacrificed to the gods. In response Zeus sent Hermes to Deucalion with permission to ask for whatever he wished. He wished for human beings. Zeus then bade him take stones and throw them over his shoulder. The stones Deucalion threw became men, and those that Pyrrha threw became women.[37]

As the Hebrews looked back on Noah, so the Greeks of ancient historical times looked back upon Deucalion—as the ancestor of their nation and as the founder of numerous towns and temples.[38]

A similar figure was revered in Vedic India more than 3000 years ago. One day (the story goes) > when a certain wise man named Manu was making his ablutions, he found in the hollow of his hand a tiny little fish which begged him to allow it to live. Taking pity on it he put it in a jar. The next day, however, it had grown so much bigger that he had to carry it to a lake. Soon the lake was too small. 'Throw me into the sea,' said the fish [which was in reality a manifestation of the god Vishnu] 'and I shall be more comfortable.' Then he warned Manu of a coming deluge. He sent him a large ship, with orders to load it with two of every living species and the seeds of every plant, and then to go on board himself.'[39]

Manu had only just carried out these orders when the ocean rose and submerged everything, and nothing was to be seen but Vishnu in his fish form—now a huge, one-horned creature with golden scales. Manu moored his ark to the horn of the fish and Vishnu towed it across the brimming waters until it came to rest on the exposed peak of 'the Mountain of the North':[40]

> The fish said, 'I have saved thee; fasten the vessel to a tree, that the water may not sweep it away while thou art on the mountain; and in proportion as the waters decrease thou shalt descend.' Manu descended with the waters. The Deluge had carried away all creatures and Manu remained alone.[41]

With him, and with the animals and plants he had saved from destruction, began a new age of the world. After a year there emerged from the waters a woman who announced herself as 'the daughter of Manu'. The couple married and produced children, thus becoming the ancestors of the present race of mankind.[42]

Last but by no means least, Ancient Egyptian traditions also refer to a great flood. A funerary text discovered in the tomb of Pharaoh Seti I, for example, tells of the destruction of sinful humanity by a deluge.[43] The reasons for this catastrophe are set out in Chapter CLXXV of the Book of the Dead, which attributes the following speech to the Moon God Thoth:

> They have fought fights, they have upheld strifes, they have done evil, they have created hostilities, they have made slaughter, they have caused trouble and oppression ... [Therefore] I am going to blot out everything which I have made. This earth shall enter into the watery abyss by means of a raging flood, and will become even as it was in primeval time.[44]

On the trail of a mystery

With the words of Thoth we have come full circle to the Sumerian and biblical floods. 'The earth was filled with violence', says Genesis:

> And God looked upon the earth, and, behold, it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth. And God said unto Noah, 'The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and behold I will destroy them with the earth.'[45]

Like the flood of Deucalion, the flood of Manu, and the flood that destroyed the Aztecs' 'Fourth Sun', the biblical deluge was the end of a world age. A new age succeeded it: our own, populated by the descendants of Noah. From the very beginning, however, it was understood that this age too would in due course come to a catastrophic end. As the old song puts it, 'God gave Noah the rainbow sign; no more water, the fire next time.'

The Scriptural source for this prophecy of world destruction is to be found in 2 Peter 3:

> We must be careful to remember that during the last days there are bound to be people who will be scornful and [who will say], 'Everything goes on as it has since it began at the creation'. They are choosing to forget that there were heavens at the beginning, and that the earth was formed by the word of God out of water and between the waters, so that the world of that time was destroyed by being flooded by water. But by the same word, the present sky and earth are destined for fire, and are only being reserved until Judgement Day so that all sinners may be destroyed ... The Day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, and then with a roar the sky will vanish, the elements will catch fire and fall apart, and the earth > and all that it contains will be burnt up.[46]

The Bible, therefore, envisages two ages of the world, our own being the second and last. Elsewhere, in other cultures, different numbers of creations and destructions are recorded. In China, for instance, the perished ages are called kis, ten of which are said to have elapsed from the beginning of time until Confucius. At the end of each kis, 'in a general convulsion of nature, the sea is carried out of its bed, mountains spring up out of the ground, rivers change their course, human beings and everything are ruined, and the ancient traces effaced ...'[47]

Buddhist scriptures speak of 'Seven Suns', each brought to an end by water, fire or wind.[48] At the end of the Seventh Sun, the current 'world cycle', it is expected that the 'earth will break into flames'.[49] Aboriginal traditions of Sarawak and Sabah recall that the sky was once 'low' and tell us that 'six Suns perished ... at present the world is illuminated by the seventh Sun'.[50] Similarly, the Sibylline Books speak of nine Suns that are nine ages' and prophesy two ages yet to come—those of the eighth and the ninth Sun.'[51]

On the other side of the Atlantic Ocean, the Hopi Indians of Arizona (who are distant relatives of the Aztecs[52]) record three previous Suns, each culminating in a great annihilation followed by the gradual re-emergence of mankind. In Aztec cosmology, of course, there were four Suns prior to our own. Such minor differences concerning the precise number of destructions and creations envisaged in this or that mythology should not distract us from the remarkable convergence of ancient traditions evident here. All over the world these traditions appear to commemorate a widespread series of catastrophes. In many cases the character of each successive cataclysm is obscured by the use of poetic language and the piling up of metaphor and symbols. Quite frequently, also, at least two different kinds of disaster may be portrayed as having occurred simultaneously (most frequently floods and earthquakes, but sometimes fire and a terrifying darkness).

All this contributes to the creation of a confused and jumbled picture. The myths of the Hopi, however, stand out for their straightforwardness and simplicity. What they tell us is this:

> The first world was destroyed, as a punishment for human misdemeanours, by an all-consuming fire that came from above and below. The second world ended when the terrestrial globe toppled from its axis and everything was covered with > ice. The third world ended in a universal flood. The present world is the fourth. Its fate will depend on whether or not its inhabitants behave in accordance with the Creator's plans.[53]

We are on the trail of a mystery here. And while we may never hope to fathom the plans of the Creator we should be able to reach a judgement concerning the riddle of our converging myths of global destruction.

Through these myths the voices of the ancients speak to us directly. What are they trying to say?

Chapter 25

The Many Masks of the Apocalypse

Like the Hopi Indians of North America, the Avestic Aryans of pre-Islamic Iran believed that there were three epochs of creation prior to our own. In the first epoch men were pure and sinless, tall and long lived, but at its close the Evil One declared war against Ahura Mazda, the holy god, and a tumultuous cataclysm ensued. During the second epoch the Evil One was unsuccessful. In the third good and evil were exactly balanced. In the fourth epoch (the present age of the world), evil triumphed at the outset and has maintained its supremacy ever since.[1]

The end of the fourth epoch is predicted soon, but it is the cataclysm at the end of the first epoch that interests us here. It is not a flood, and yet it converges in so many ways with so many global flood traditions that some connection is strongly suggested.

The Avestic scriptures take us back to a time of paradise on earth, when the remote ancestors of the ancient Iranian people lived in the fabled Airyana Vaejo, the first good and happy creation of Ahura Mazda that flourished in the first age of the world: the mythical birthplace and original home of the Aryan race.

In those days Airyana Vaejo enjoyed a mild and productive climate with seven months of summer and five of winter. Rich in wildlife and in crops, its meadows flowing with streams, this garden of delights was converted into an uninhabitable wasteland of ten months' winter and only two months summer as a result of the onslaught of Angra Mainyu, the Evil One:

> The first of the good lands and countries which I, Ahura Mazda, created was the Airyana Vaejo ... Then Angra Mainyu, who is full of death, created an opposition to the same, a mighty serpent and snow. Ten months of winter are there now, two months of summer, and these are cold as to the water, cold as to the earth, cold as to the trees ... There all around falls deep snow; that is the direst of plagues ...'[2]

The reader will agree that a sudden and drastic change in the climate of Airyana Vaejo is indicated. The Avestic scriptures leave us in no doubt about this. Earlier they describe a meeting of the celestial gods called by Ahura Mazda, and tell us that 'the fair Yima, the good shepherd of high renown in the Airyana Vaejo', attended this meeting with all his excellent mortals.

[1] The Bundahish Chapters I, XXXI, XXXIV, cited in William F. Warren, Paradise Found: The Cradle of the Human Race at the North Pole, Houghton, Mifflin and Co., Boston, 1885, p. 282.

[2] Vendidad, Fargard I, cited in Lokamanya Bal Gangadhar Tilak, The Arctic Home in the Vedas, Tilak Publishers, Poona, 1956, pp. 340-1.

It is at this point that the strange parallels with the traditions of the biblical flood begin to crop up, for Ahura Mazda takes advantage of the meeting to warn Yima of what is about to happen as a result of the powers of the Evil One:

> And Ahura Mazda spake unto Yima saying: 'Yima the fair ... Upon the material world a fatal winter is about to descend, that shall bring a vehement, destroying frost. Upon the corporeal world will the evil of winter come, wherefore snow will fall in great abundance. ...
> 'And all three sorts of beasts shall perish, those that live in the wilderness, and those that live on the tops of the mountains, and those that live in the depths of the valleys under the shelter of stables.
> 'Therefore make thee a var [a hypogeum or underground enclosure] the length of a riding ground to all four corners. Thither bring thou the representatives of every kind of beast, great and small, of the cattle, of the beasts of burden, and of men, of dogs, of birds, and of the red burning fires.[3]
> 'There shalt thou make water flow. Thou shall put birds in the trees along the water's edge, in verdure which is everlasting. There put specimens of all plants, the loveliest and most fragrant, and of all fruits the most succulent. All these kinds of things and creatures shall not perish as long as they are in the var. But put there no deformed creature, nor impotent, nor mad, neither wicked, nor deceitful, nor rancorous, nor jealous; nor a man with irregular teeth, nor a leper ...'[4]

Apart from the scale of the enterprise there is only one real difference between Yima's divinely inspired var and Noah's divinely inspired ark: the ark is a means of surviving a terrible and devastating flood which will destroy every living creature by drowning the world in water; the var is a means of surviving a terrible and devastating 'winter' which will destroy every living creature by covering the earth with a freezing blanket of ice and snow.

In the Bundahish, another of the Zoroastrian scriptures (believed to incorporate ancient material from a lost part of the original Avesta), more information is provided on the cataclysm of glaciation that overwhelmed Airyana Vaejo. When Angra Mainyu sent the 'vehement destroying frost', he also 'assaulted and deranged the sky'.[5] The Bundahish tells us that this assault enabled the Evil One to master 'one third of the sky and overspread it with darkness' as the encroaching ice sheets tightened their grip.[6]

Indescribable cold, fire, earthquakes and derangement of the skies

The Avestic Aryans of Iran, who are known to have migrated to western Asia from some other, distant homeland,[7] are not the only possessors of archaic traditions which echo the basic setting of the great flood in ways unlikely to be coincidental. Indeed, though these are most commonly associated with the deluge, the familiar themes of the divine warning, and of the salvation of a remnant of mankind from a universal disaster, are also found in many different parts of the world in connection with the sudden onset of glacial conditions.

In South America, for example, Toba Indians of the Gran Chaco region that sprawls across the modern borders of Paraguay, Argentina and Chile, still repeat an ancient myth concerning the advent of what they call 'the Great Cold'. Forewarning comes from a semi-divine hero figure named Asin:

> Asin told a man to gather as much wood as he could and to cover his hut with a thick layer of thatch, because a time of great cold was coming. As soon as the hut had been prepared Asin and the man shut themselves inside and waited. When the great cold set in, shivering people arrived to beg a firebrand from them. Asin was hard and gave embers only to those who had been his friends. The people were freezing, and they cried the whole night. At midnight they were all dead, young and old, men and women ... this period of ice and sleet lasted for a long time and all the fires were put out. Frost was as thick as leather.[8]

As in the Avestic traditions it seems that the great cold was accompanied by great darkness. In the words of one Toba elder, these afflictions were sent 'because when the earth is full of people it has to change. The population has to be thinned out to save the world ... In the case of the long darkness the sun simply disappeared and the people starved. As they ran out of food, they began eating their children. Eventually they all died ...[9]

The Mayan Popol Vuh associates the flood, with 'much hail, black rain and mist, and indescribable cold'.[10] It also says that this was a period when 'it was cloudy and twilight all over the world ... the faces of the sun and the moon were covered.'[11] Other Maya sources confirm that these strange and terrible phenomena were experienced by mankind, 'in the time of the ancients. The earth darkened ... It happened that the sun was still bright and clear. Then, at midday, it got dark ...[12] Sunlight did not return till the twenty-sixth year after the flood.'[13]

[13] Maya History and Religion, p. 333.

The reader may recall that many deluge and catastrophe myths contain references not only to the onset of a great darkness but to other changes in the appearance of the heavens. In Tierra del Fuego, for instance, it was said that the sun and the moon 'fell from the sky'[14] and in China that 'the planets altered their courses. The sun, moon and stars changed their motions.'[15] The Incas believed that 'in ancient times the Andes were split apart when the sky made war on the earth.'[16] The Tarahumara of northern Mexico have preserved world destruction legends based on a change in the sun's path.[17] An African myth from the lower Congo states that 'long ago the sun met the moon and threw mud at it, which made it less bright. When this meeting happened there was a great flood ...'[18] The Cahto Indians of California say simply that 'the sky fell'.[19] And ancient Graeco-Roman myths tell that the flood of Deucalion was immediately preceded by awesome celestial events.[20] These events are graphically symbolized in the story of how Phaeton, child of the sun, harnessed his father's chariot but was unable to guide it along his father's course:

> Soon the fiery horses felt how their reins were in an unpractised hand. Rearing and swerving aside, they left their wonted way; then all the earth was amazed to see that the glorious Sun, instead of holding his stately, beneficent course across the sky, seemed to speed crookedly overhead and to rush down in wrath like a meteor.'[21]

This is not the place to speculate on what may have caused the alarming disturbances in the patterns of the heavens that are linked with cataclysm legends from all over the world. For our purposes at present, it is sufficient to note that such traditions seem to refer to the same 'derangement of the sky' that accompanied the fatal winter and spreading ice sheets described in the Iranian Avesta.[22] Other linkages occur. Fire, for example, often follows or precedes the flood. In the case of Phaeton's adventure with the Sun, 'the grass withered; the crops were scorched; the woods went up in fire and smoke; then beneath them the bare earth cracked and crumbled and the blackened rocks burst asunder under the heat.'[23]

Volcanism and earthquakes are also mentioned frequently in association with the flood, particularly in the Americas. The Araucanians of Chile say quite explicitly that 'the flood was the result of volcanic eruptions accompanied by violent earthquakes.'[24] The Mam Maya of Santiago Chimaltenango in the western highlands of Guatemala retain memories of 'a flood of burning pitch' which, they say, was one of the instruments of world destruction.[25] And in the Gran Chaco of Argentina, the Mataco Indians tell of 'a black cloud that came from the south at the time of the flood and covered the whole sky. Lightning struck and thunder was heard. Yet the drops that fell were not like rain. They were like fire ...'[26]

A monster chased the sun

There is one ancient culture that perhaps preserves more vivid memories in its myths than any other; that of the so-called Teutonic tribes of Germany and Scandinavia, a culture best remembered through the songs of the Norse scalds and sages. The stories those songs retell have their roots in a past which may be much older than scholars imagine and which combine familiar images with strange symbolic devices and allegorical language to recall a cataclysm of awesome magnitude:

> In a distant forest in the east an aged giantess brought into the world a whole brood of young wolves whose father was Fenrir. One of these monsters chased the sun to take possession of it. The chase was for long in vain, but each season the wolf grew in strength, and at last he reached the sun. Its bright rays were one by one extinguished. It took on a blood red hue, then entirely disappeared.
> Thereafter the world was enveloped in hideous winter. Snow-storms descended from all points of the horizon. War broke out all over the earth. Brother slew brother, children no longer respected the ties of blood. It was a time when men were no better than wolves, eager to destroy each other. Soon the world was going to sink into the abyss of nothingness.
> Meanwhile the wolf Fenrir, whom the gods had long ago so carefully chained up, broke his bonds at last and escaped. He shook himself and the world trembled. The ash tree Yggdrasil [envisaged as the axis of the earth] was shaken from its roots to its topmost branches. Mountains crumbled or split from top to bottom, and the dwarfs who had their subterranean dwellings in them sought desperately and in vain for entrances so long familiar but now disappeared.
> Abandoned by the gods, men were driven from their hearths and the human race was swept from the surface of the earth. The earth itself was beginning to lose its shape. Already the stars were coming adrift from the sky and falling into the gaping void. They were like swallows, weary from too long a voyage, who drop and sink into the waves.
> The giant Surt set the entire earth on fire; the universe was no longer more than > an immense furnace. Flames spurted from fissures in the rocks; everywhere there was the hissing of steam. All living things, all plant life, were blotted out. Only the naked soil remained, but like the sky itself the earth was no more than cracks and crevasses.

> And now all the rivers, all the seas, rose and overflowed. From every side waves lashed against waves. They swelled and boiled slowly over all things. The earth sank beneath the sea ...
> Yet not all men perished in the great catastrophe. Enclosed in the wood itself of the ash tree Yggdrasil—which the devouring flames of the universal conflagration had been unable to consume—the ancestors of a future race of men had escaped death. In this asylum they had found that their only nourishment had been the morning dew.
> Thus it was that from the wreckage of the ancient world a new world was born. Slowly the earth emerged from the waves. Mountains rose again and from them streamed cataracts of singing waters.[27]

The new world this Teutonic myth announces is our own. Needless to say, like the Fifth Sun of the Aztecs and the Maya, it was created long ago and is new no longer. Can it be a coincidence that one of the many Central American flood myths about the fourth epoch, 4 Atl ('water'), does not install the Noah couple in an ark but places them instead in a great tree just like Yggdrasil? '4 Atl was ended by floods. The mountains disappeared ... Two persons survived because they were ordered by one of the gods to bore a hole in the trunk of a very large tree and to crawl inside when the skies fell. The pair entered and survived. Their offspring repopulated the world.'[28]

Isn't it odd that the same symbolic language keeps cropping up in ancient traditions from so many widely scattered regions of the world? How can this be explained? Are we talking about some vast, subconscious wave of intercultural telepathy, or could elements of these remarkable universal myths have been engineered, long ages ago, by clever and purposeful people? Which of these improbable propositions is the more likely to be true? Or are there other possible explanations for the enigma of the myths?

We shall return to these questions in due course. Meanwhile, what are we to conclude about the apocalyptic visions of fire and ice, floods, volcanism and earthquakes, which the myths contain? They have about them a haunting and familiar realism. Could this be because they speak to us of a past we suspect to be our own but can neither remember clearly nor forget completely?

A Species Born in the Earth's Long Winter

In all that we call 'history'—everything we clearly remember about ourselves as a species—humanity has not once come close to total annihilation. In various regions at various times there have been terrible natural disasters. But there has not been a single occasion in the past 5000 years when mankind as a whole can be said to have faced extinction.

Has this always been so? Or is it possible, if we go back far enough, that we might discover an epoch when our ancestors were nearly wiped out? It is just such an epoch that seems to be the focus of the great myths of cataclysm. Scholars normally attribute these myths to the fantasies of ancient poets. But what if the scholars are wrong? What if some terrible series of natural catastrophes did reduce our prehistoric ancestors to a handful of individuals scattered here and there across the face of the earth, far apart, and out of touch with one another?

We are looking for an epoch that will fit the myths as snugly as the slipper on Cinderella's foot. In this search, however, there is obviously no point in investigating any period prior to the emergence on the planet of recognizably modern human beings. We're not interested here in Homo habilis or Homo erectus or even Homo sapiens neanderthalensis. We're interested only in Homo sapiens sapiens, our own species, and we haven't been around very long.

Students of early Man disagree to some extent over how long we have been around. Some researchers, as we shall see, claim that partial human remains in excess of 100,000 years old may be 'fully modern'. Others argue for a reduced antiquity in the range of 35-40,000 years, and yet others propose a compromise of 50,000 years. But no one knows for sure. 'The origin of fully modern humans denoted by the subspecies name Homo sapiens sapiens remains one of the great puzzles of palaeoanthropology,' admits one authority.[1]

About three and a half million years of more or less relevant evolution are indicated in the fossil record. For all practical purposes, that record starts with a small, bipedal hominid (nicknamed Lucy) whose remains were discovered in 1974 in the Ethiopian section of East Africa's Great Rift Valley. With a brain capacity of 400cc (less than a third of the modern average) Lucy definitely wasn't human. But she wasn't an ape either and she had some remarkably 'human-like' features, notably her upright gait, and the shape of her pelvis and back teeth. For these and other reasons, her species—classified as Australopithecus afarensis—has been accepted by the majority of palaeoanthropologists as our earliest direct ancestor.[2]

[1] Roger Lewin, Human Evolution, Blackwell Scientific Publications, Oxford, 1984, p. 74.

About two million years ago representatives of Homo habilis, the founder members of the Homo line to which we ourselves belong, began to leave their fossilized skulls and skeletons behind. As time went by this species showed clear signs of evolution towards an ever more 'gracile' and refined form, and towards a larger and more versatile brain. Homo erectus, who overlapped with and then succeeded Homo habilis, appeared about 1.6 million years ago with a brain capacity in the region of 900cc (as against 700cc in the case of habilis).[3] The million or so years after that, down to about 400,000 years ago, saw no significant evolutionary changes—or none attested to by surviving fossils. Then Homo erectus passed through the gates of extinction into hominid heaven and slowly—very, very slowly—what the palaeoanthropologists call 'the sapient grade' began to appear:

> Exactly when the transition to a more sapient form began is difficult to establish. Some believe the transition, which involved an increase in brain size and a decrease in the robustness of the skull bones, began as early as 400,000 years ago. Unfortunately, there are simply not enough fossils from this important period to be sure about what was happening.'[4]

What was definitely not happening 400,000 years ago was the emergence of anything identifiable as our own story-telling, myth-making subspecies Homo sapiens sapiens. The consensus is that 'sapient humans must have evolved from Homo erectus',[5] and it is true that a number of 'archaic sapient' populations did come into existence between 400,000 and 100,000 years ago. Unfortunately, the relationship of these transitional species to ourselves is far from clear. As noted, the first contenders for membership of the exclusive club of Homo sapiens sapiens have been dated by some researchers to the latter part of this period. But these remains are all partial and their identification is by no means universally accepted. The oldest, part of a skullcap, is a putative modern human specimen from about 113,000 BC.[6] Around this date, too, Homo sapiens neanderthalensis first appears, a quite distinct subspecies which most of us know as 'Neanderthal Man'.

Tall, heavily muscled, with prominent brow ridges and a protruding face, Neanderthal Man had a bigger average brain size than modern humans (1400cc as against our 1360cc).[7] The possession of such a big brain was no doubt an asset to these 'intelligent, spiritually sensitive, resourceful creatures'[8] and the fossil record suggests that they were the dominant species on the planet from about 100,000 years ago until 40,000 years ago. At some point during this lengthy and poorly understood period, Homo sapiens sapiens established itself, leaving behind fossil remains from about 40,000 years ago that are undisputably those of modern humans, and supplanting the Neanderthals completely by about 35,000 years ago.[9]

In summary, human beings like ourselves, whom we could pass in the street without blinking an eyelid if they were shaved and dressed in modern clothes, are creatures of the last 115,000 years at the very most—and more probably of only the last 50,000 years. It follows that if the myths of cataclysm we have reviewed do reflect an epoch of geological upheaval experienced by humanity, these upheavals took place within the last 115,000 years, and more probably within the last 50,000 years.

Cinderella's slipper

It is a curious coincidence of geology and palaeoanthropology that the onset and progress of the last Ice Age, and the emergence and proliferation of modern Man, more or less shadow each other. Curious too is the fact that so little is known about either.

In North America the last Ice Age is called the Wisconsin Glaciation (named for rock deposits studied in the state of Wisconsin) and its early phase has been dated by geologists to 115,000 years ago.[10] There were various advances and retreats of the ice-cap after that, with the fastest rate of accumulation taking place between 60,000 years ago and 17,000 years ago—a process culminating in the Tazewell Advance, which saw the glaciation reach its maximum extent around 15,000 BC.[11] By 13,000 BC, however, millions of square miles of ice had melted, for reasons that have never properly been explained, and by 8000 BC the Wisconsin had withdrawn completely.[12]

The Ice Age was a global phenomenon, affecting both the northern and the southern hemispheres; similar climatic and geological conditions therefore prevailed in many other parts of the world as well (notably in eastern Asia, Australia, New Zealand, and South America). There was massive glaciation in Europe, where the ice reached outward from Scandinavia and Scotland to cover most of Great Britain, Denmark, Poland, Russia, large parts of Germany, all of Switzerland, and big chunks of Austria, Italy and France.[13] (Known technically as the Wurm Glaciation, this European Ice Age started about 70,000 years ago, a little later than its American counterpart, but attained its maximum extent at the same time, 17,000 years ago, and then experienced the same rapid withdrawal, and shared the same terminal date).[14]

[11] Path of the Pole, p. 146.
[12] Ibid., p. 152; Encyclopaedia Britannica, 12:712.

The crucial stages of Ice Age chronology thus appear to be:

1 around 60,000 years ago, when the Wurm, the Wisconsin and other glaciations were well under way;

2 around 17,000 years ago, when the ice sheets had reached their maximum extent in both the Old World and the New;

3 the 7000 years of deglaciation that followed.

The emergence of Homo sapiens sapiens thus coincided with a lengthy period of geological and climatic turbulence, a period marked, above all else, by ferocious freezing and flooding. The many millennia during which the ice was remorselessly expanding must have been terrifying and awful for our ancestors. But those final 7000 years of deglaciation, particularly the episodes of very rapid and extensive melting, must have been worse.

Let us not jump to conclusions about the state of social, or religious, or scientific, or intellectual development of the human beings who lived through the sustained collapse of that tumultuous epoch. The popular stereotype may be wrong in assuming that they were all primitive cave dwellers. In reality little is known about them and almost the only thing that can be said is that they were men and women exactly like ourselves physiologically and psychologically.

It is possible that they came close to total extinction on several occasions during the upheavals they experienced; it is also possible that the great myths of cataclysm, to which scholars attribute no historical value, may contain accurate records and eyewitness accounts of real events. As we see in the next chapter, if we are looking for an epoch that fits those myths as snugly as the slipper on Cinderella's foot, it would seem that the last Ice Age is it.

Chapter 27

The Face of the Earth was Darkened and a Black Rain Began to Fall

Terrible forces were unleashed on all living creatures during the last Ice Age. We may deduce how these afflicted humanity from the firm evidence of their consequences for other large species. Often this evidence looks puzzling. As Charles Darwin observed after visiting South America:

> No one I think can have marvelled more at the extinction of species than I have done. When I found in La Plata [Argentina] the tooth of a horse embedded with the remains of Mastodon, Megatherium, Toxodon, and other extinct monsters, which all co-existed at a very late geological period, I was filled with astonishment; for seeing that the horse, since its introduction by the Spaniards in South America, has run wild over the whole country and has increased its numbers at an unparalleled rate, I asked myself what could have so recently exterminated the former horse under conditions of life apparently so favourable?[1]

The answer, of course, was the Ice Age. That was what exterminated the former horses of the Americas, and a number of other previously successful mammals. Nor were extinctions limited to the New World. On the contrary, in different parts of the earth (for different reasons and at different times) the long epoch of glaciation witnessed several quite distinct episodes of extinction. In all areas, the vast majority of the many destroyed species were lost in the final seven thousand years from about 15,000 BC down to 8000 BC.[2]

At this stage of our investigation is it not necessary to establish the specific nature of the climatic, seismic and geological events linked to the various advances and retreats of the ice sheets which killed off the animals. We might reasonably guess that tidal waves, earthquakes, gigantic windstorms and the sudden onset and remission of glacial conditions played their parts. But more important—whatever the actual agencies involved—is the stark empirical reality that mass extinctions of animals did take place as a result of the turmoil of the last Ice Age.

This turmoil, as Darwin concluded in his Journal, must have shaken ‘the entire framework of the globe’.[3] In the New World, for example, more than seventy genera of large mammals became extinct between 15,000 BC and 8000 BC, including all North American members of seven families, and one complete order, the Proboscidea.[4] These staggering losses, involving the violent obliteration of more than forty million animals, were not spread out evenly over the whole period; on the contrary, the vast majority of the extinctions occurred in just two thousand years, between 11,000 BC and 9000 BC.[5] To put this in perspective, during the previous 300,000 years only about twenty genera had disappeared.[6]

The same pattern of late and massive extinctions was repeated across Europe and Asia. Even far-off Australia was not exempt, losing perhaps nineteen genera of large vertebrates, not all of them mammals, in a relatively short period of time.[7]

Alaska and Siberia: the sudden freeze

The northern regions of Alaska and Siberia appear to have been the worst hit by the murderous upheavals between 13,000 and 11,000 years ago. In a great swathe of death around the edge of the Arctic Circle the remains of uncountable numbers of large animals have been found—including many carcasses with the flesh still intact, and astonishing quantities of perfectly preserved mammoth tusks. Indeed, in both regions, mammoth carcasses have been thawed to feed to sled dogs and mammoth steaks have featured on restaurant menus in Fairbanks.[8] One authority has commented, 'Hundreds of thousands of individuals must have been frozen immediately after death and remained frozen, otherwise the meat and ivory would have spoiled ... Some powerful general force was certainly at work to bring this catastrophe about.'[9]

Dr Dale Guthrie of the Institute of Arctic Biology has made an interesting point about the sheer variety of animals that flourished in Alaska before the eleventh millennium BC:

> When learning of this exotic mixture of sabre-tooth cats, camels, horses, rhinos, asses, deer with gigantic antlers, lions, ferrets, and saiga, one cannot help wondering about the world in which they lived. This great diversity of species, so different from that encountered today, raises the most obvious question: is it not likely that the rest of the environment was also different?[10]

The Alaskan muck in which the remains are embedded is like a fine, dark-grey sand. Frozen solid within this mass, in the words of Professor Hibben of the University of New Mexico:

> lie the twisted parts of animals and trees intermingled with lenses of ice and layers of peat and mosses ... Bison, horses, wolves, bears, lions ... Whole herds of > animals were apparently killed together, overcome by some common power ... Such piles of bodies of animals or men simply do not occur by any ordinary natural means ...'[11]

At various levels stone artefacts have been found 'frozen in situ at great depths, and in association with Ice Age fauna, which confirms that men were contemporary with extinct animals in Alaska'.[12] Throughout the Alaskan mucks, also there is:

> evidence of atmospheric disturbances of unparalleled violence. Mammoth and bison alike were torn and twisted as though by a cosmic hand in Godly rage. In one place we can find the foreleg and shoulder of a mammoth with portions of the flesh and toenails and hair still clinging to the blackened bones. Close by is the neck and skull of a bison with the vertebrae clinging together with tendons and ligaments and the chitinous covering of the horns intact. There is no mark of knife or cutting instrument [as there would be if human hunters, for example, had been involved]. The animals were simply torn apart and scattered over the landscape like things of straw and string, even though some of them weighed several tons. Mixed with piles of bones are trees, also twisted and torn and piled in tangled groups; and the whole is covered with a fine sifting muck, then frozen solid.[13]

Much the same picture emerges in Siberia where catastrophic climatic changes and geological upheavals occurred at around the same time. Here the frozen mammoth graveyards, 'mined' for their ivory since the Roman era, were still yielding an estimated 20,000 pairs of tusks every decade at the beginning of the twentieth century.[14]

Once again, some mysterious factor appears to have been at work in bringing about these mass extinctions. With their woolly coats and thick skins, mammoths are generally considered adapted to cold weather, and we are not surprised to come across their remains in Siberia. Harder to explain is the fact that human beings perished alongside them,[15] as well as many other animals that in no sense can be described as cold-adapted species:

> The northern Siberian plains supported vast numbers of rhinoceroses, antelope, horses, bison, and other herbivorous creatures, while a variety of carnivores, including the sabertooth cat, preyed upon them ... Like the mammoths, these other animals ranged to the extreme north of Siberia, to the shores of the Arctic Ocean, and yet further north to the Lyakhov and New Siberian Islands, only a very short distance from the North Pole.[16]

Researchers have confirmed that of the thirty-four animal species living in Siberia prior to the catastrophes of the eleventh millennium BC—including Ossip's mammoth, giant deer, cave hyena and cave lions—no less than twenty-eight were adapted only to temperate conditions.[17] In this context, one of the most puzzling aspects of the extinctions, which runs quite contrary to what today's geographical and climatic conditions lead us to expect, is that the farther north one goes, the more the mammoth and other remains increase in number.[18] Indeed some of the New Siberian Islands, well within the Arctic Circle, were described by the explorers who first discovered them as being made up almost entirely of mammoth bones and tusks.[19] The only logical conclusion, as the nineteenth-century French zoologist Georges Cuvier put it, is that 'this eternal frost did not previously exist in those parts in which the animals were frozen, for they could not have survived in such a temperature. The same instant that these creatures were bereft of life, the country which they inhabited became frozen.'[20]

There is a great deal of other evidence which suggests that a sudden freeze took place in Siberia during the eleventh millennium BC. In his survey of the New Siberian Islands, the Arctic explorer Baron Eduard von Toll found the remains 'of a sabre-tooth tiger, and a fruit tree that had been 90 feet tall when it was standing. The tree was well preserved in the permafrost, with its roots and seeds. Green leaves and ripe fruit still clung to its branches ... At the present time the only representative of tree vegetation on the islands is a willow that grows one inch high'.[21]

Equally indicative of the cataclysmic change that took place at the onset of the great cold in Siberia is the food the extinct animals were eating when they perished: 'The mammoths died suddenly, in intense cold, and in great numbers. Death came so quickly that the swallowed vegetation is yet undigested ... Grasses, bluebells, buttercups, tender sedges, and wild beans have been found, yet identifiable and undeteriorated, in their mouths and stomachs.'[22]

Needless to say, such flora does not grow anywhere in Siberia today. Its presence there in the eleventh millennium BC compels us to accept that the region had a pleasant and productive climate—one that was temperate or even warm.[23] Why the end of the last Ice Age in other parts of the world should have been the beginning of fatal winter in this former paradise is a question we shall postpone until Part VIII. What is certain, however, is that at some point between 12-13,000 years ago a destroying frost descended with horrifying speed upon Siberia and has never relaxed its grip. In an eerie echo of the Avestic traditions, a land which had previously enjoyed seven months of summer was converted almost overnight into a land of ice and snow with ten months of harsh and frozen winter.[24]

Wragnell, the explorer, observed on Bear Island (Medvizhi Ostrova) that the soil consisted of only sand, ice and such a quantity of mammoth bones that they seemed to be the chief substance of the island. On the Siberian mainland he observed that the tundra was dotted with mammoth tusks rather than Arctic shrubbery.

A thousand Krakatoas, all at once

Many of the myths of cataclysm speak of times of terrible cold, of darkened skies, of black, burning, bituminous rain. For centuries it must have been like that all the way across the arc of death incorporating immense tracts of Siberia, the Yukon and Alaska. Here, 'Interspersed in the muck depths, and sometimes through the very piles of bones and tusks themselves, are layers of volcanic ash. There is no doubt that coincidental with the [extinctions] there were volcanic eruptions of tremendous proportions.'[25]
